DR. CAMERON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Thompson, who was to have appeared as counsel for Mr. Lyons, denied that the prisoner knew anything about the procedure and the necessity of giving notice? I have seen a letter from him to that effect. If it is the case that owing to inability to understand a technical point the man failed to produce evidence, will the right hon. Gentleman look into the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot realise the condition of mind of either Mr. Thompson or Mr. Lyons if they failed to understand a distinct notice that a plea of justification must be filed if witnesses were to be called. They had twelve days before the trial in which to file the plea.

DR. CAMERON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is not aware that Mr. Thompson denies having received the notification mentioned.

A "PROCLAIMED" MEETING.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.), for Mr. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on what grounds the meeting called by the Evicted Tenants' Association, to be held on the 1st May last at Inniscarra, was proclaimed by the Irish Government?

*MR. JACKSON: The meeting referred to was proclaimed, as the responsible authorities had reason to believe that it was being convened with the unlawful object of denouncing and intimidating the occupier of an evicted farm and of intimidating others from taking such farms.

MR. SEXTON: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government have any right to suppress a public meeting in Ireland without disclosing the information on which they acted?

*MR. JACKSON: In a previous answer I stated that the police had reason to suppose that this meeting would lead to a disturbance, and that it was on a sworn information suppressed, the same course being followed in this as in other cases.

MR. SEXTON: What I particularly want to ask is, whether the Government have a right to prevent a public meeting from being held in Ireland, and refuse to disclose the information on which they act?

*MR. JACKSON: The Government accept the responsibility of their action. It is notorious what the character of the meeting was to be. I find in the report of certain proceedings connected with this meeting, that a letter was read from a gentleman whom the hon. Member will know—Mr. Michael Davitt. He apologised for his absence and said—

"I regret I am unable to attend a meeting announced to be held in support of evicted tenants and for denouncing landgrabbers. I wish you thorough success."

I have merely read this to show that the object of the proposed meeting was to bring intimidation to bear upon persons in the district.

MR. SEXTON: I shall move for the production of a copy of the sworn information, on the principle that the Government are not entitled to suppress a public meeting unless they are prepared to inform the House of the reasons on which they act.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Is it in the power of any policeman to obtain the suppression of a proposed meeting?

*MR. JACKSON: The Government cannot interfere with any meeting unless they have reason to believe it will be an illegal meeting.

ALLEGED RIGHT OF WAY AT THE CURRAGH.

MR. HAYDEN (for Mr. CAREW, Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that a site for the erection of a labourer's cottage, on a farm adjoining the Curragh of Kildare, has been selected and approved of by the Naas Board of Guardians, and that the contractor employed by the Guardians for the building of the cottage has been unable to undertake the work, in consequence of the refusal of the Deputy Ranger of the Curragh to allow him access to the site; and whether, inasmuch as the only means of access is across a strip of waste land about nine yards in width between the public road and the farm, over which a right of way has always existed, he will state under what authority the Deputy Ranger is acting in closing up a right of way?

SIR J. GORST: The right of way alleged has never existed. An attempt was made to assert such right of way by pulling down the Curragh boundary fence. The Deputy Ranger applied to the Court, and a perpetual injunction has been granted.

THE POLICE VOTE AND VESTRY ELECTIONS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Metropolitan Police Regulations permit constables, while on special or ordinary duty at a polling station, to record their votes in vestry elections where the voting is open; whether two constables were reported to the Commissioner for recording their votes while on special duty at the recent vestry election at Walthamstow; and whether one of the two constables was removed to another station in consequence; and, if so, whether he will have him restored, and make such alterations in the Police Regulations as will prevent constables being punished for exercising the franchise?

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. No police-constables were reported for recording their votes on the occasion referred to. A complaint was made by a private individual that two constables had voted whilst on duty, and he was informed that there was nothing in what was complained of to which exception would be taken. No constable was removed to another station in connection with this matter. This question is a mere repetition of a question which the hon. Member put to me on Monday last, and I must refer him to my reply on that occasion.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY EMPLOYEES.

MR. HAYDEN (for Mr. JOHN REDMOND, Waterford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when it is probable that the Report of the Departmental Committee, appointed some months ago to inquire into the present position of the civil employees on the Ordnance Survey, will be laid upon the Table, or made known to the men?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I answered a similar question a few days ago. The Report in question will be laid on the Table, I hope, very shortly.

INOCULATION AND PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

MR. HAYDEN (for Dr. FITZGERALD, Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government have altogether given up scientific experiments regarding the efficacy of inoculation as a preventive of pleuro-pneumonia; and, if so, on what grounds?

*MR. JACKSON: The subject-matter of this question was carefully considered by a Departmental Committee, and reported to Parliament on 10th July, 1888. The Committee, for the reasons detailed at length in that Report, did not recommend inoculation as a means of eradicating pleuro-pneumonia.

IRISH VETERINARY INSPECTORS AND SUPERANNUATION.

MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin Harbour) (for Mr. MAGUIRE, Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Government officials appointed under similar circumstances to the Privy Council Veterinary Inspectors, Ireland, are now entitled to superannuation allowances; and whether, if so, he is prepared to reconsider the unsatisfactory position of officials connected with so important a branch of the Public Service as the Veterinary Department, Ireland, with a view of redressing their grievances with respect to superannuation allowances, as set forth in a recent memorial presented to him?

*MR. JACKSON: The officials referred to were appointed on the understanding, and with the full knowledge, that they would not be entitled to receive any superannuation allowances. I do not feel myself in a position to propose a change in their conditions of service.

POOR LAW MEDICAL OFFICERS IN IRELAND.

MR. HAYDEN (for Dr. FITZGERALD): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many Irish dispensary doctors are at present serving under the Poor Law Board in Ireland whose ages range from sixty-five to eighty-five years; and if there is any age, or any length of service, which entitles an Irish dispensary doctor to a retiring allowance?

*MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Board are not aware how many Poor Law Medical Officers in Ireland between the limits of age mentioned in the question are now serving. There is no age or length of service which entitles these officers to retiring allowance. The granting of these allowances is at the discretion of the Boards of Guardians, subject to the consent of the Local Government Board.

PETROLEUM IN THE SUEZ CANAL.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will give the names of the experts whose assistance was given by Her Majesty's Government to the British Directors of the Suez Canal Company, when the regulations for transport of petroleum in bulk through the Suez Canal were under the consideration of the Company; and if he can say whether the experts in question acquainted themselves, by personal observation, with the exceptional conditions and circumstances under which this traffic must, if permitted, be conducted?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The Inter-Departmental Committee which considered the regulations referred to was composed of Colonel Majendie (representing the Home Office), Sir Digby Murray (representing the Board of Trade), Captain Wharton (representing the Admiralty), Sir Rivers Wilson and Sir J. Stokes (two of the British Directors of the Suez Canal Company), and myself (representing the Foreign Office). The names of the first three gentlemen are, I think, a sufficient guarantee of the quality of the assistance given to the British Directors. The hon. Member is labouring under a misapprehension if he thinks that any power is vested in Her Majesty's Government to permit or forbid any particular class of traffic through the Suez Canal. Her Majesty's Government have no such power; nor has the Company.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has considered the provisional regulations of the Suez Canal Company for the carriage of petroleum in bulk, as they affect the safety of the thousands of Her Majesty's troops annually passing through the Canal?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing) (who replied): The question of the carriage of petroleum in bulk through the Suez Canal was considered by an Inter-Departmental Committee at the Foreign Office in December last, and additions to the proposed regulations were framed with the object of making the traffic as safe as possible. These proposals were submitted by the British directors to the Suez Canal Company, and have been in part included in the revised regulations. I am, however, informed that at present petroleum is not carried in bulk through the Canal.

STEAM TRAWLING IN IRISH WATERS.

MR. TIMOTHY HARRINGTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it has come to his knowledge that the fishermen of Ringsend, and other fishermen engaged in trawling off the Irish coast, have suffered very serious injury during the present season from the manner in which their nets are being driven into and torn by steam trawlers from the French and English ports; and whether he will take some steps to afford protection to the poor men engaged in this industry?

*MR. JACKSON: The Inspectors of the Irish Fisheries report that no complaints of the nature indicated in the question have been received by them.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE REGULATIONS.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether it has been brought to his notice that, whereas the foot-and-mouth disease restrictions were removed on Thursday, the 14th April, the Railway Company refused to transport cattle from Skipton to Blackburn on the following Monday, on the ground that they had no knowledge that the restrictions had been removed?

MR. CHAPLIN: I have no knowledge of the occurrence to which my noble Friend refers. An Order revoking the prohibition against the movement of animals out of Lancashire was issued on the 13th April and came into force on the following day. A copy of it was sent to the Lancashire Railway Companies on the day on which it was issued; but that Order did not affect the movement of cattle from Skipton, in Yorkshire, to Blackburn, in Lancashire, and I think there must have been some mistake on the part of some of the individuals concerned in the matter. I have made careful inquiry, and I cannot ascertain that there has been any failure on the part of the officers of the Board of Agriculture to notify with promptness the issue of the numerous Orders which it has recently been necessary to pass.

GRANTING OF LICENCES AT KINGSTON-ON-THAMES.

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the proceedings of the Justices of the Licensing Sessions for the Borough of Kingston-on-Thames, held on the 2nd and 30th March last, when six magistrates sat as a Licensing Committee to hear applications for licences, and granted two full provisional licences, notwithstanding strong opposition on the part of the inhabitants of the respective localities in which the proposed licensed houses are to be situated; whether he is aware that the same Justices, with the addition of two others, immediately after such licences were granted, sat as a confirming authority, and, without hearing evidence, confirmed the decision of the Committee; and whether it is usual, or in accordance with the provisions of the Licensing Acts, that in boroughs where there are no Quarter Sessions the confirmation of a Committee decision should be made by the same Justices with only two additional Justices sitting with them and deciding the question, without evidence or argument, within a few minutes of the decision of the Committee, thus preventing the opportunity of an appeal to, or a rehearing by, another body of Justices?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Clerk to the Justices that the case referred to in the question was not one of new licences, but was a transfer of two old licences from quarters of the town where they are not required to sites in the outskirts where considerable building operations have been going on for years. The opposition was mainly from members of the Total Abstinence Society and from one publican. The petitions for and against the applications were in several instances signed by the same persons. The confirming Justices had all been present in Court, and had heard the original application. They constituted a majority of the whole Borough Bench, and were unanimous. I am not aware that there was any illegality in the proceedings.

ENLISTMENT OF BOYS IN THE ARMY.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if his attention has been drawn to the report in the Times of the 13th instant of a case at the Thames Police Court, where a man complained that his son, who was only fourteen and a half years of age, had enlisted into a Fusilier regiment at Aldershot, stating that he had written to the Adjutant of the regiment, protesting against his son being detained against his parents' will, but had received no reply; whether he is aware that the magistrate directed the police to inquire into the case, and can he state what the result of that inquiry has been; and what steps does he intend to take in the matter?

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the statement in the Times of Friday, that a recruit, aged fourteen, has been enlisted by an Infantry battalion at Aldershot; and, if so, what explanation he can give of the case?

MR. BRODRICK: Application has been made for the discharge of Private Defries, of the 1st Battalion Scottish Rifles, who is stated by his father to be only fourteen and a half years of age, but who, after performing seven weeks drill in the Militia, enlisted last January, giving his age as eighteen years two months. The medical officer recorded his age as physically equivalent to eighteen, he being five feet four and five-eighths of an inch high, with a chest measurement of thirty-three inches, and weight of one hundred and twenty-six pounds, which are above the minimum of the British or any foreign army. If his age can be substantiated he will be discharged, but up to the present time the father has failed to substantiate his statement by a birth certificate.

MR. PAULTON: Will steps be taken to ascertain what the age of this boy is?

MR. BRODRICK: I do not think it is necessary for the War Office to take any steps. It being shown that the recruit was physically equivalent to eighteen, I think the War Office can do no more.

ACCESS TO MOUNTAINS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, considering that Her Majesty's Government have accepted a Resolution declaring that legislation is needed to secure to the public the right of access to mountains and moorlands in Scotland, and that they now take exception to the provisions of the Access to Mountains (Scotland) Bill, which has been brought in to give effect to that Resolution, they will state to the House what their objections are to that Bill, and subject to what Amendments they can assent to its passing, in order that its promoters may be able to determine whether, by accepting such Amendments, the passage of the Bill in the present Session of Parliament can be secured?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have to inform the hon. Member that the Government intend to introduce a Bill dealing with this subject, though if it meets with opposition they cannot promise time for its discussion.

MR. BRYCE: How soon may we expect it to be introduced?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman any assurance on that point.

MR. BRYCE: Will it be introduced within the next month, or this Session?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I really cannot add anything to the reply I have already given to the right hon. Gentleman's question.

MR. BRYCE: I must press the right hon. Gentleman on this matter. Will the Bill be introduced this Session?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: My reply had reference to this Session.

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the telegraphic statement which appeared in the Times of 13th May, that Governor Sir Henry Norman has given the Royal Assent to the Bill for removing the prohibition on the importation of Kanaka labour for employment on the sugar plantations in Queensland, is correct; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government has any further power to disallow this legislation?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): As I have already stated, the Bill has been assented to by the Governor, and is therefore in operation. The power of disallowance still remains with the Queen. The Act as passed by the Legislature has not yet been received, but I may remind the House that the outrages referred to by the hon. Member in his former questions were all committed before 1885; and looking to the fact that the recruiting and employment of natives has been carried on under the existing regulations from 1885 to the end of 1890 without any abuses, and that, as appears from the telegram from Queensland, those regulations will be made still more stringent, and as the Colonial Government is firmly determined to prevent infringement of those regulations, there would not seem to be sufficient ground for advising so exceptional a course as disallowance. I may also remind the House that the High Commissioner's Court of the Western Pacific has, under the Pacific Islanders' Protection Acts, and the Orders in Council made under those Acts, and the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts, jurisdiction to try and punish British subjects for offences committed against natives of the Western Pacific Islands in or within three miles of any of those islands or on board a British ship at sea.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow time for the House to see the provisions of this new Act before finally deciding to allow it?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman will say on what day this Government received from Queensland information that the Act was passed; and whether he will reconsider his determination, in view of the strong feeling existing in the country, not to telegraph for these new and stringent regulations which he has assured the House are inserted in the Act?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Mr. Speaker, in answer to these questions I have to say that the recruiting could not be stopped except by immediate disallowance of the Act; and, as I have stated, Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to take that extreme step. I may remind the hon. Gentleman that by the Colonial Regulations, No. 50, every law which has received the Governor's assent, unless it contains a suspending clause, immediately, or from the time specified in the Act, becomes law. The Crown has power to disallow the law, and if it be exercised, the law ceases to operate from the date at which that disallowance is published. And that answers the second question, because if we were to telegraph for the regulations in force, we could not prevent recruiting without disallowing the Act.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Does the right hon. Gentleman know what these new and satisfactory regulations are? If so, will he lay them on the Table of the House?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I have only to say that all the information I am in possession of I have given to the House. The information contained in the telegram which I read on Friday—which was sent by the Government of Queensland to the Agent General of Queensland—contained an assurance that the Colonial Government had imposed most stringent restrictions, which would prevent any possible recurrence of those events which I, in common with every Member of this House, lament. I cannot see, in view of the explanation I have given, that we should be further advanced by adopting the suggestion of the hon. Member.

MR. PICTON: May I ask if the prerogative of the Crown cannot be held in suspense until the regulations are received, and the House knows what they are? How can the Government, without having seen them, tell that they are satisfactory?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I have endeavoured to make my meaning clear, but I do not think the hon. Gentleman has understood my answer. I read the 50th paragraph of the Colonial Regulations, showing that the recruiting could not be stopped except by immediate disallowance of the Act.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies a question of which I have given him private notice, whether his attention has been directed to a telegram in the Times of the 14th instant, giving a statement of Mr. Playford, the Premier of South Australia, at Townsville, Queensland, to the effect that the Polynesian labourers imported from the South Sea Islands into Queensland were practically slaves?

BARON H. DE WORMS: In consequence of this paragraph in the Times of the 14th instant, the Agent General for Queensland telegraphed to his Government, and he has received the following reply, dated Brisbane, 16th May:—

"Playford arrived yesterday here. Demes emphatically that he stated anything of the kind mentioned. Never ashore in Queensland before yesterday."

MR. JOHN ELLIS: What we desire is that the House shall have the opportunity of seeing what the present regulations, which have proved insufficient, are; and what the more stringent regulations are. Will the right hon. Gentleman telegraph and obtain that information?

BARON H. DE WORMS: As far as I know, the more stringent regulations are on their way home. The House would not be farther advanced if they possessed them. We have either to allow them to go on or disallow the Act in force.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as this Act has provoked considerable friction, the Government are prepared to disallow it?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I am sorry to press the right hon. Gentleman further; but, in answer to a question, the right hon. Gentleman said that still more stringent regulations would be issued on the Governor's return. Can he state what objection there would be to telegraph for these more stringent regulations?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not see that there is any objection to telegraph for them. But I am bound to say I do not think the position would be in the least altered thereby.

SCOTCH PRISON OFFICIALS.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he will lay upon the Table the Report in regard to Scotch Prisons, and whether the work performed by officers in English and Scotch convict prisons is exactly parallel, and that the salaries alone differ?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It is not intended to lay this Departmental Report on the Table, as it is not thought that such a course would be of public benefit. As there is in Scotland no separate convict prison service, the comparison suggested in the question is somewhat misleading. Though the work performed at Peterhead Prison is similar to that performed by officers in convict prisons in England, the hon. Member is correct in saying that the rates of pay differ.

CATTLE DISEASE ON THE CONTINENT.

MR. BEAUFOY (Lambeth, Kennington): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is satisfied that cattle disease exists in Spain and Portugal; and whether he can now withdraw the notice prohibiting the importation of cattle from those countries?

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not know about Portugal, but I am satisfied that disease exists in Spain. The Order prohibiting the importation of live animals from Spain and Portugal took effect from 31st March last, and on 29th April I received information from Cadiz that foot-and-mouth disease had broken out in the district of San Roque. I have since been informed that the same disease has been discovered in other districts, and in Cadiz itself. I cannot consent, under any circumstances, to withdraw the Order in question so long as there is any danger of the importation of disease from the Continent; and what has occurred in the case both of Spain and of Holland proves, I think, conclusively that the danger was not over estimated by the Board of Agriculture.

ERECTION OF THE NEW GENERAL POST OFFICE.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the manner in which the brickwork is being executed at the new General Post Office; and whether, if the subject has not been brought under his notice, he will direct inquiries to be made, and be prepared to receive evidence from workmen who have been or who are employed upon the building?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): My attention has not been specially called to the manner in which the brickwork is being executed at the new General Post Office, but since the hon. Member's question appeared on the Paper I have directed inquiries to be made, and shall be glad to receive any information which the hon. Member can give me on the subject.

ADDITIONAL LICENCES IN COUNTY DONEGAL.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland how many new licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors were granted in the County Donegal at the annual Licensing Sessions held in October last; how many have since been granted; and if in this county large sums of public money have recently and are now being spent, owing to the strong representations made that the inhabitants were in great destitution, and that famine was imminent?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that twenty - two new licences were granted at the annual Licensing Sessions held in County Donegal in October last, and that one new licence has since been granted. I have also to say that considerable sums of public money have recently been spent in relief of destitution in the county.

THE GRANTS TOWARDS HORSE BREEDING IN IRELAND.

MR. PINKERTON (for Mr. McCARTAN): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the grant of five thousand pounds towards the improvement of the breed of horses in Ireland, whether the amount was devoted towards the improvement of the breed of horses only; and whether he will advise the Royal Dublin Society to cause at least one of the stallions selected for County Down to visit some of the towns in South Down, in order that the farmers of that division may derive some benefit from the grant?

*MR. JACKSON: The annual grant of five thousand pounds is devoted to the improvement of the breed of cattle as well as horses, in accordance with the provisions of the Probate Duties Act. The Royal Dublin Society allocates three thousand two hundred pounds to horses, and one thousand eight hundred pounds to cattle. Under the provisions of the scheme in operation, this year the owners of stallions determine the places at which they shall serve.

MR. PINKERTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the distribution has anything to do with politics?

*MR. JACKSON: I am sorry the hon. Gentleman should even suggest anything of the kind. I am quite sure that nobody who knows the way in which the Royal Dublin Society discharges its duties would think that.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): Is it not a fact that the Royal Dublin Society do assign horses to different parts of the country and not merely to those places from which applications are made?

*MR. JACKSON: I understand that the Royal Dublin Society invites offers of horses from owners, and of course they accept what good offers are made. If applications are made from other districts and the horses are found to be satisfactory, of course the Royal Dublin Society will give to the districts from which the applications are made the same advantages as other places.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS AND TITHE RENT RECEIPTS.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the right hon. Member for Oxford University, as an Ecclesiastical Commissioner, whether he has now made inquiries and seen a letter, signed E. David, Williams, and David, who describe themselves as receivers of tithe for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of England at Llandaff, for the Parish of Llanthew, Brecon; and whether he will take steps to ensure that the Rule of the Commissioners, that separate receipts are to be given whenever required, is adhered to by all their agents?

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY (Oxford University): In answer to a question from the hon. Member on 31st March, I stated that the receivers of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had been directed by them to give every facility to landowners by furnishing as many separate receipts in respect of each tithe rent-charge as might be required; but I promised the hon. Member, if he would furnish particulars of any case such as was suggested in his question, the matter should be investigated. The hon. Member has since furnished me with a copy of the letter referred to in his present question, in which Messrs. David, Williams and David, while applying for payment of tithe rent-charge due to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and describing themselves as receivers, declined to furnish separate receipts for each tenant. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have investigated the matter, and regret to find that such a letter should have been written, which was entirely contrary to their instructions and unknown to their receivers. The writers of the letter, Messrs. David, Williams, and David, are a local firm of surveyors at Cardiff, who have been employed by Messrs. Clutton, but they are not nominated or appointed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or authorised by them to act on their behalf. Messrs. Clutton are the receivers of the Commissioners for that district, and the Commissioners hold them accountable for all acts of persons employed by them. The attention of Messrs. Clutton has been specially called to the circumstances of this case, and orders have been issued which will ensure that the rule of the Commissioners, that separate receipts are to be given whenever required, shall be adhered to by all their agents.

THE EDUCATION OF THE DEAF AND DUMB.

MR. BRUNNER: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will this Session re-introduce the Deaf and Dumb Children Education Bill; and whether, in view of the fact that dumb children can be taught to speak, he will change the title of the Bill, so as not to perpetuate the notion that deaf children are necessarily dumb?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The hon. Member's knowledge of the Bill does not appear to extend so far as its title, or he would be aware that for the last two Sessions it has been described as the Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill. I believe it is the intention of the Lord

President to introduce the Bill in another place at an early date, if there is a probability of time being found to pass it through the House of Commons.

THE CONVICT KINSELLA.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland at what date the case of the convict Kinsella, at present confined in Maryborough Prison, was last re-considered; and whether, in view of the fact that the man is in bad health, and has already suffered ten years' penal servitude for assault, and that the man assaulted has long since recovered from his injuries and received £150 compensation, the Lord Lieutenant will again consider Kinsella's case with a view to exercising the prerogative of mercy in his favour?

*MR. JACKSON: The case of the convict referred to was last considered in October, 1890, by the Lords Justices, acting for the present Viceroy. If the convict is of opinion that there are any circumstances he would wish to have brought before the Lord Lieutenant, it is, of course, open to him to submit a further memorial.

BALL AMMUNITION TO SOLDIERS.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what check is kept on the ball ammunition served out to soldiers at Aldershot and elsewhere, whether it is true, as stated at the late inquest of a soldier at Aldershot, that two hundred rounds were in possession of one soldier; and if in future greater supervision will be exercised in serving out ball cartridges?

MR. BRODRICK: Officers commanding companies are held responsible that men to whom ball cartridge is issued account for it all either by producing empty cartridge cases or unfired cartridges. Inquiries are being made at Aldershot as to the alleged possession by one soldier of two hundred ball cartridges, but at present nothing is known to justify such a statement. The attention of General Officers commanding will be called to the necessity of careful supervision in all cases of issue of ball cartridges; but it is feared that nothing will prevent the occasional secretion of a cartridge.

THE PARIAH POPULATION IN SOUTH INDIA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Madras Government has been frequently drawn of late by the public Press, by memorials from the missionaries, and particularly in a Report from Mr. Tremenheere, Collector of Chingleput, to the condition of the pariah population in Southern India; whether Mr. Tremenheere's Report will be published; and whether the Secretary of State will urge the Madras Government to take immediate steps, by legislation or otherwise, to remove the grievances and ameliorate the condition of this class?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): (1) The attention of the Government of Madras has been called to the subject by a Despatch from the Secretary of State of the 23rd July last, as well as in the manner described by the hon. Member. (2) The Secretary of State has not yet received the reply of the Government of Madras or the particular Report mentioned by the hon. Member. It is impossible to say at present what Papers will be presented. (3) Both the Secretary of State and the Government of Madras are anxious to do all that is practicable to improve the condition of the pariahs. The subject is under the consideration of the Government of Madras, and the Secretary of State has telegraphed to inquire when their reply to his Despatch may be expected.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL PENSIONS.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state what action the Government intend to take on the Report of the Committee upon the Greenwich Hospital Pensions?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The evidence given before the Committee has not yet been published, and there has, therefore, been no opportunity of considering the reasons which influenced the Committee in arriving at the decisions given in their Report. The Government will, however, take the subject into consideration as soon as possible; and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman will repeat his question after the publication of the evidence, I hope then to be able to announce the action we propose to take in the matter.

GUNNERY TRIALS ON THE "ROYAL SOVEREIGN."

ADMIRAL MAYNE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the case that instructions have been issued to the Royal Sovereign not to fire her 67-ton guns right ahead?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No such instructions as those suggested have been given. The gunnery trials that took place in the Trafalgar at the time she was commissioned were conclusive as to the power of the deck structure to withstand the concussion of firing the 67-ton guns fore and aft; and as the decks of the Royal Sovereign have been pillared and supported to even a greater extent, no useful object would have been served in carrying out similar trials in her case. The recent gunnery trials were made primarily to test the gun mountings and appliances for loading and working the guns, and as a matter of convenience the guns were fired nearly abeam.

THE CASE OF COLONEL MAGUIRE.

MR. HAYDEN (for Mr. HARRISON, Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he has ever had under his own personal consideration the case of Lieutenant Colonel Maguire, late of the 60th Rifles, with reference to his claim for "compensation for loss of good service pay, pension, &c"?

MR. BRODRICK: Yes, Sir. The case has been repeatedly considered since 1866, and the Secretary of State personally decided five years ago that Lieutenant Colonel Maguire had no claim. It is not a case connected with the abolition of purchase.

THE RIVER FERGUS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to a resolution of the Clare Castle Harbour

Lord G. Hamilton

Trustees, passed on the 26th January last, with reference to the obstruction caused in the River Fergus by the stones and mud washed into the bed of the river from the broken slob lands embankment; whether he is aware of the danger to navigation caused thereby; and whether he will have steps taken to remove the present obstruction and to prevent a recurrence? Before the right hon. Gentleman answers I should like to ask him whether since this Notice has been placed on the Paper his attention has not been again directed to the dangerous condition of the River Fergus; and also why it is that the complaints have never received the slightest attention? Frequent representations have been made by the Local Board Chairman on the 25th January, and the time when this Notice was placed on the Paper.

*SIR J. GORST: I am informed that, after a very careful examination of the River Fergus by the engineer of the Board of Works, no such obstruction as that described has been found to exist.

MR. COX: May I be permitted to read the communication sent to the right hon. Gentleman by the Secretary of the Clare Castle Harbour Commissioners last Friday?

*SIR J. GORST: I think it would be more satisfactory if the hon. Member would put down a further question.

MR. COX: I will do so.

EVICTIIONS IN MAYO.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has observed that three hundred and twenty eviction notices were filed in the County of Mayo alone during the last three months; whether he has inquired into the cause of this increase of eviction notices in that county; upon how many and what estates does Mr. Rutledge, Sub-Sheriff of the County of Mayo, act as land agent; and, in view of the fact that the Sub-Sheriff, who is the nominee of the High Sheriff, is directly responsible to the Crown, by whom he is appointed, will the Government intimate to the High Sheriff the undesirability, on grounds of public policy, of his delegate, the principal executive officer of the law in the county, fulfilling at the same time the functions of agent for the parties who are plaintiffs in actions of ejectment?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the eviction notices referred to have been issued in respect of ejectment decrees obtained at the April, June, and September Sessions of 1891, some of which were accordingly about to run out of date. It must not be supposed that evictions will necessarily follow on these notices. On the contrary, as a matter of fact, I am informed that settlements have already been made in a large portion of the cases, and further settlements will, no doubt, follow if the tenants are left free to act as they think best.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: Is it not a fact that the mere receipt of one of these eviction notices deprives the tenant of every legal interest in his holding just as much as if he were on the roadside; and is it not a fact also that the number of eviction notices served, from whatever reason, within the past three months in County Mayo is greater than the number of eviction notices served in any similar period for the last ten years?

*MR. JACKSON: I do not know the statistics, but I understand that under the Act of 1887, when an amendment of the law was made, the act of serving a notice is held to be equivalent to taking possession. The hon. Member knows, however, that usually a period of time elapses between the serving of the notice and taking possession, and I have no doubt that in most of these cases settlements have been made.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that he has made no answer whatever to the two last paragraphs of the question.

*MR. JACKSON: I must apologise to the hon. Member for not having referred to them. He asks me upon how many and what estates does Mr. Rutledge, Sub-Sheriff of Mayo, act as land agent. I have no means of ascertaining that unless I communicate with Mr. Rutledge and ask him; I have no power of enforcing an answer to the question, and it would only be by his courtesy that I could possibly obtain the information. With reference to the last paragraph, I have previously expressed my own opinion upon the subject; but I have since learned from inquiries I have made that wherever Mr. Rutledge, acting as agent, has found it necessary to take proceedings, in all those cases they were carried out by bailiffs and not by himself.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: Inasmuch as the Sub-Sheriff is nominated by the High Sheriff, who is directly responsible to the Crown, I should like to ask if any remonstrance will be made with this Sub-Sheriff on the subject of acting in the double capacity of agent for the landlord and principal executive officer of the Crown?

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member knows very well that I have no power to interfere with the High Sheriff, and no remonstrance of mine would be of any value. The only result would be that the High Sheriff would ask me to appoint somebody else.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: Is it not a fact that the right hon. Gentleman has so much power over the High Sheriffs in Ireland that he or his predecessor merely by a stroke of the pen removed from being High Sheriff of Waterford the hon. Member for Dublin County?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I shall deal with this question at the first opportunity on the Vote on Account.

SEED POTATOES IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any decision has yet been arrived at as to the payment of the amount of the verdict and costs in the case of "Ryan v. The Guardians of the Cavan Union"; if so, what is the decision; if not, what is the reason for the delay; and whether he is aware that the loss caused to the Guardians in that case was entirely caused by their obedience to the order of the Inspector appointed by the Land Commission, under the Seed Potatoes Act, that they were bound to obey such order by the rules made under the Act, and that the Guardians of the Enniskillen Union, under similar circumstances, refused to obey the same rule, and escaped the loss which has fallen on the Cavan Guardians on account of their obedience to the law?

*SIR J. GORST: The Treasury cannot consider this question until the close of the collection of the seed rate. I am not aware of the circumstances alleged in the second paragraph of the question.

MR. KNOX: May I ask, as the right hon. Gentleman told me three months ago that this matter was under consideration, what has been the result of the consideration which has been going on; and what is the reason why the consideration must be postponed until the time he mentions?

SIR J. GORST: I think I told him the reason.

MR. KNOX: Why should it not be considered earlier? I do not see any occasion for the delay. I shall put down a question for another day.

LOUGH ERNE DRAINAGE.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury in how many cases the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland have, up to the present date, raised the rents of tenants whose lands are alleged to have been improved by the Lough Erne drainage; what is the total amount of increase; what is the acreage of the land alleged to have been improved, and on which the rents have been increased; and how many of such tenants held under judicial tenancies?

*SIR J. GORST: I am informed that up to the present increased rents have only been settled for one-third of the district — namely, on seven hundred and fifty-nine holdings containing five thousand four hundred and two acres, the increased rents amounting to one thousand and seventy-eight pounds per annum; two hundred and twenty-three of the holdings are held under judicial tenancies.

MR. KNOX: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering the bad effect on the peace of the district of those increases of rent, and the great difficulty in arriving at any final legal decision as to whether the Board of Works has power to raise judicial rents, he will use his influence to expedite the decision of the pending cases, in order that joint action may be taken by the tenants?

Mr. Knox

*SIR J. GORST: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. CURZON AND ARBITRATION.

MR. CREMER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether in a speech delivered by him at Brighton on the 9th instant, a brief account of which appeared in the Times on the 11th instant, he is correctly reported to have said, concerning a principle which has been adopted and acted upon by Her Majesty's Government, that he was glad the Arbitration Societies had not made it impossible to defend with the sword what the sword had won?

*MR. CURZON: The words which the hon. Gentleman recites are not exactly those which I used; but, at the same time, they represent with approximate fidelity what I said. It will be obvious to this House that there must be many hundreds of years before the principles of the Society or the League, of which I understand the hon. Gentleman is the Secretary, can be successfully applied to the settlement of frontier disputes with turbulent tribes on the confines of our Indian Empire, and the opinion I expressed in the speech to which he has referred was one of purely personal satisfaction that I should not live long enough to see the time when an attempt will be made to settle these questions by the hon. Gentleman or the Society which he represents.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): As the hon. Gentleman has admitted the substantial accuracy of the report, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury if he approves of the language which is calculated to discredit the method of peaceful adjustment of differences between nations that has been more than once adopted by the Government of this country and carried on successfully for settlement of international differences.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): So far as I hear what passed between my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman who put the question originally, I gather that my hon. Friend expresses his dissent from the view that the principle of arbitration can be successfully applied between the frontier tribes in India and the Government of India. It appears to me that in expressing the limitation to which the principle of arbitration can be applied with any probability of success during the next few years, my hon. Friend did a service rather than a disservice to the cause, because nothing does more harm to any cause, however good it may be, than the ill-timed and intemperate advocacy of its friends.

MR. KNOX : What about the speech of Lord Salisbury ?

MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duties of Customs now chargeable on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say) on—

Tea . . the pound . . Four Pence."

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : I believe on this Resolution we are entitled to discuss the Budget as a whole, and to discuss the general financial position and the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Budget was a very uneventful and humdrum affair. We were given to understand, however, by the friends of the right hon. Gentleman that he might, if he had chosen, risen superior to circumstances, and have produced a sensational and electioneering Budget out of the unpromising materials at his disposal. We were also given to understand that he declined to take advantage of this opportunity, chiefly out of consideration for our feelings. That may be so ; but, on the other hand, it is just possible that the colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman have had vividly in their recollection certain financial incidents in the career of the right hon. Gentleman, and have thought that just before a General Election discretion was the better part of valour, and that it would, on the whole, be a mistake to introduce a sensational or far-reaching Budget. With respect to the Revenue and Expenditure, there is not very much to be said ; but I think the right hon. Gentleman is to be congratulated both on the Revenue and the Expenditure of last year. Because, while the Revenue has been elastic, there has been, especially on the War Services, a considerable saving of expenditure. That saving amounts, I think, to something like half a million a year. But I am sorry to see that this saving of expenditure on our Services cannot be considered in the light of a death-bed repentance, because the Estimates of the Army and Navy Expenditure for the coming year are the highest that this country has ever known in time of peace. Under the right hon. Gentleman the expenditure on the War Services has risen from thirty and a quarter millions to the estimate for this year, which, including the money he is about to borrow, is thirty-five and a quarter millions. That is surely a war expenditure in time of peace. As regards the Expenditure of the past year, there are only two items, apparently, on which there has been an increase. These are the Post Office item and Education. In regard to the Post Office expenditure, in so far as it has been one to improve the conditions of service of the employees, to give increased wages to the servants of the Department, I am sure this House will feel no desire to criticise the increase. But so far as it is due to costly and unprofitable expenditure, I quite agree with the sentiment which has been previously expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he said he intended to "hang on to the surplus" from the Post Office. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman and his successor—whoever he may be—will maintain this idea, for we must remember that probably this is the form of taxation which is most easily paid, and which weighs lightest upon the community at large ; and when right hon. Gentlemen desire to give away that surplus, we must not forget that we have sunk sixteen millions in the Telegraph Service, from which we do not receive a single sixpence a year. With regard to education, we must all agree that it is hard on a Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should have had to provide this money for a principle which in former years he greatly deplored—the establishment of free schools. But I think the Committee would feel better satisfied if we were quite clear that this greatly-increased expenditure were being carried out with full regard to the increased efficiency of our national education. I am somewhat afraid that this money is being shovelled out wholesale to the voluntary schools; and that it is becoming, as we feared it might, a relief to the subscribers rather than an assistance to the efficiency of our elementary schools. But the real question in regard to the Budget seems to be whether the right hon. Gentleman has or has not over-estimated his Revenue for the coming year. That is, perhaps, a matter of greater interest to his successor than to himself; but I was somewhat surprised at the large share of personal responsibility which he took upon himself in relation to these Estimates. I think he took a much larger share of responsibility in regard to these Estimates than has usually been the case with Budget speeches in the past. This is not reassuring, for the right hon. Gentleman has, in his former Estimates, been singularly unfortunate; and in his speech the other day he dwelt with the most childlike glee on the fact that during the past year he had had more than one item within a small sum of his actual estimate. The question really is whether the right hon. Gentleman has not over-estimated his Revenue for the coming year, and whether, under these circumstances, his estimate is a real and genuine one. For the coming year his estimate of tax revenue is only a quarter of a million less than that actually received last year. But the Committee will remember that the coming year will receive four days less of revenue than the past year, that trade is bad, that there are many disputes going on between capital and labour, that railway profits are falling off, and that there is a great deal of cattle disease and distress in the agricultural districts. Though, no doubt,

there was a great temptation to the right hon. Gentleman to cut his coat according to his cloth, I think he has made an over-sanguine estimate, and that we shall find ourselves with a deficit at the end of the year. But, be that as it may, the right hon. Gentleman will admit that his minute surplus has been due to two wind-falls. The first due to the checking of the system of "grogging," which might have happened any other year, which will produce the exact amount of the surplus; and the second due to the fact that the Treasury have altered the system of stating our public accounts, without consulting, as we think they should have done, the Committee specially interested in those matters, by which the right hon. Gentleman receives a quarter more of the extra receipts in this year—namely, £230,000, which is more than the surplus he has at his disposal. I am not going now to consider whether the surplus is a genuine one or not, but we all know that while he has a surplus of £200,000 he is going to borrow £2,000,000 during the coming year. On paper the Government have escaped a deficit during their last year of office; and I think it would have been somewhat ignominious if so great a financial authority as the right hon. Gentleman had so piled up his liabilities and so dissipated his resources, that in his last year of office in this Parliament he should have been landed in a deficit. I do not wish to deal further with the financial results of the past year, as the figures are small and of no very great importance; but I think on this occasion—the last Session of this Parliament, and, without any special reference to the right hon. Gentleman, we may hope the last year of this Administration—we may devote a short time to the consideration of the financial policy of the right hon. Gentleman during the five years he has held his present distinguished office. Perhaps he will allow me to say as regards his great operation on the Debt that I do not think any hon. Member will do anything except give him the fullest possible credit for that operation. It was boldly conceived and cleverly executed, and was simple and successful. It is true, too, the Conversion was somewhat above the real credit of the country; and one envies those who preferred cash to "Goschens"; but the right hon. Gentleman undoubtedly carried through the scheme in a masterly and successful manner. I think, also, as regards the bulk of his dealings with taxation, apart from the mode in which the money has been obtained, and the question whether there might not have been a larger remission of indirect taxation, we shall all admit to have been satisfactory. It is true the right hon. Gentleman came to grief over the Sugar Bounties, over the Wheel and Van Tax, and also on the question of the Publicans' Endowment Bill; and he coquetted with protection over sugar and bottled wines. But so far as the House allowed the right hon. Gentleman to enlarge the area of taxation, he did so in a wise and satisfactory way, by the imposition of certain new Stamp Duties, the imposition of an Estate Duty, and a Duty on Sparkling Wines. The increase of taxation was very much on the same lines. He increased some Stamp Duties, the Succession Duty, and the Duties on Spirituous Liquors. As regards his reductions—though we have thought he might have devoted larger sums to the reduction of indirect taxation instead of giving all his balance to the Income Tax—we are, on the whole, fully ready to admit that they have been satisfactory. The reductions on tea—probably a further step towards its final abolition—on tobacco, and on currants, and in a different category, the reduction of the Income Tax have, no doubt, been carried out in a satisfactory way. We hear a great deal about these reductions, and the right hon. Gentleman takes great credit to himself for the way in which he has carried them through; but it should not be forgotten that while he has reduced the annual taxation to the extent of some £3,500,000, he has done so almost entirely at the expense of the service of the National Debt, because he has reduced the sum devoted to that service annually by £3,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends claim great credit for that which has primarily enabled these reductions to be made—namely, the improved trade and the elasticity of the Revenue;

but I, for one, do not understand how the action of the right hon. Gentleman or his financial policy has had anything to do with the revived trade, or the elasticity of the Revenue which the country has enjoyed for a period. He has not carried out any fiscal reforms like those in the old days—giving liberty to trade, and so improving trade and commerce. He has carried through no financial reforms which have in any sense given elasticity to the Revenue. If he claims credit for this improved trade, however, will he be prepared to take the discredit, so far as there is any, of the fact that at the present moment trade is falling off, and the Revenue becoming inelastic? But we know very well that it is not the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which affects these things; they come in cycles, and we are now, I am afraid, in a period in which we shall suffer for some time from bad trade; but that is quite irrespective of the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, just as good trade has been in no way due to his action. In one matter the right hon. Gentleman has failed to fulfil the financial promises he made. He told us on more than one occasion he would deal with the great question of the Death Duties—would simplify, equalise, and reform them. But he has done nothing of the sort. What he has done in connection with them has been to make them, perhaps, more complicated than they were before, and more difficult for any Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with in the future. Instead of equalising the Death Duties between personalty and realty, he has thrown a considerably heavier burden on personalty as compared with realty. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but it appears from the Statistical Abstract that while he has increased by Succession Duty the burden on realty by £130,000 a year, and by the Estate Duty by £10,000 or £20,000 a year, making a total of £150,000, he has at the same time increased the burden on personalty by £800,000. We do not object to that increase, but what we do object to is that he should have made the proportions between personalty and realty more unequal than they were before. I should have been glad to have given the right hon. Gentleman credit for the fact that by his imposition of the Estate Duty, by his alterations of the House Duty, he had introduced the principle of graduated taxation. But the right hon. Gentleman denies that soft impeachment. The real blot on the right hon. Gentleman's financial policy has been his dealings with the National Debt, apart from the question of conversion. Mr. Lowe once said that the Sinking Fund was a thing made to be robbed, and the right hon. Gentleman has on two occasions reduced the effectiveness of that Fund, and evaded the principle that within the fixed charge every farthing of saving should go to the further reduction of Debt. The right hon. Gentleman has done this without cause; he had not the excuse which his predecessors had in 1885—great war expenses; or in 1860—carrying through great fiscal reforms. He did it practically in order to reduce the Income Tax. He boasts that he has paid off a large amount of National Debt, but that is only a part of the question as regards the Debt. The policy and the financial courage of a Chancellor of the Exchequer lie not so much in the amount of the Debt annually redeemed, as in the amount of the annual charge deliberately proposed in the Budget, and applied for the whole service of the Debt apart from the question of its component parts. Judged by that standard the right hon. Gentleman can be shown to have greatly failed in appreciating the national importance of reducing the Debt. If we take the years usually quoted for purposes of comparison in this House, 1880-1 to 1884-5, and the years 1887-8 to 1891-2, we find that while during their five years of office his predecessors applied to the service 145 millions sterling, the right hon. Gentleman in his five years of office has only applied 127 millions to the same purpose, showing a difference of 18 millions in favour of his predecessors. The right hon. Gentleman, in his present Budget speech, gave us an interesting and careful comparison of the financial position of our forefathers 50 years ago and the position at present—and it would be very interesting to the House

if the right hon. Gentleman would give us a Return showing on what basis those figures were founded. He showed that while the population was much less, the consumption per head was very much more nowadays. In those days the country was suffering from a fiscal system which hampered and almost destroyed trade, while now we have practically no import duties which seriously affect trade. But our forefathers were prepared to bear an annual burden of 29½ millions for the service of the National Debt; while the right hon. Gentleman, who has always thanked heaven that he was not as other financiers, but more courageous, is unwilling to propose a larger burden than 25 millions a year for the National Debt. We ought also to recollect that while we are reducing the Debt, and, therefore, the amount applied to its reduction, we are increasing our local liabilities by leaps and bounds. No doubt that is a profitable expenditure; but in looking at this matter we should take our whole national liabilities into account, and not merely the National Debt, in considering the annual burden of the ratepayers and taxpayers of the country. The right hon. Gentleman claims that he has redeemed a larger amount of Debt in spite of these reductions. Even in bulk it is not a fact that he has redeemed a larger amount of Debt in his five years than did his predecessors in their five years. From the great National Debt Return I find that the reduction of Debt in the earlier five years was thirty-five and a half millions, and in the latter five years thirty-two and a half millions; and, in addition, we should allow two and three-quarter millions gift to India in the former period, and three millions for Conversion purposes in the latter. The upshot is that the right hon. Gentleman has reduced the Debt by three millions less than his predecessors.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Which Return is it the hon. Gentleman is quoting from?

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The latest Return moved for by the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), and the last year from the right hon. Gentleman's Budget speech. I will give the totals again. The gross reduction by the right hon. Gentleman has been thirty-two and a half millions, and three millions cost of the Conversion. His predecessors' gross reduction was thirty-five and a half millions, besides two and three-quarter millions gift to India. It is not enough, however, for the right hon. Gentleman to say that he has paid off as much as his predecessors, because by the operation of our Terminable Annuities and the Sinking Fund, a Chancellor of the Exchequer succeeding another, without even lifting a finger or imposing a sixpence of taxation, should pay off a far larger amount within the Sinking Fund than his predecessors did. I have taken the trouble to add up the amount applied to interest and maintenance during the former five years, as compared with the five years of the right hon. Gentleman, and I find that in the first five years fifteen millions more so applied than during the right hon. Gentleman's five years. That means that without any action of his own he ought to have reduced the Debt by fifteen millions more than his predecessors. Further, in regard to this matter, we ought to consider primarily the amount of reduction which the right hon. Gentleman and his predecessors deliberately provided for and anticipated in their Budgets, and not the amount of realised surplus which is made up by chance, due to savings in other Departments, or to miscalculation of Revenue by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; on neither of which two heads can the Chancellor of the Exchequer claim credit for forethought. If you deal with the matter in that way you will find that the right hon. Gentleman provided in his Budget for a reduction of the Debt to the extent of only 21½ millions, while his predecessors provided for no less than thirty-five millions, so that the right hon. Gentleman provided for over thirteen millions less than his predecessors. The upshot is that while elastic revenue has very much helped the reduction of Debt by producing large surpluses, that has been not in consequence, but in spite, of the action of the right hon. Gentleman. And when we shall feel the evil results of the action of the right hon. Gentleman is not when Revenue is elastic, but when trade has fallen, when Revenue has become inelastic, and when the estimates of revenue are more accurate than they have been during the last few years. And one is afraid that, as the right hon. Gentleman has reduced the Sinking Fund when he had a large surplus and there was no occasion to do it, it will be a great precedent and temptation to his successors to further reduce the service of the Debt when they find trade falling and the Revenue becoming inelastic. The right hon. Gentleman has, on the one hand, not only reduced the Debt service to enable him to remit taxation, but he has been spreading his liabilities over considerable periods in order to avoid increasing taxation on the other hand. I will not enter into that point at present, as the right hon. Gentleman below me will certainly deal with it. I only want to point out this in regard to the matter of spreading liabilities over long periods; the right hon. Gentleman is what he calls equalising the Expenditure, and he claims that in anticipating the increased Revenue from the Suez Canal shares he is not dealing with money which will come out of taxation, but surely he himself will admit that it is identically the same thing whether you anticipate Revenue to come in a future year or whether you impose taxation for this particular purpose. On the broad question of what has been done in regard to this matter we know that he admitted it in his Budget speech the other day, that while he has had in his Budget at the end of the year certain surpluses he had borrowed five millions sterling which had gone to produce these surpluses. There is only one other point with which I wish to trouble the Committee. The whole question of the dealings of the right hon. Gentleman and the way in which he has mixed up Imperial with Local finance is a very large subject; but it is one which very much, I think, affects the right hon. Gentleman's financial reputation. That is a matter on which I do not desire to enter at the present time; but I think it would be very easy to show that he has in his dealings with local finances, instead of simplifying, complicated all our national system of finance which existed before, and that he has very much embarrassed the free dealings with branches of Imperial Revenue ; so that by his system of ear-marking certain portions of Imperial Revenue for local purposes he has embarrassed the Treasury and has not given liberty to the Local Bodies. But finally, apart from these questions, there is one serious blot on the financial career of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is that he has succeeded, unintentionally of course, in making our national accounts infinitely more complicated than they were in the time of his predecessors. Those of us who have had the misfortune to endeavour to study in any way the mode in which our national accounts are presented to the country know how complicated they are, how very difficult it is to arrive at the figures one desires to find. All I can say is this, that if they were complicated and difficult before, the right hon. Gentleman has made them very much more complicated ; because he has increased the number of funds, he has created all sorts of new accounts, he has taken from the Revenue on the one hand and from the Expenditure on the other hand. Only the other day he made an entire alteration in appropriations in aid of Revenue, which has made it, by comparison between one year and another, almost impossible to arrive at a proper conclusion. The result of his five years of office, as regards this matter at all events, is this : that it is almost impossible to find out what has been the actual operations of the right hon. Gentleman as compared with those of his predecessors except by infinite trouble, and even, I think, with great doubt as to accuracy. Finally, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think in what I have said that I have dealt unfairly with what he has done. I assure him that all of us on this side of the House have a great opinion of the financial ability of the right hon. Gentleman. We have been able to congratulate him, I hope, on those matters in which he has been successful ; but surely it is our duty, if we think that he has gone wrong, to endeavour to point that out in the House. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman himself will claim that he has carried through any great fiscal reform, or, with the exception of the Conversion, any great financial operation ; and we believe that in many of his dealings, both with Debt and taxation, he has dealt with them not in that courageous spirit which we had hoped from his antecedents, but he has dealt with them in some respects in a cowardly and in other respects in a niggardly spirit.

*(5.35.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): As this, we may assume, is the last Budget discussion of this Parliament, I think it would not be right that the financial situation should be passed over altogether without some observations. I think my hon. Friend who has just sat down, in the able speech which he has made, has referred to many matters which are well deserving of the consideration of the House and of the country. I am not going to deal at any length with the subject of the Budget itself. I will not call it a humdrum Budget, certainly not in any term of reproach. If it be a humdrum Budget, that is not the fault of the Chancellor of the Exchequer ; and I would scarcely call it his misfortune, because happy is the Chancellor of the Exchequer who has no surplus ! He has nobody to satisfy, and nobody to tax ; and, therefore, the situation as regards the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a fortunate one. But there are certain features, as my hon. Friend who has just sat down very truly said, with reference to the whole system of the finance of the present Parliament which are, to use no stronger expression, very novel in their character. There are circumstances attending the whole plan of finance of which, I think, very few examples could be found in former times. There may have been discovered precedents for some of the things ; but I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been very learned and very industrious in collecting together so many of the worst examples as he has done, and in condensing them all into a single chapter in a single Administration. He frequently refers to action which has been taken by one side of the House or the other in former times which a certain feeling of reticence prevents one from expressing one's full opinion upon. I would just recall the attention of the House to what the financial situation was when the Chancellor of the Exchequer began his operations. He found himself in possession of what I will not call a surplus of £750,000 in hand. For that I was responsible. The reason why I will not call it a surplus is because it was the result of a suspension of the Sinking Fund in consequence of temporary pressure caused by the Soudan War. We had to suspend, not permanently, but for that crisis and emergency, the amount of the Sinking Fund to that extent. That money was replaced by the yield of taxation; and, therefore, what happened was that the whole amount which was intended to be devoted to the payment of the Debt was so devoted. The old Sinking Fund—that is, the realised surplus—replaced what was taken from the new Sinking Fund. As I am old-fashioned in this matter, where you suspend payment of a debt and then replace that suspension I do not call it a surplus—I call it an equilibrium. And I ask leave to apply the same principle, which seems to me a sound principle, to the finances of the present Parliament. Now, the view that the Chancellor of the Exchequer took in 1887 of the prospect before him was not a cheerful one. On the contrary, at that time it was very despondent. We all remember the very able speech he made, one-half of which was taken up in trying to prove that the produce of taxation had not only been stagnant but, in fact, decreasing. He gave the most unfavourable anticipations of the produce of the Excise, of the produce of Stamps, and especially of the produce of the Income Tax. And the Committee will remember that it was upon that gloomy anticipation of the future before him that he founded, and that he justified, what I must always consider the mischievous operation of the suspension of the Sinking Fund. He said that Sir Stafford Northcote, he was sure, would have taken the same view as he did, because when the fixed charge of twenty-eight millions was settled the Income Tax was then twopence and there was an abundant Revenue. I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer did justice to the memory of Sir Stafford Northcote in that respect, because Sir Stafford Northcote had to face a great deal worse position than that which the right hon. Gentleman encountered. The Income Tax, which was twopence when Sir Stafford Northcote established the Sinking Fund, was raised by himself to sixpence in order to maintain the Sinking Fund. There had been for three years in succession a deficit of, I think, upwards of two millions a year; and in spite of that Sir Stafford Northcote maintained the Sinking Fund that he had provided for the liquidation of the Debt in the future; and, therefore, if any justification is to be had in this matter the right hon. Gentleman cannot find it in the example or administration of Sir Stafford Northcote. It is perfectly true that when the great charges came upon the country in consequence of the Soudan War, my right hon. Friend, who is unfortunately absent abroad, the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), would have had to borrow money, or to suspend the Sinking Fund for a single year—he took the latter course, as a temporary measure to meet a temporary exigency. That is a totally different thing from a permanent suspension which is to operate in the future. Sir Stafford Northcote raised the Income Tax in order to maintain the Sinking Fund; the right hon. Gentleman destroys the Sinking Fund in order to lower the Income Tax. That is just the difference between the financial policy of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer and that of former Conservative Chancellors of the Exchequer. The Sinking Fund is practically a capital fund; and if you are to reduce taxation out of capital you introduce a principle of finance which has never yet been approved of or acted upon by Finance Ministers of this country; and that was the policy adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the very commencement of the present Parliament. He did it upon the assumption and upon the averment that the Revenue was permanently depressed, and that there was likely to be no improvement. Fortunately for himself and the country he was in error.

If he will allow me to say so, he was splendidly mistaken, because having founded his attack upon the Sinking Fund upon the prospect of a reduced Revenue, he found himself, to use his own picturesque phrase, on an "ascending curve." Every one of those sources of Revenue of which he had complained as being in an unprosperous condition immediately showed themselves full of elasticity. The Excise increased—unfortunately the House and the country cannot appreciate how much, because in this unhappy muddle of the local taxation and Imperial taxation in which we find the accounts, that is all hid away, and we do not know as regards the Excise how much it is in excess of what it was in the year 1886-87, and how much it is even beyond the high water mark of 1875. In the same way with regard to the Death Duties, the country does not know and cannot see that the Death Duties have been increased by a million, which does not appear on the face of the public accounts; and if I wanted a condemnation of this unhappy muddle of accounts, is it not here? I think it is a most remarkable and novel circumstance that in the very able and very full Budget speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, you cannot find a single statement of the actual produce of the Revenue of this country. It excludes seven millions of money, raised by Imperial taxes, which has been transferred to the Local Funds. I think it is a most unfortunate example of innovation in finance that we should have a Financial Statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer which excludes from view this vast amount, on account of this system of paying over the public Revenue to a body with which we are supposed to have nothing to do, and thus we are without any account of the actual amount of the taxes which have been levied by this House upon the people. That complication, I think, is a very great innovation and a very great misfortune. It is a curious thing that it is only through the extreme courtesy which I have always received from the right hon. Gentleman and the Treasury that I know myself what in the past year has been the actual contribution or payment made from the Exchequer to the Local Bodies. You cannot get it till it appears in the Finance Accounts which will come out some months hence. Well, from the figures I have seen, in spite of the reduction which the right hon Gentleman has made upon tea, tobacco, and currants, I find the yield of the Customs is nearly what it was—about the same as in 1886. The Excise, so far as I can judge, is nearly five millions more; Stamps four millions more—half of which goes to the Local Authorities; and the Income Tax, from which twopence has been taken off, shows only a loss equivalent to the reduction of a penny, while the net revenue of the Post Office shows a gain of a million. Now, I do not complain of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—far from it—because of his gloomy and happily unfounded view of the future that lay before him in 1887—I only hope that his anticipation for the next five years may be as ill-founded as the view he took then. But I call attention to this fact, that it destroys the only justification of the policy which he inaugurated in 1887. His whole case on the Budget of 1887 was that the Revenue was bad, that it was likely to be worse, that it had lost all elasticity. The reason why I desire to call attention to this is to show that, ever since 1887, so far from being in want of money, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been very flush of money; and that, therefore, the policy could not be defended upon the ground that the Revenue was falling. Now, Sir, I want to look at the other side of the account. Was it that he found himself in difficulties in regard to expenditure? Was it that in 1887 he considered there were charges he would have to meet which were beyond those which had fallen on his predecessors? The fact was just the reverse. In the same Budget speech in which he anticipated a falling Revenue the right hon. Gentleman congratulated himself and the country on the fact that the Expenditure of the future would be less than that of the past. He attributed that to the ample—he suggested the more than an ample—provision that had been made by his predecessors for the Naval and Military Establishments of the country. There has been so much misrepresentation upon this subject that I must ask the leave of the Committee for a few minutes to make that perfectly clear. In order that we may not be in error in that matter, I would read the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech in 1887. He called attention to the high charge which had been made for the Navy. He said—

“Let us hope it may be an extra charge, and not a permanent charge. This extra charge is due to that which is commonly known as the Naval scare of November, 1884”—

He does not talk quite so much now of the Naval scare of 1888—

“And if I call it a Naval scare, I do so without intending to imply either that it was justified or that it was not justified. I simply refer to it as an historical event. In that year the House agreed to an extra expenditure for the Navy of £3,100,000 on ships, and £1,600,000 on armaments. But I believe it is not infrequently the case that such Estimates expand during the course of their being worked out. In this case the Estimate for ships expanded to £3,600,000; and when the Authorities of the time had to deal with the armaments, it was found that the Estimate had not included the necessary amount for new ammunition, and that involved a further sum of £500,000.”

Now, it is in this very speech that the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that the future and present Estimates will be largely diminished. I have shown what the right hon. Gentleman's anticipation was in reference to revenue. I will now show what was his anticipation in regard to expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman went on:

“So that we may look forward, I trust, to the fact that at the end of this financial year we shall have arrived at a great diminution of the necessary charge which has been made upon the taxpayers owing to these exceptional circumstances; and there is good reason to hope that the time is not far distant when the Naval Estimates will not require to be swollen by exceptional items such as those which have fallen so heavily upon the taxpayers during the past few years.”

That was the exceptional expenditure of the Government that preceded the right hon. Gentleman's Government. Then, having referred to all these matters, he goes on to say—

“The Estimate for the Navy is £12,478,000, as against £13,265,000—a decrease, I am happy to say, of £788,000.”

Well, then, having noticed the whole of these circumstances, let us compare them with the anticipation which he confidently held out that in consequence of the lavish expenditure of his predecessors upon the Navy, there would be a large diminution in the Naval expenditure of the future. The Government that prepared the Estimates had been in office then for more than six months, though the right hon. Gentleman himself had not been in office all that time. I have other authorities upon that subject besides the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In November of that year, 1886, the First Lord of the Admiralty said—

That was the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty. And that was not merely a rash opinion hazarded by a neophyte in office; for I find that on 13th December, 1888, the First Lord of the Admiralty said—

“At no period of our Naval history during a time of peace has there been so steady and continuous an increase as in the last three years.”

Two of these were years in which his predecessors were in office. He went on to say—

“But I do not wish to take credit for having completed this large number of ships, the main credit of which is due to Lord Northbrook.”

Do not let it be said, then, that the Government found themselves in any difficulty in consequence of arrears in the Establishments of the country due to the neglect and laches of their predecessors. In July, 1887, the First Lord of the Admiralty, who had then been a year in office, said—

“I have never said that the Navy Estimates could not be reduced, and the Navy Estimates of this year show a reduction of £800,000 as compared with last year. I said in my memorandum that I was satisfied that for years to come there could be a steady reduction of expenditure.”

That was the view of the First Lord of the Admiralty. His opinion was that in consequence of the extra work done by his predecessors he could afford to economise in the future. Now, I will carry it still a year further. In the Financial Statement in explanation of the Naval Estimates for 1888-89 I find the

First Lord of the Admiralty says this—

“In describing last year the then position of Naval Finance, I pointed out that, owing to the exceptionally large outlay of the last three years, it would be possible for some years to come to associate a reduction of expenditure with an increase of naval efficiency.”

And then he says—

“The experience gained since last year and the opportunities afforded during that time of making a close and accurate comparison between the strength of the Navy and that of foreign nations confirm my previous statement that our relative superiority is undoubted.”

Therefore, in consequence of what had been done by Lord Northbrook, which the right hon. Gentleman only completed, in his own opinion great and progressive reduction of expenditure might take place, because his predecessors had established the unquestionable superiority of our Navy over that of all European countries. In consequence of that opinion the present Government reduced the Navy Estimates in the first year by £800,000, and in the next year by, I think, £905,000. Now, I have alluded to that because this matter has been grossly misrepresented in the country. I hope that these citations will put an end to those misstatements. I saw an extraordinary speech made by the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) in which he denied that sufficient provision had been made, and maintained that we had left great arrears which they were obliged to make up in their expenditure. I have now endeavoured to recall the attention of the Committee to the condition of things in 1887, in order to show that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was beginning an unbroken career of prosperous Revenue; that he and his colleagues certainly did not consider, down to 1889, that they would have any call for increased expenditure, especially upon the Navy. They recorded, on the contrary, the fact that the provision made by their predecessors would justify them in making large reductions, which reductions, in point of fact, they made in two successive years. Therefore, I may say that the right hon. Gentleman has been a Chancellor of the Exchequer in clover during the whole time of his administration. He has had good fortune; we all know he has great ability, and he has been able to accomplish, as my hon. Friend who has just sat down has justly and properly admitted, many things which are advantageous to the country. He has reduced the Income Tax, the Tea Duty, the Tobacco Duty, the Currant Duty, and the House Duty; and he has been able to give the country the benefit of free education. I desire, before I go into any criticism upon the other side, fairly and frankly to put forward these matters as things for which the Chancellor of the Exchequer deserves credit, both on account of his good fortune and for the ability with which he availed himself of it. That is not all. He has carried through the great operation of the Conversion of the Debt. He had the good fortune when he came into office to find Consols at a very high price—they were at 101 before Conversion. I shall have a word to say, if the Committee will give me leave, upon that subsequently, because there is a per contra in that matter; but I am only referring to it now as one of the things for which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a right to take credit. Well, all these things gave him immense advantages. He had a great Revenue, and in consequence of his conversion of the Debt he had a diminished charge upon that Revenue. I draw from these premises this conclusion—that never was there a Chancellor of the Exchequer who had less object, less excuse, less justification for breaking down the Sinking Fund. People in necessity sometimes do strange things, but for a man in the condition of prosperity in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer found himself for five years to have struck a fatal blow, and a permanent blow, at the provision for the liquidation of the Debt is a transaction which the House will wonder at and which posterity will condemn, because, after all, it is the future that will suffer for it. My hon. Friend has said that it is an example which is very difficult to resist. “If these things are done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry?” If a Chancellor of the Exchequer, in days of prosperity such as have not been known for the last fifteen years, performs tricks of that kind upon the finances of the country, what will you expect shall be done in times when a Chancellor of the Exchequer does not know where to look to make both ends meet? These are the things that we have to deal with in looking at what we may call the moral as well as the financial aspects of this matter. It is not merely that the right hon. Gentleman has broken down the provision for the payment of the Debt incurred in the past; but in this period of exceptional prosperity he has piled up new Debt which he expects future Parliaments to liquidate. I am bound to say I think that is very novel, and not very laudable, finance. I have spoken of the invasion of the Sinking Fund, not to meet a temporary necessity, as it has been suspended before, for a single year. I might compare this with the policy of the Government in other respects. In old days, when it was necessary to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, it was usual to suspend it for a single year; and so with reference to the Sinking Fund. If a necessity arose for suspending it, it was suspended for a single year; but just as you permanently suspend by your Coercion Act the ordinary law, so here, when with or without—(An hon. MEMBER: Order!)—when the hon. Member has done I will proceed—so here you proceed, not to suspend the Sinking Fund for any special object, but to suspend it permanently, and deprive the future of the benefit of the system which was established. With an increased Revenue and with a diminished Expenditure this has been done. Now, what has been the effect of that? The whole basis of Sir Stafford Northcote's plan was that the Sinking Fund supplied a cumulative source for the liquidation of the Debt. It was not to be a fixed amount applied every year—it was to be an increasing amount as the charge diminished. It was an arithmetical progression which was to have had, and would have had, if it had been left alone, a great and increasing effect upon the reduction of the Debt. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has destroyed the cumulative character of that provision. He says he has been paying off as much as was paid before; but that was not the principle of Sir Stafford Northcote's Sinking Fund, which contemplated that in every year each succeeding Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to have paid off a great deal more than was paid off by his predecessors. Sir Stafford Northcote established a fixed charge of £28,000,000. At that time the interest on the Debt, as you will find if you will look in Column 6, Part 2, of the Debt Return, which gives the net interest payable, was £23,000,000. That left a margin of £5,000,000 for the liquidation of the Debt. But to-day what is the interest? The net interest payable during the past year—I have got these figures by the kindness of the Treasury—is £18,500,000, as against the £23,000,000 which Sir Stafford Northcote had to pay. What is it then to say, "I am paying off £5,000,000 as my predecessors did"? It is quite plain that, if you had left that system unbroken and undestroyed, you would have paid off nearly £10,000,000. You have ruined the system, because you have broken down the cumulative principle upon which it was founded. Now, in one sense, of course, this payment of the Debt is automatic. It is neither to the credit of a Chancellor of the Exchequer how much he pays, nor is it to his discredit. It is fixed, and if he will only leave it alone it works itself. That system of the liquidation of the Debt has been destroyed by the deliberate and wilful act of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in destroying the cumulative principle, and that is done during a period of almost unequalled prosperity. He says he has paid off as much in the four or five years of his administration, which have been taken for comparison, as was done by the previous Government in four or five years of their administration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have had some discussion on that subject. I am not going again to deal in detail with those figures. I have them here, and if you choose to look at the Third Appendix of the Debt Return you will find them. It is an old controversy; the Chancellor of the Exchequer claims to bring in certain assets to the account which I do not consider are properly payments of the Debt. If you will look at the reduction of the Debt for the four years 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885, and compare it with the four years 1888, 1889, 1890, and 1891, you will find, as a fact, that in the four years of the first period, there was nearly £2,000,000 more paid off than in the four years of the second period. But, as I say, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could prove that he had paid off £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 more it would not prove anything, because he ought to have paid off much more in consequence of the increased resources that he had at his disposal. How has this operated upon the reduction, because that is the important thing, of the liabilities of the State? You will find, also, in the Debt Return the comparison of the net liabilities of the State at various periods. In the year 1887, a year for which I was responsible, just before the Chancellor of the Exchequer came into office, the net liabilities of the State, you will find, were reduced by £6,658,000. This year, according to the figures supplied to me, they have been reduced by £5,300,000. That is to say, in fact, that in the year before he came into Office, the net liabilities were reduced by £1,300,000 more than they were in the year which has just concluded. That is the result of the system of finance which he has established. But that is not all. It was not only that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had an increasing Revenue; it was not only that he had a diminishing charge on him for the interest on the Debt, but he possessed, in the earlier part at least of his administration, what are called surpluses. I know there is a great deal of ignorant talk outside on this point, as though a surplus were a feather in the cap of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is just as much a feather in the cap of any man to get a windfall which he does not expect and which he does not calculate upon. But the principle of the finance of this country has always been to ask from the people in the form of taxes only what you want for the needs of the year; and if you take more than you want, why that is nothing to boast of.

It is a pardonable miscalculation of the produce of the Revenue. I do not blame the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having a surplus, because error is always possible, and if it is on the right side so much the better. But with reference to his Estimate of Revenue for the coming year upon which the surplus depends, my hon. Friend who has just spoken and my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) have alluded to that. We who have had some Treasury experience were a little surprised to find the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of himself as being the person who made the Estimates. I know my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian has very strong opinions upon that point—that the Estimates of Revenue ought not to be regarded as the personal opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would be extremely dangerous if it were so. One of the great securities for the permanent financial administration of this country is that these Estimates are made by the permanent officials of the Revenue and of the Treasury, who act upon certain fixed principles and the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not vouch his own personal opinions and judgment as the main guide in the formation of those Estimates. I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not mean to put it in that way [Mr. GOSCHEN: Hear, hear]!; but certainly in his Budget speech I think he seemed—I have no doubt from an anxiety which I perfectly recognise on his part—to take a little more responsibility upon himself in this matter than is usually done. I do not attempt to question the Estimates of Revenue of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I think that is a very rash thing to do, for he has much better means of information than anyone else can have in the matter; and pointing, as he did, to the future, I only hope that he may be as happily mistaken in his prognostications of a less prosperous future as he was in the year 1887. But now let us see, talking of these surpluses, what is the fund he had at his disposal. I have shown you how he had an increasing Revenue and how he had a diminished charge and a lowered Expenditure. During the six years from 1887 to 1892 he had surpluses amounting to £8,000,000, and in the previous six years there were surpluses amounting only to £1,600,000. The consequence was that he had a lump sum of £6,500,000 to dispose of to his advantage out of these surpluses as compared with his predecessors. Then he had this other advantage to which I have already alluded—he had so much less to pay in interest on the Debt. I have got the figures here, but I will not trouble the Committee with the details. For the six years from 1881 to 1886 we had to pay £129,000,000 in interest upon the Debt; he had to pay during his six years only £119,000,000. This was owing to a diminished interest—due in great part to his own Conversion, and I thoroughly recognise and admit that; but I am going to ask how it was disposed of. He had the money, from whatever source it came. As against our 129 millions he had only 119 millions to pay. That is to say that on that head he had an advantage of ten millions. Therefore, putting his surpluses at seven millions, and his diminished charges for Debt at ten millions, he had seventeen millions of money to deal with out of these two sources. Now these are things which, in addition to the other advantages to which I have referred, placed him in an exceptionally favourable position. Again, I say, in spite of all this, he diminished the Sinking Fund by three millions, and this three millions a year would give him something like fifteen millions more, in addition to the seventeen millions to which I have just referred. I have made these remarks with reference to the dealings with the Debt, but I now come to the other head. What has he done with reference to the future in respect of new Debt; because we have to ask ourselves what has this Parliament done in its period of prosperity with respect to the future Parliament, which, according to the prognostications of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is likely to have darker days? If the Chancellor of the Exchequer is right we are now on a descending curve. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us we have arrived at an epoch of stagnation, and we may probably see a period of diminution of Revenue. He went into very elaborate and interesting calculations as to which of the taxes gave way first, and he made provision this year only for the first head of defalcation. He made it clear that he thought it was probable there would be a greater decline on other heads of Revenue in the future. In what position has he left the future Parliament to meet these less favourable circumstances? First of all, as I pointed out, he has paid off less Debt in that period than he ought to have paid if he had maintained the Sinking Fund. The future Parliament will have to pay the interest of this fifteen millions, which would be something under half a million. Then there is the lump sum of new Debt which he has accumulated, and which will have to be paid by the next Parliament. Now what is that lump sum? I defy any ordinary man, or indeed any extraordinary man for that matter, to find out from the public accounts what it is the Chancellor of the Exchequer has borrowed, and what it is he is going to borrow. We have every possible sort of document. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has been at some pains to ascertain what had been borrowed. We have had an Estimate put upon the Table of what was going to be borrowed. Then you find after that that a million or a million and a half or two millions less has been borrowed. This is stated in this Return. Why? Because the work had not been done. The whole demand for these extraordinary financial arrangements was founded upon the notion of the necessity of doing the work immediately, and now I understand with regard to the contracts for ships they are about a year behindhand, and the money has not been borrowed because the work has not been done. We have had an Estimate for what is to be done this year, and we are told it differs by something like a million from the Estimate of the work to be done which was made last September. Every month, certainly every quarter, the Estimate of what you are going to borrow changes. Under the old system when you paid your way within the year it was totally different. But in the present system when you are running on your accounts into future years you cannot tell what is to be borrowed and what is not. The only ground on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer defended this policy was that the work was to be accomplished within five years. It is quite plain now that it will not be accomplished in five years. Well, I thought from these papers of Estimates which we have had that we were going to get some information upon the point. But this is what I gather from a Return which has just been given to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, showing the net estimated expenditure for the year 1892-93 on the Army and Navy. You will find there £650,000 to be advanced to the Army; you will find £471,000 to be advanced to the Navy, £1,441,000 being the total advance. I was very much puzzled by these figures, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he was going to borrow two millions. Then there is a note which, I think, will puzzle many people—

“The amount of savings on Shipbuilding and Armament Votes of prior years, . . . which will probably be required for dockyard work in 1892-93, is £375,000, and as the savings have been temporarily applied to contract shipbuilding purposes, the borrowing under the Naval Defence Act, 1889, may have to be increased by that amount.”

I read that over many times, but I could not make it out. It appears to be what they call in France virement, and it comes to this: Five years ago they borrowed £500,000 from the Dockyard Account, and applied it to the Contract Ship Account. Now they are going to borrow money on contract account in order to pay that £500,000 back again to the Shipbuilding Fund. If we have the public accounts dealt with in that way, no wonder people cannot make out how much you borrow, or how much you intend to borrow. And when you take the Treasury's own documents, and state what they have borrowed and what they are going to borrow, they say, “What ignoramuses you are. You assume the figures given you are right. Nothing of the kind. We have not done the work we said we would do; we have not borrowed the money we intended to borrow, and you are going about deceiving people.” But our only deception consists in the citation of the Government Returns. I confess, though I have moved for account after account—and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford has done the same—I should despair of forming any opinion whatever of what the Government have borrowed, or what they intend to borrow; but, happily, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—though it does not appear in the public accounts—gave us two simple figures, which I will take for granted, though I cannot reconcile them to any one of the accounts presented. He said he has borrowed five millions, and he intends borrowing two millions this year. That is correct?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then I am very glad to know it. It is quite unnecessary to understand the accounts of the Navy or of the Army, or any of the other accounts which are laid before the House. You have got half a dozen new accounts—the Australian Account, the Imperial Defence Account, the Naval Defence Account, and the Barracks Account—each with a separate and complicated system of liquidation, and all of which have one object, and that is to throw the payment on future years. The thing is so wrapped up that how much is thrown upon future years, or how much has been liquidated in the past I do not know, and I defy anyone to discover. However, now at last we have something definite on which we may rely. The Government have already borrowed five millions, and they are going to borrow two millions this year, and that is what the next Parliament will have to liquidate. That is what Dives leaves for Lazarus to pay. That is the finance we are asked to admire. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said we are to be much poorer in the future than in the past; and in order to console us for that situation, he leaves us seven millions of money, which in his time of prosperity he has not chosen to pay. Then he says, “Oh, you will have the Suez Canal shares,” and he is very proud of the success of the Suez Canal investment. Well, many a man at a gambling table is extremely glad that his coup has come off, but very often he is ultimately ruined by it. I take it, however, the money is procured, it is a very fortunate thing for the future to be able to look forward to this resource to meet bad times. If the times are bad there ought to be £500,000 or £600,000 to come in; but then we shall be told, "Oh, yes, but the last Parliament anticipated that, and although you have got bad times you cannot get any benefit from that for four years." The whole of it will be absorbed for that period, and that is not all. You have left on the Consolidated Fund a charge of a million and a half, which will have to be paid up to the year 1896.

MR. GOSCHEN: No; that will be deducted from the seven millions.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes; it goes towards repaying the seven millions. Who are to provide that? The people in 1896.

MR. GOSCHEN: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. The people will not have to pay extra taxes. The taxes are already imposed to pay that. They will be relieved of the £5,000,000.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: They will have to find the money to pay for work that was done in the last five years. I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means by having provided taxes. Now I would observe, in passing, that the £1,500,000 charged for seven years on the Consolidated Fund exactly neutralises the sum which the Chancellor of the Exchequer claims to have saved to the country by his Conversion scheme, and therefore no benefit will be felt from that Conversion so long as that charge of £1,500,000 is maintained—until 1896. But then the right hon. Gentleman says all this has been done for the purpose of providing ships for the Navy. How far are you going to carry that doctrine? I understand it when applied to the case of permanent works—for fortifications, or even for barracks—and that for these we may properly call upon future years to bear a portion of the burden. The distinction is familiar to all of us. But what would you think of a Railway Company which charged the cost of rolling stock to capital account? Such a Company would be regarded as being in a state of extreme financial demoralisation. I hear some hon. Gentlemen laugh. I do not know whether Railway Companies are in the habit of charging their capital account for this purpose—for things which perish in the using. Everybody knows that you have hardly built a ship before the experts, with the Lords of the Admiralty at their head, come to tell you that it is good for nothing. You do not proceed upon this system in the other Departments of the State. If you want sites or buildings for public purposes, or even docks, you charge them to Revenue. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer talks of his surpluses. Now, again, I say it is a very dangerous thing to quarrel about words, and I do not care very much what you call the thing. I always thought a surplus meant a state of account in which your Revenue was larger than your Expenditure. But that is not apparently the new meaning of the word. Up to last year account was rendered only of the ordinary Expenditure; but last year I asked for a Return of the whole Expenditure and the whole Revenue of the year. You had one account called the Public Income and Expenditure, and that showed a surplus of £1,700,000. But when I got my Return I found that the surplus consisted of £1,776,000, which had been borrowed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may call that a surplus; but I do not. Then I have got a Return for this year, which shows a surplus of £1,000,000; and that is obtained by borrowing £1,800,000. In the old days we used to call that a deficit. In the year that is coming we have an estimated surplus of £200,000, with the information that we are going to borrow £2,000,000. This is the position in which we stand with respect to the surpluses. It is a question, I admit, of nomenclature. If you choose to call an excess of Expenditure over Revenue a surplus, and an excess of Revenue over Expenditure a deficit, it comes to the same thing, so long as you understand the terms you employ. If this thing is to be defended on the doctrine of spreading, I feel almost afraid to characterise that doctrine for fear the Chancellor of the Exchequer should accuse me of ferocious purism in finance. But it is not my ferocity that I would refer to. It is that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself in his condemnation of the present system in the person of Sir Stafford Northcote, when he said that Sir Stafford Northcote was guilty of cowardly and flabby finance, because he adopted the plan of spreading the charges which had arisen at the end of the Administration of Lord Beaconsfield. My ferocity is nothing to that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But when we come to compare his finance with that of Sir Stafford Northcote, why the latter's was heroic and Spartan finance as contrasted with that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has adopted under circumstances which, I confess, seem to me to have very little to justify it. What is this £7,000,000 of accumulated borrowing? It is a mere post obit—drawn by this Parliament to be paid in the next. Now, just see where the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be to-day if he had adhered to the principles laid down by Sir Stafford Northcote. He would have been paying £3,000,000 more than he does now to the Sinking Fund. He would not have borrowed £1,000,000 in the year just completed, and he would not have increased the Debt by an increased deficiency of £1,000,000 on the Savings Banks due to his Conversion. Therefore, his finance, as compared with that of Sir Stafford Northcote, is on the wrong side to the extent of £5,000,000. Now, with regard to the surplus of the present year, there is an ambiguity about it which I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to clear up. He proposes to reserve an estimated surplus of £200,000. That is got somehow or other out of the Appropriations in Aid; and without going into the question of principle I thought this was clear, that whatever you lost in one way you gained in the other; and if, on the one hand, you diminished the charge you diminished the Revenue to the same amount. Somehow or other, by a feat of legerdemain, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets £200,000 out of the transaction—that is, I suppose, in consequence of postponed payments.

MR. GOSCHEN: No; it is not postponed payments.

Sir W. Harcourt

*SIR W. HARCOURT: Then I should be glad to have that explained. It is not quite clear. I am glad to hear that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done something to diminish the amount of the Floating Debt, the amount of the diminution being, I understand, £800,000. That is not a large amount having regard to the figure at which the Floating Debt now stands. The Chancellor of the Exchequer lays great stress upon the distinction between the Floating Debt in the hands of the public and the Floating Debt in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners. If that is as important as he supposes, it is a very remarkable circumstance that there is no document which I have ever seen stating the amount of Floating Debt in the hands of the public as distinguished from the Floating Debt in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners. In the Finance Accounts there is no such statement. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has a Bill, as I understand, dealing with this very important matter, by the creation of a book debt. That will be a new account—another complication in the accounts. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the book debt created some years ago by my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian, which, he said, was of a similar character. But so far as I can ascertain, it was of an exactly opposite character. My right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian, having taken a certain amount of money from the Savings Banks in Consols which stood at ninety-two, gave a book debt at par with a view to diminishing the Savings Bank deficiency. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes forward and tells us that his operations for the Conversion have increased the deficiency on the Savings Bank by the amount of £1,000,000. Therefore, whatever may be the merits or the demerits of his plan, it seems to be exactly opposite to that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian. I want now to say one word about the Conversion. I desire to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer full credit not only for his fortune, but for his ability in dealing with that matter; but I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman, whose primary duty is no doubt to look after the interests of the taxpayers, will admit, as every Finance Minister ought to admit, that nothing is more injurious than that the public creditor should feel that he has been hardly used. He depends very much upon the faith which is placed by the public in that great Fund, the Debt of this country. I am convinced that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he assured the fundholder that his Two and Three-Quarter Stock would be worth par, fully believed it, and the holder was induced to believe that Two and Three-Quarter per Cent. Stock for a fixed period would be more valuable than Three per Cent. Stock which was uncertain in respect to Conversion; but it has not turned out to be so. The fact is, that ever since—though I am happy to see that his Consols have been higher during the last few days than they have ever been before—on the whole they have been about five per cent. lower than at the time of the Conversion. Well, of course, that has been a very serious matter; for if you take five per cent. on the amount of £600,000,000 Consols, that has been a loss of £30,000,000 of capital value, besides the loss of interest to the holders of the National Debt. It is not an advantage that Consols should be a less popular investment than they used to be; it weakens the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it weakens, consequently, the public credit. Here, again, comes in the evil of the diminution of the Sinking Fund. If he had kept those £3,000,000 for the Sinking Fund, he would have had £3,000,000 to invest in Consols, and might to a great degree have maintained their value. Many people are of the opinion that the Conversion—admirable and advantageous as it was to the taxpayer—was not of the same advantage to the commercial community, and that a great deal of the wild speculation from which we have suffered so much in the last three years is due to the fact that people, in view of the depression in Consols after their conversion, felt obliged to seek for other investments. And many people are now prevented from investing in Consols by the fear that they might, on the further reduction of interest, fall to an extent equal to, if not greater than, that which has already taken place. Now, to turn to another matter, in how many things are we left in total ignorance with reference to the finances of the country? Look at the condition in which local taxation stands. There are seven millions of money which have been imposed and collected by the State, and what has become of that money—what has been done with it? What purpose has it served? Of that we hear nothing. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has handed over £7,000,000 to the Local Authorities, and he knows nothing and tells us nothing of what has become of it. I think the time has come when we ought to have a Local Taxation Budget, either from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or from the President of the Local Government Board. Who will tell us what has been done with the £7,000,000? We do not know how it has been spent; how far it has reduced the rates, or how much has been lost in the sands of a wasteful expenditure by the people who have received subsidies of this description. If we are to have this policy at all I think that the old subsidy system was much better. It was more honest and straightforward. When the Government assigned a definite sum to a particular purpose we knew what became of the money; but now you pretend it is not an Imperial tax when it is an Imperial tax, and you have established the evil system of one authority raising taxes and another spending them. This is as unsound finance as it is possible to have. The hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton) alluded to a matter which, in my opinion, is of still greater importance. You have tied the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in respect of the resources of the country. Supposing you want money for an emergency, and suppose it is necessary for that purpose to raise the Probate Duty: there is no particular reason why you should give more money to the Local Bodies because there some Imperial emergency has arisen; and yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot raise the Probate Duty without giving half the proceeds to the relief of local rates. In what a position to place that great Tax! With reference to the Excise licences, that source of Revenue has been taken out of your power altogether, however expedient it may be in the future to do so. You have lost the power of dealing with them. I want to know how all this money has been spent. What has become of it? What good has it done? I have endeavoured to show the great resources you have had at your disposal. The legitimate source for the reduction of taxation in my judgment, and I think in the judgment of all people who have dealt with English Finance before, is the increase of Revenue. But your method of reducing taxes has been by expending capital; that is, by suspending the Sinking Fund and accumulating Debt. But having got these resources—having your surpluses, having your diminished charge, having your fixed charge cut down by three millions—what have you done with the money? You have taken from the Revenue, first of all, nearly £5,000,000 for local taxation. Where has that gone? The Minister of Agriculture has told us. It has gone to the owners of real property; they are the people who have had it. (Cries of dissent.) You must find fault with the Minister of Agriculture for the statement, and not with me.

MR. GOSCHEN: You do not believe that.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman says I do not believe it. The right hon. Gentleman himself would not have believed it formerly. He must settle the point with the Minister of Agriculture. When with reminiscences of those very able writings with which we are all familiar we found the Chancellor of the Exchequer expending four millions of money in gifts to the rates, he said that was not a thing in which he himself believed, but that it had been forced upon him by the House of Commons. If you did not believe in it, why did you do it? There is no doubt that a great part at least of the relief of the rates goes to the benefit of the owners of property; that cannot be denied. You have taken £4,500,000 off the Income Tax, and that, with the other item, amounts to nearly £9,000,000; but that relief of taxation has been mainly for the advantage of the wealthier classes. Now, what remission is given to the labouring classes? You have reduced the taxation on tobacco, and tea, and currants, and that remission adds up, I believe, to something like £2,500,000, against the £8,500,000 given to the wealthier classes; but as against the £2,500,000 you have taken off you have imposed by fresh taxation £1,500,000 upon the consumer, upon articles of Excise, upon beer and spirits, in order that £4,500,000 may be given to the owners of property. In point of fact, therefore, you have almost neutralised the relief which you have given to the working classes. It is true you have imposed about £1,000,000 upon Estate Duty, and you have taken off a part of the House Duty. I do not know exactly what class contributes that, but I should think it would be the class which the Chancellor of the Exchequer described in one of his speeches as those who wear black coats—that is, those who are between the wealthy and the poorer and operative classes. That is your distribution of taxation. You may dispute about items of a hundred thousand here and a hundred thousand there; but this I will say, that of the wealth and prosperity which has poured in upon you during the last six years you have given by far the preponderance to the wealthier and not to the poorer classes. These are the main charges which I make against the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But in order that I may deal fairly with him, I will in brief sentences state the proposition I have endeavoured to establish. I think that the policy of the right hon. Gentleman is open to criticism upon these grounds—firstly, that in times of high financial prosperity and with large surpluses, he has without justification broken down the provision for the payment of the National Debt; secondly, that with extraordinary resources at his disposal he has accumulated a debt which he has bequeathed to a future Parliament; thirdly, that his reduction of the charge upon the Converted Debt to the extent of £1,500,000 will be absorbed, at least till 1896, by an equal extra charge imposed upon the Consolidated Fund; fourthly, that in his remission of taxation he has given the balance of advantage to the classes who least required it; and, fifthly, that for the next few years he has forestalled revenue and increased charges in order to relieve a prosperous present at the expense possibly of a far less prosperous future; and the surpluses for the last three years which he has declared are more than countervailed by the obligations he has incurred. It is said that "necessity is the mother of invention;" but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not had the excuse of necessity for his extremely inventive finance. I think it is very much to be regretted that in times of exceptional prosperity the future should have been thus mortgaged without need and without justification.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am at some disadvantage in following the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because I feel some compunction in repeating what I have often said before. Half of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was delivered last year, a portion of it during the year before, and a very large number of the arguments which he has put forward to-day have been submitted during every Budget Debate since I have had the honour to hold my present office. It is curious to note, however, that those arguments have very seldom been followed by a test of the feeling of the House. Most of the propositions which the right hon. Gentleman has laid down might have been voted upon in this House, but they have generally been reserved for platform speeches. The right hon. Gentleman was good enough, at the end of his speech, to sum up the propositions, with which I should have to deal. I am obliged to him, because it is often extremely useful to know the exact points of a long speech; but on this occasion I will admit that I was prepared for the attack and the general review of the right hon. Gentleman, because I have previously seen it in so many forms, both in print and reported in the form of platform utterance. The right hon. Gentleman—I think, perhaps not unfairly—based his repetition of what I may call the various charges that have been brought against us on previous occasions on the ground that we were now probably at the end of this Parliament. Well, I am not ashamed to look back, notwithstanding the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman, on the record of the last six years. Indeed, but for some of the observations at the close of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I should have almost been inclined to say that an impartial observer listening to his speech would have said that he admitted almost as many virtues in my finance as he had found vices in it. He was in general fair in his review of what had been done, and of measures to which he could give his assent; and I am bound to say that, looking to the magnitude of the operations which he applauded, I think the amount with which he found fault would, in the eyes of an impartial observer, scarcely outweigh the merits which he himself acknowledged. I should like to be allowed to follow the right hon. Gentleman through most of the points he has raised, notwithstanding the hour at which I have risen. Let me deal, in the first place, with one point which rather stands by itself; and that is the remarks which he made upon the Conversion. The hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton), stated that there were few persons—that indeed there was scarcely a person in this House—who would find fault with the Conversion. But I think the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) has been from the beginning one of those who have seen in it less advantage to the country than nearly all those who sit on the same Bench with him, and almost every other person in the House and in the country. One can see how little the right hon. Gentleman appreciates the importance of the Conversion when he says that actually for two years the result will be absorbed by the amount that has been put upon the Consolidated Fund to pay for the instalments of the Naval Defence Act.

SIR W. HARCOURT: More than.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, there are only two years to run after this year of the Naval Defence Annuity; and the right hon. Gentleman puts against these two years the permanent reduction of the National Debt. I will ask the right hon. Gentleman, is it not almost a petty point to take to say that the value of the Conversion is diminished because for two years the result will be absorbed? The right hon. Gentleman will remember—

SIR W. HARCOURT: What I said was that the action would neutralise the great and permanent reduction of the Debt.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I do not venture to say more than that it is rather a petty point. It is true to a certain extent, but it is scarcely worthy of the right hon. Gentleman. Well, then, the right hon. Gentleman says, as I have also seen stated elsewhere, that the reduction of the interest on the National Debt has probably had the effect of driving persons into speculative investments. I have seen it stated in a newspaper that it was possible I had done actually more harm than good by reducing the rate of interest from three to two and three-quarters per cent. But suppose that the Conversion attempted by our opponents had succeeded, would not that have had precisely the same effect? They were anxious in those days to reduce the burden of debt upon the taxpayer, but I do not think it entered in the most remote way into the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) that the reduction in the interest on the National Debt might send people into speculation in Argentine investments. That argument has been reserved for the last school of political financiers. Really it is out of respect for the right hon. Gentleman that I deal with the point at all, because to believe that the difference of a quarter per cent. would have the effect of sending people to six and seven per cent. Stocks seem to be quite out of reason and repugnant to ordinary experience. The right hon. Gentleman said that the price of Consols had not turned out as I anticipated. Well, it was not only I who believed that Consols would ultimately, after a certain period, rise to par; but the great majority of persons anticipated it—the bankers and the great body of public opinion thought the policy was a wise one, and supported it as such. The Committee will remember that Consols have suffered during this time not only from the reduction of interest, but also from the Baring crisis and because of difficulties in the City, and also on account of the changes which the Legislature has thought fit—I doubt whether very wisely—to make in the enactments with reference to trusts, and which have permitted many trustees to invest in other securities contrary to the avowed intention of testators. I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that these things must have seriously affected Consols, which, however, now stand at nearly ninety-eight. The temporary causes which affected them having been removed, I should not be surprised if the prognostications of those who accepted the Conversion were ultimately fulfilled. But I venture to deny in the strongest way that any national disadvantages have followed the Conversion. I do not think the public credit has in any way been shaken by the proceeding. Then the right hon. Gentleman placed in contrast the remissions of taxation which we have made to various classes of the community, and he said that we had given four millions to the wealthy class, and about four millions to the owners of land.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said real property.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Well, on real property. I do ask this Committee whether it is fair in the first instance to treat the whole of the sum which is remitted in Income Tax as a reduction in favour of the wealthy class; whether it is fair in a right hon. Gentleman holding the position he does in that way to hold up the payers of Income Tax as if there was a conflict between their interests and those of the working classes? Amongst the payers of Income Tax are a large number of men, and women too, belonging to the poorer middle class who are as straitened in their circumstances as are many of the working classes themselves. No doubt the reduction of Income Tax does assist the wealthy; but besides that it assists a class who have had a claim upon the justice of this House, and a class who have generally on every emergency been called upon to pay whatever other classes have been exempt from contributing. I do consider from every point of view that a reduction of the Income Tax from 8d., at which it stood in time of peace, to 6d. was imperatively demanded at the hands of this House. But then the right hon. Gentleman says that there are four millions which we have given to the benefit of real property. I thought the right hon. Gentleman the other day, in the discussion upon the Small Holdings Bill, and particularly upon the question of the rates being divided between the owner and the occupier, spoke of the rate being imposed upon the farmer. But if the rates are paid by realty, what is the advantage of dividing them between owner and occupier? Those who speak of those rates going for the relief of the landlord seem to hold that the occupiers do not pay the rates at all; but a vast number pay the entire rate. I invite any hon. Member to meet occupiers in London, Liverpool, or Glasgow and say to them—"Gentlemen, you are entirely mistaken in thinking you have any interest in rates. You have no interest in paying rates. They are paid by realty—by the owners of property." Is there any hon. Member in this House who really believes that the four millions which have been given in relief of rates have really gone to the owners of property? No!

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the right hon. Gentleman excuse me? I want to ask him, did he say that the rates have no effect upon the Revenue?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman took the whole of the four millions as going to the relief of the owners.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said I would not dispute as to the particular figures.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman, however, took the four millions as the relief of realty. I can assure him there are thousands and thousands of occupiers in our great cities who do pay the rates themselves, and who have felt an increase in the rates when it has been imposed, and who have felt a decrease in those rates when it has taken place, and everyone who is acquainted with the subject will admit this to be the case. But now I want to put another point in regard to this relief of real property. I say that by the relief which we have given to local taxation, which has been given to occupiers as well as to owners, and in the main has been enjoyed by the occupiers and has not been enjoyed by the owners—we have assisted municipal finance to such an extent that now the Local Authorities are able to undertake much excellent social legislation with which, otherwise, they would have been quite incompetent to deal. Where would the London County Council be if we had not assisted them by the increased means which have been placed at their command for the relief of the local taxation when they lost the £500,000 in respect of the Coal Duties? Do the London County Council, when they receive this money, think it has gone simply for the relief of the owners? No, they know it is at their disposal; they know they have more money to spend upon open spaces, recreation grounds, sanitary measures, free libraries, and the like—all that is much more possible now than it could possibly be before, when the rating difficulty stood in the way of every possible reform, municipal or otherwise. I frankly say I consider we are forwarding the social movement, and that we have largely assisted to develop Municipal and County Government by sums we have thought it right to place at the disposal of the Local Authorities. So much as regards that part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which contrasted what we have done for one class with that which we have done for another. The right hon. Gentleman made a further omission. In speaking of what we had done for the working classes, he did not include the gift of free education which we have been able to place at their disposal. I think the right hon. Gentleman would admit—

SIR W. HARCOURT: I did.

*MR. GOSCHEN: But the right hon. Gentleman did not at the end of his speech, when he made his summary, add the two and a-half millions for free education to the two and a-half millions which we have remitted in the way of indirect taxation. I think we may contend that the working man has been as much benefited by being relieved of the threepence or sixpence per week which he had to pay for his children's education, as he is by taking off a further portion of the Tea Duty. It has precisely the same effect in assisting him. I turn now to the staple argument which is used on these occasions—the argument as to tampering, as it is called, with the Sinking Fund. The right hon. Gentleman's argument in this respect was sometimes rather strange. He spoke of the prosperity which has been fortunately developed during the last three years, and then said that during such a period of prosperity we ought not to have tampered with the Sinking Fund. The right hon. Gentleman taxes me with having robbed the Sinking Fund, and his argument that I ought not to have taken that course rested to a great extent upon the development of the prosperity of the country since I have taken that course. I think the right hon. Gentleman will not deny the justice of that statement, although, perhaps, he may think I ought to have restored the Sinking Fund. I do not, however, know whether that is a point of his argument. Well, now, I suggest a new item to the programme of the right hon. Gentleman, who spoke of this as a permanent robbery of the Sinking Fund. Why permanent? The right hon. Gentleman possibly may occupy the position not very long hence which I have the honour to occupy at the present moment. Why, then, should the suspension of the Sinking Fund be permanent? Why should he not restore the three millions to the Sinking Fund? I can tell him how he can do it. Let him take away the three millions which have been given to the owners of real estate; let him take back that which we charges me with having given to the Local Authorities, and devote it to restoring the Sinking Fund of Sir Stafford Northcote. I offer him a very enticing item to be added to the Newcastle Programme—withdraw the three millions from the money given to the wealthy and the Local Authorities and restore the amount to the Sinking Fund. The curious thing is that while I have been denounced from many a platform for having withdrawn the three millions, and with having given too much to the Local Authorities, I have never seen a single Member who has proposed to diminish by one sovereign the amount which has been placed at the disposal of the Local Authorities. Nor have I seen the slightest disposition to increase the amount of the Sinking Fund should the right hon. Gentleman accede to power. The right hon. Gentleman early in his speech said I had managed to collect all the worst precedents that had been set and press them into my service, and he must observe some kind of reticence in speaking of them. Fortunately I need observe no such reticence. I do not disapprove of the precedents which were wisely set in many cases, and I do not see why I should not state them to the House. The right hon. Gentleman has always denounced me for innovation in finance, but I have generally been able to find a precedent set by very high authority for anything I have done. There are three charges that he made against me—one is that I have tampered with the Sinking Fund, another is that when the Conversion was successful I did not leave the whole amount of the interest saved to the benefit of the Sinking Fund, and the third is that in years of prosperity we have borrowed money and spread the repayment of it as a burden which will fall upon our successors. The right hon. Gentleman knows full well that there are precedents for every one of those courses. The right hon. Gentleman said that the suspension of the Sinking Fund in 1885-6 and 1886-7 was due to the Soudan Expedition, the Afghan business, and other matters. That is true as regards 1885-6, but was it true as regards 1886-7, when my stern critic was presiding temporarily at the Exchequer? The right hon. Gentleman nods his head, but I have read the speech he made on that occasion, and I think he has not lately referred to it. He said the expenditure had become normal. He did not suggest that the Estimates were high in 1886-7, and that they would come down, and that, therefore, he would suspend the Sinking Fund. He could not think of what tax he would impose; he was helpless. He had a deficit of over £500,000, and he did not think of putting an additional tax on champagne, or of increasing the Death Duties, or any of those other taxes for which I have been denounced. The right hon. Gentleman simply said—"I do not know whom I must tax, and so I must suspend the Sinking Fund!" This is the right hon. Gentleman who has been lecturing me for three years for tampering with the Sinking Fund. I will not do him an injustice. Here are his own words. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Estimates would not go down, and he was afraid he could not hold out any hopes of a reduction. He found a deficit of £543,000, "not," he said—

"Not a very satisfactory result in a time of peace, with the Income Tax at 8d. in the pound."

The increase of expenditure was

"Principally to be accounted for by the large expenditure upon Naval and Military Services, an expenditure which the Committee, I fear, must now look upon as normal. . . The interesting question is, How is this deficit to be met? In ordinary times no doubt it would be met by an increase of taxation, but I know no class and no trade at the present time which is in a condition to bear additional taxation. As to indirect taxation, I do not look at it with any sanguine hope."

Why did not the right hon. Gentleman put on some of those taxes which I ventured to impose afterwards? He had the same advisers at the Treasury as I had, but he could not find £500,000, and, therefore, he suspends two little Sinking Funds, and he poses before the country now as a great defender of the principle of the Sinking Fund. In the same speech the right hon. Gentleman said—

"If we cannot meet this deficit by increased taxation, we can only meet it by some reduction from the sum now appropriated to the reduction of the Debt."

The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the Naval and Military Expenditure was normal, and that there was nothing special in the year except that he could not find taxation, and he made the remarkable admission that

"Sir Stafford Northcote distinctly contemplated the application of the Sinking Fund to such a purpose as this."

That is to meet the normal expenditure of the year, when the right hon. Gentleman did not know how to find means of increasing the taxation. Well, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to-day has been characterised by one omission, which I note for the first time upon this occasion. The right hon. Gentleman has not this year quoted the Economist. That is a remarkable fact. When he has to make a speech he generally fills his pockets with extracts from that paper. Now, just for once I will quote a passage from the Economist. I think it is my turn. Here is what that organ, which he chiefly uses for denouncing the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, says—

"An expediency Budget"—"a very tame and impotent Budget."—"Sir William Harcourt finds himself driven back to the refuge of shiftless financiers, a partial suspension of the Sinking Fund. In mitigation of his shortcomings, however, he pleads he is not going to sin so much as his two immediate predecessors. They laid hands upon nearly five and a half millions of the Sinking Fund, whereas he proposes to appropriate only £800,000." He should "think the Income Tax question over again," and "although it may be beyond the present ability of Sir William Harcourt to arrange for the just incidence of taxation, even he, if he remains long in his present office, may gain sufficient financial grasp and experience to grapple with the question."

Now, the Committee will see that the Economist is impartial in its observations. I confess that when I entered upon office I was not under the awful impression which the right hon. Gentlemen felt as to the sanctity of the Sinking Fund, because in two years running that Sinking Fund had been suspended, one year being a year of normal expenditure. Now, my first crime—the crime for which I have always been attacked—was that I reduced a portion of the fixed charge in 1887-88. The next charge is that I have allowed the whole amount saved by the Conversion scheme to go, not to the Sinking Fund, but in relief of taxation. But here again I have got the latest precedent in the attempted Conversion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh. (Mr. Childers). In that attempted Conversion it was arranged that the chief amount should go to the relief of the taxpayer, and not into the Sinking Fund. The right hon. Gentleman may say he does not care for precedents, but they are very important when the public are going to decide between two rival parties, and I should like to know how hon. Members opposite can denounce me for taking a course which a few years ago had the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and other right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Now, what is the third charge? The third charge is that we spread expenditure over a certain number of years. I noted the observation of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the amount expended upon the Army and Navy in the first years after we came into Office. If you take guns and ships together, the right hon. Gentleman will see there was scarcely any diminution in the Estimates at all. In those earlier years we had to make up immensely as regards guns and ammunition, because, as perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will remember, he did not attach the same importance to having guns ready for ships, and ships ready for guns, as an ordinary Chancellor of the Exchequer might be expected to do. Our predecessors had fallen very much behind, and in one year we were obliged to ask for £1,700,000 for naval guns and ammunition. Now, I frankly admit that in the year 1889-90—not merely from the point of view of the Admiralty, but from that of the Government as a whole—we took stock of our position politically and navally; we looked at the whole situation, and we came to the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary in the interest of the country to make a special effort for increasing the Navy. This is a point which hon. Members and right hon. Gentlemen may challenge occasionally in speeches on the platform, but they have never yet ventured to ask for a straight vote on the question as to whether this further expenditure for the Navy was required. They denounce bloated naval estimates and expenditure as a whole, but they will not go before any popular constituency—or few of them will—and say that the additional sum spent upon the Navy was not money that was well and wisely spent, and for which, as I believe, we have a satisfactory return in the greater security of the country. Well, then, I admit we made a special effort in 1889-90, and here the right hon. Gentleman says we commenced borrowing, but he has forgotten that simultaneously with that slight borrowing we imposed increased burdens upon the people. I may say in regard to this naval programme that the amount of borrowing has been grossly exaggerated from the first, and no one is more responsible for what my right hon. Friend opposite calls the confusion of this matter than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). He wanted to clear something up, but the manner in which he set about it created half of the confusion. The right hon. Gentleman pressed for a Return and insisted upon it.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to say that the Treasury were consulted as to the form of that Report, and gave their consent to it.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, but not as to what the right hon. Gentleman wanted. We gave the Report because he insisted upon it.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I consulted the Treasury as regards the form.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, but it is not only the form. The right hon. Gentleman created the confusion because he wanted to know—and he always does want to know—in advance certain things which cannot be prophesied at all. The right hon. Gentleman always wants us to say in advance how much in the year we are going to borrow. And now I will come to the point of the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). He said: "Look how mistaken you have been in the amounts you expected to borrow. How much better it would have been if you had proceeded under the old system." Now I want to examine these two systems—the old system and what is called the new system. The right hon. Gentleman cannot blame the Government—though he has large capacities for doing so for anything that may happen—if contractors, owing to difficulties, strikes or other obstacles, are unable to deliver their ships as fast as they hoped to do. I think the right hon. Gentleman will admit that the Government cannot be blamed for that. If under these circumstances the Government are uncertain as to the amount to be paid to contractors, what is the wiser and more business-like plan? To put a tax for the maximum amount upon the people when it is possible only half of the extra amount may be wanted, or to borrow a portion of the amount according as the contractors require it, and thus avoid the inconvenience of putting on a tax for money that may not be wanted at all? In 1890-91 we expected to borrow—I admit it freely—some two millions more than we actually did borrow. What would have been done under the old system? We should have provided two millions more by taxation, which would have been extremely inconvenient to trade and in other respects, and at the end of the year it would have been found that it could not be devoted to the purposes which Parliament intended. It would have gone into the old Sinking Fund, and the money would have been re-voted the next year contrary to the intentions of Parliament. Now, the right hon. Gentleman may say, How far will you apply that? Well, I will give a candid answer. I would apply this system only when there is great uncertainty, as there must be when large contracts are put out simultaneously. We had to deal with ten millions, and the point is this—having this ten millions under contract, would it have been wise and business-like to have raised the money unnecessarily? Hon. Members opposite may speak very heroically with regard to the subject now, but I say that under the circumstances it would have been unwise to have raised so much money by extra taxation. We did raise some. Let there be no misunderstanding on that point. We raised two millions extra by taxation, and that was more than we wanted, and we carried a portion over to the next year. I am sorry I have to defend the Naval Defence Act again, but as the right hon. Gentleman opposite has again attacked it, I think I should speak upon the subject. The second point I will make on it is this :—All of us who have been at the Admiralty have found that if you vote more money for construction than you are able to use, the result is a great temptation on the part of the Admiralty to devote a portion of it to repairs and other purposes for which Parliament has not originally sanctioned the Vote. Now, the Naval Defence Act keeps the Admiralty under the strictest possible control. They do not always like it, I admit, and there have been murmurs sometimes to the effect that they are tied too tight. But the result is that we have turned out ships faster than ever before. The guns have been ready for the ships, and we have been able to keep to our programme in a manner that was never done under the old system. I frankly say, notwithstanding the hostile comments that have been made about it, that that Act has enabled us to strengthen the Navy and insure the money being spent as Parliament intended, and it has saved most inconvenient financial results owing to the uncertainty as to delivering ships by contractors. It was for administrative as well as financial purposes that we framed this Act. Now I come to the point as to what burden we have put upon our successors through these operations. Well, the right hon. Gentleman made an admission of which I took notice. The right hon. Gentleman did not object, as I understand, to the steps we have taken as regards barracks.

SIR W. HARCOURT: More defensible.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is quite as defensible as when the Military Forces Localisation Act was passed by the right hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and his colleagues. The parallel is exact. At that time there were surpluses too, but I do not see that the right hon. Gentleman deducted the amount which he borrowed for the purpose of that Act from the surplus which he had at the end of the year, nor do I see that when any money was borrowed under the earlier Fortifications Act it was considered to affect the surplus of the year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) is a person who introduces new nomenclature with regard to surpluses, and also I think some new principles. I wonder what the right hon. Member for Midlothian thought when he heard the right hon. Member for Derby deprecating surpluses, and considering that they were on the whole rather to the discredit of the Chancellor of the Exchequer than to his credit, because they showed he had miscalculated his Revenue. My recollection is that at many an election time the surpluses of the Gladstonian Chancellor of the Exchequer have been placarded in very large letters and treated as redounding—as I believe they did—to his financial ability and caution. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman shocked the Leader of the Opposition when he made these observations with regard to surpluses. The hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton)—who had a kind of preliminary canter before the right hon. Gentleman spoke—seemed to think that it was extremely easy to make an exact estimate for the year as to Revenue and Expenditure, and he appeared to think that someone is to be blamed if it did not turn out absolutely correct. When he has had, further, that experience to which I presume, from his speech and the position he has occupied in this Debate, he looks forward, he will find that to estimate to between one and two per cent., either upwards or downwards, is not the easy automatic affair which he seems to think. He put a question to me, which was also put by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) in very proper terms, as to whether I have introduced any innovation—and I think he rather wished me to disclaim the idea—making myself more than formerly responsible for the Estimates on this occasion than it was usual for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to do. I disclaim the intention entirely. I do not intend to make myself more responsible than Chancellors of the Exchequer usually are, and I may say that I used these terms when speaking of the amount which I put down to Income Tax; “I am advised,” and speaking of the services of Sir Algernon West I said—

I have acknowledged that general principle, but I am bound to say that the public does hold a Chancellor of the Exchequer more or less responsible for the correctness of the Estimates. I know it has been charged against me that I have habitually under-estimated my Revenue. But any Chancellor of the Exchequer who follows the advice of those who are responsible to him will only err in that matter within narrow limits. He exercises his judgment within narrow limits after most close conference and most intimate communication with his chief advisers. But I will say this—and I think I may remind the Committee of the fact—that whenever the Estimates have been extremely close and come up exactly as we anticipated, I have invariably endeavoured to give the credit to the permanent officers. But if it should be the other way—if there should be an over-estimate, or if there is a deficit, I should not like to come here and say that the fault rests with my responsible advisers. I will make a frank admission. Seeing that this year was a peculiar year, inasmuch that I thought we might be on the top of that curve of prosperity to which I have alluded, I thought it my duty to give more than usual care to a personal examination of the Estimates, and to the calculations and communications I have received from my advisers. I hold that I could not acquit myself of the responsibility for those Estimates at the expense of my responsible advisers. I will frankly say, however, that there has been no difference of opinion between us, and I have endeavoured to examine all that came before me with peculiar care on the present occasion. I have been led into this discussion from the point of view of the surplus to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded, but the real point before us is the money we have borrowed. The real question is, whether we can claim a surplus when we borrow for permanent works? The right hon. Gentleman called attention to the works with respect to the barracks, but I do not think he would argue that what we borrowed for the barracks ought to be deducted from the surplus for the year. The chief charge concentrates on the Naval Defence Act, and, as I stated, we have under it spent fourteen millions and borrowed two millions up to the present time. We shall borrow another two millions in the coming year, and we shall then have reached the limit of borrowing, and we shall pay off what we have borrowed in two years. That is to say, this year and two years afterwards.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In seven years from 1889.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I mean this year and two years afterwards. And now what is it that Dives be-

queaths to Lazarus? We bequeath to him two annuities, but the right hon. Gentleman will not have to suspend the Sinking Fund—if he should be in office—in order to find money to pay these annuities, because we have imposed the taxes by which those annuities will be paid, and no fresh burden will be put upon the taxpayers in those two years unless it is put on by increased naval expenditure at the instance of our successors. That is the position as regards the Naval Defence Act; and I ask the Committee, bearing in mind what I have said, which is the best for your successors, to leave unfinished ships which they are obliged to finish at a large cost, or to have finished ships with only a portion of the burden transferred to your successors? I can see an analogy in the case of two men, each of whom wishes to repair his house. One man says, "The house has rather got out of repair; I will put it right, and borrow the money and spread it over three years." The other man says, "I will not repair the house at all; I will wait the three years, and let my successor bear all the cost of the repairs." When right hon. Gentlemen opposite went out of Office in 1886 they left six millions due on unfinished ships, which we had to find. Was not that a liability just as distinct as the Naval Annuities which will still have to be paid? I contend that an unfinished ship or a contract entered into is as much a liability as if you had borrowed the money with which to pay for that ship. In both these cases you have a creditor. He may be the contractor, and he may be the person from whom you have borrowed the money; but in either case you have a creditor. Under the Naval Defence Act the burden is extremely small. It will be quickly passed over, and we have provided the means. As regards the Imperial Defence Act, the money will not have to be found by Lazarus out of fresh taxation, but by the windfall of the Suez Canal; so again, I may say whether it is right or whether it is wrong, our successors will not have to find the money. There remains the balance of three millions under the Barracks Act, and that is the only serious item which can be charged against us under these Defence

Acts. I admit there is some complication in the accounts, but that must be so; but is it not better that it should be a little more difficult to examine the accounts than that we should leave the Naval programme unfinished or have any of the other disadvantages which I have pointed out? I admit that the system is somewhat complicated, but I say that the advantages have not been too dearly bought. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir W. Harcourt) has developed into an extremely polemical statistician, but in the pursuit of his statistical studies I would ask him not entirely to forget the considerations that a statesman ought to weigh. If we make any changes he looks more at the difficulty in being able to follow the statistics than at the real advantages or disadvantages which may accrue. I do not apply that to the Sinking Fund, which is really a matter of importance; and though I have been very severely blamed, I do not say there are not some advantages in the discussion that has taken place, and in the manner in which the Party opposite have pledged themselves to the maintenance of a permanent Sinking Fund. But while I admit the advantage of that criticism, I must say that it scarcely comes well from one who suspended the Sinking Fund at a time of normal expenditure. Still, I think it is fair criticism, and what I ought to have expected. I have attempted to deal with most of the charges which were brought against me. I have dealt with the question of having tampered with the Sinking Fund, and I think I have made it clear that in other matters there has been great exaggeration. With regard to our naval expenditure, the right hon. Gentleman has said that the rolling stock is always paid out of Revenue by the Railway Companies. I do not think that is quite so, and if a Railway Company incurs a very heavy expense in rolling stock in one year, the account is spread over three or four years. I have not added to capital account, but have only endeavoured to spread expenditure over a few years. The right hon. Gentleman asked me at the close of his speech, in regard to the appropriations in aid, whether our proposal was tantamount to postponing payment, and whether it was possible, without trenching on future years, to increase this year's Revenue by £200,000? This does not expose what has been done. The £200,000 in question belongs to the last quarter of the previous year, and was in the hands of the Paymaster General to be paid into the Exchequer on the 1st April. We thus have five quarters, but we do not trench upon the Revenue of the future year. We got the arrears, but we do not touch the future. I have now endeavoured to cover the whole ground. I believe I was right at the time when the Income Tax stood at 8d. to put it at 6d. I believe that if we had maintained the Sinking Fund at its old figure it would have been more in jeopardy than it is at present. Then as regards relief, I say that we have equitably distributed that relief to the best of our ability amongst all classes. We have not given so much to the wealthy as we have to the middle, the lower middle, and the working classes. I have over and over been censured by the Income Tax payers on the ground that we have done too little for the middle classes and that we have done everything for the working classes, but I believe that complaint is very unjustifiable. We have endeavoured, to the best of our ability during the past five years, to distribute those advantages flowing from prosperity so as to assist all classes of the community alike and give them all an interest in the increasing prosperity of the country. The remark has been made that I have boasted of my surpluses. I have never boasted of those surpluses. I do not deny that we have been favoured by fortune, and I trust that I, or anybody else, who occupies this position next year may, notwithstanding some of the more gloomy symptoms to which allusion has been made, may still find that the Revenue will enable us to meet our great and increasing expenditure, which I have often endeavoured to reduce. I am bound to say that in those attempts at reduction I have never met with much assistance from the leaders who sit on the opposite side of the House, and we are now taxed, when General Election draws near, with having increased our expenditure. But I must say that no Chancellor of the Exchequer has ever received less support in his endeavour to reduce Expenditure than I have from my political opponents, when the House has wished to take matters too quickly into its own hands. The right hon. Gentleman was frequently not in the House when Motions in favour of increasing expenditure in certain directions came on.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Free education.

*MR. GOSCHEN: In free education we were pressed to extend the expenditure in every direction, but that was not supporting the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Looking over the five years as a whole, I believe our expenditure has been wise, and of all the expenditure I have incurred there is none I regret less than the expenditure on the defensive Forces of the country, and the expenditure by which we have endeavoured to assist the Municipalities in carrying out the great and expanding work which is confided to them.

\*(8.11.) MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I do not propose to enter into the general discussion of the Budget, but I regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not proposed to regulate certain Stamp Duties with the object of making them less burdensome and more productive. I refer specially to the Stamp Duties on foreign bonds and bills of exchange. I think that a Chancellor of the Exchequer who has had great commercial experience and long training in the City of London should, even in what is presumed to be the last Session of Parliament, endeavour to reform our system of Stamp Duties. Besides, these matters have been brought under his notice in this House and in the Standing Committee to which his Stamp Consolidation Bill was referred last Session. It is, in my opinion, very necessary that these Duties should be imposed with due regard to what obtains in other great commercial centres, so as to prevent the diversion of trade to other countries. The merchant traders and bankers who transact business with foreign countries greatly promote the prosperity of this country. Now, what has the Chancellor of the Exchequer done to preserve the trade and promote the success of the merchants and bankers? The guiding principle ought to be that the Stamp Duties levied here should not advantage our foreign competitors at our expense. Laws affecting international securities, bills of exchange, systems of currency, weights and measures, should be as good—certainly not worse, in this country as those of our neighbours. If it is advantageous to have International Conventions with regard to postal and telegraphic arrangements, why not also assimilate our regulations as to stamps, &c., with those of other great Powers. Now, what are the Stamp Duties in competing countries as compared with ours? In France  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per mille, or 3s. per £100; Germany, 2 per mille, or 4s. per £100; Holland and Belgium, 1 per mille, or 2s. per £100. Here it is 10s. per £100. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has increased our difficulties by the imposition of a novel duty commonly called the Goschen Stamp—an adhesive stamp, bothering everybody because it must be affixed year by year; an annual plague and nuisance. Paris and Berlin are taking the lead over London in financial operations, mainly owing to their reasonable and our unreasonable Stamp Duties. I learn from the best authority that it was recently proposed to issue here a Norwegian Loan, but the negotiations fell through on account of our Stamp Duty, and the loan has been taken in Germany. The Chancellor of the Exchequer kills by excessive stamping the goose which lays the golden eggs. He does not shut out impecunious States from issuing loans here. I have heard of no Argentine complaints of our excessive Stamp Duty, but first-class States prefer other markets. Trade follows in the wake of loans. Besides it is very difficult to know what securities should bear this irritating Stamp Duty. If anybody receives direct from abroad foreign bonds as a purchase or security for an advance he need not stamp them. When the advance is paid off and he is ordered to deliver them for safe custody to the foreigners' agent against a mere receipt he need not stamp them; but if the foreigner asks for an advance from his agent or from the former lender, must the bonds be stamped or must they be sent abroad and again sent here to avoid stamping? Our great Colonies do not yet understand the complex system of Stamp Duties. At the beginning of the year New South Wales and Victoria each issued a loan for about a million sterling in the shape of Treasury bills or bonds. They were similar in tenour and wording, except for one word. New South Wales printed "Treasury Bill," and put on a 1s. per cent. Bill Stamp; Victoria for the same security and length of loan printed "bond," and puts on every £100 a 2s. 6d. impressed stamp, a 1s. per cent. affixed Goschen stamp for 1892, and the holder must affix another if he sells in 1893. So New South Wales pays £500 for its loan, while Victoria has to pay £2,250 on a loan of the same amount. It cannot be right that one word should make all this difference. The revenue from the new stamp was estimated, I think, at £200,000; in 1890 it produced £94,600, and in 1891, £73,000, and I believe that the bankers and merchants lose many times that sum by the diversion of trade by the Stamp Duty. If any particular source of revenue shows signs of a decline investigation is necessary in order to show whether the duty imposed is wisely imposed. The revenue from stamps on bills of exchange and promissory notes has been declining for the last seventeen or eighteen years; it has declined almost a quarter of a million. The revenue from the penny receipt stamp has increased. It is difficult to analyse that source of revenue, but certainly increase of productiveness from light duty is an argument in my favour. It is difficult to give the precise reason for a diminished number of bills in circulation in face of increased population and trade. The chief causes must be that floating capital has increased in effectiveness through the development of banking facilities, and that competition has reduced profits and enforced economy in the use of stamp by inducing the substitution of cash payments. There is a continuous tendency to substitute demand drafts or cheques for short-dated bills and advances for long-dated ones. Most countries have followed our example in imposing this tax on trade—the exceptions are the United States, Canada, Norway, and some parts of Switzerland. It may be said that commerce is safer if based on cash payments, but there are certain disadvantages in connection with demand drafts drawn upon this country; they are sometimes presented a day before the letter of advice reaches its destination, and are occasionally dishonoured. Another disadvantage is that these letters containing drafts are sometimes stolen and then cashed before the owner can stop them. In Austria and Holland bills within eight days' date are exempt from any duty. I propose that bill stamps should be reduced to 6d. per £100. If that does not meet the approval of the Chancellor of the Exchequer I would suggest that the experiment should be tried with short-dated bills not exceeding one month. This reduction would increase the number of short-dated bills which can be more safely transmitted by post than drafts, a month giving ample time to stop them. If that proved satisfactory the duty on all bills might be reduced to 6d. per £100 with profit to the Exchequer and benefit to trade. The number of bills could also be increased about four per cent. by abolishing the three days' grace, which equals 54 per cent. on seventy-five days, about the average length of bills. The increased use of bills would be promoted by bringing our laws into international accord by abolishing the three days' grace, and making bills due on a holiday payable the next day. I also propose that the stamp on bills drawn and payable outside the United Kingdom and negotiated in this country should be reduced to 6d. per £100. At present numbers of these bills are diverted from this country to the Continent to avoid our Stamp Duty, which is higher than elsewhere. In Germany there is no such duty; in Holland they charge 1d. for any amount; in Belgium and France 6d. per £100; here it is 1s. I feel perfectly certain that if these duties were reduced they would produce a larger income, and would restore trade which is being constantly taken from this country. I say the 1s. per cent. transfer, or Goschen, stamp should be abolished in the interests of trade; stamps on foreign bonds should be reduced to 5s.; bill stamps should be reduced to 6d.; at any rate, for those for one month, or less. I have the opinion of the Bank of England and a great discount company that these short-dated bills have almost entirely disappeared, and do not now form one per cent. of the total number. I do not know if the right hon. Gentleman is aware that circular notes are being issued payable on demand to avoid the ad valorem Stamp Duty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked me if I could suggest some other Stamp Duty in substitution for the 1s. stamp on bonds. I would suggest that we should imitate our French neighbours and impose a Stamp Duty on bill posters. The duty in France is, according to size, from 6c. to 24c.; but those issued for political purposes bear no stamp. In 1890 this duty produced about £115,000, and in 1891 nearly £120,000; they also levy a duty on painted notices, bringing in an addition of about £13,000 per annum. I should think that amount would be exceeded in this country, and I notice that land is often kept unlet because the letting of the hoarding for advertising purposes brings in more than the land would do. It would be well, also, if the Government had some control over these posters. I can assure the Chancellor of the Exchequer that his reputation, which has suffered in the City, would be greatly restored if he got rid of those irritating Stamp Duties, and took measures to restore the trade which they have driven away.

(8.58.) MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): Most of us who had the satisfaction of hearing the Budget speech must have been very favourably impressed with the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman that he would endeavour, as far as in him lay, to distribute taxation in the most equal manner. I do not wish to take up the time of the Committee unduly, but I think, without going very far afield to find a case of unjust taxation, I can come near home, and, in the County of Middlesex, find a state of things which is astonishing, and which, I believe, could not have been contemplated when the Local Government Act came into operation. The position is this—that the County of Middlesex is at the present moment paying an undue sum for the number of policemen that are allotted to it. It has been urged, and, I believe, truly urged, that there is no necessity in Middlesex for the large number of policemen that are there—and they are there for the benefit of Londoners, to attend to race meetings, meetings in Trafalgar Square, and gatherings of various kinds and sorts. I have been to some trouble to collect figures relating to this matter, but, perhaps, before I go into them, I had better say that the manner in which those policemen are paid for at the present moment is by a universal 5d. rate in all parishes. I find there is a provision in the 24th Clause of the Local Government Act relating to the substitution of local grants, which says—

“The Council of each county shall from time to time as from the said day pay out of the county fund and charge to the Exchequer Contribution Account the following sums.”

That is my position as regards the Treasury. This is a question which has not just recently cropped up. It has been taken before those gentlemen who in this House represent the Local Government Board without any effect. We have been shuttle-cocked, so to speak, from the Home Secretary, who in his turn recommended us to go to the Treasury. In going to the Treasury last year I think I established my case to the Financial Secretary's satisfaction, for he assured me that I had a good case, but that the Treasury had no funds. Very shortly after that, by questions I raised in the House, I think I may take credit for having put the Treasury in a position of funds by pointing out the leakage of Revenue in the operation of “grogging.” But the fund so put into the hands of the Treasury seems not to have been applicable to this particular purpose, and I can quite understand that such a fund could not be ear-marked in any way; but on the principle that one good turn deserves another, I trust the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Treasury Bench will deem it right and worth his while to pay attention to my claim. With regard to the particular portion of the Act which refers to the payment to the Exchequer, it states in Sub-section K of the same clause that—

“They shall, if within their county sums are raised by rates for the purpose of the Metropolitan Police, pay to the receiver for the Metropolitan Police District in each year a sum bearing such proportion to the sum actually raised in the same year by rates from the parishes in that county for the said purpose as a Secretary of State certifies to be the proportion which would have been contributed out of the Exchequer under the arrangement in force during the financial year next before the passing of this Act.”

In Clause 27 it specifies that—

“When a County Council are required under the provisions of this or any other Act to pay any sum into Her Majesty's Exchequer, or to the Treasury, or to the receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, such sum shall be deducted from the amount payable under the provisions of this Act out of the Local Taxation Account to such County Council, and instead of being paid to the County Council shall be paid into Her Majesty's Exchequer, or to the receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, as the case requires.”

This is what happens. Last year the Treasury charged the county of Middlesex £53,519, and Middlesex does not quite see that it ought to pay that amount of money, for whether we take population or rateable value, or whether we take the acreage or inhabited houses—whichever test you take you will find that the amount of money paid by Middlesex is altogether in excess of that paid by any other county. I have taken the trouble to get some figures from twelve counties which are similarly related in population to that of Middlesex. If we take population as the test, we shall find that in Middlesex we are paying 4s. 2½d. for our policemen, against 1s. 5d. in the average counties. If we take the rateable value we shall find that we are paying 9d. against 3½d. in other counties, and if we take the acreage of the county, we find we are paying 1s. 6½d. for our policemen against 6½d. in those other twelve counties.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): I do not understand how the hon. Gentleman is connecting this discussion with the Budget Resolution.

MR. BIGWOOD: I really want information from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to whom I am to appeal to. I should like to hear from him whether it is a matter on which I can approach the Treasury—I have tried all the other Departments in vain—or whether I shall be under the necessity of bringing in a Bill for the purpose. I can quite understand it is not to the point; but I think, having given this amount of publicity to the case, possibly the Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench will give me an answer.

(9.7.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): There is only one point in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which I wish to allude for a moment, and that is to what he said on the subject of free education. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he, at all events, was not ashamed of anything in his career as Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Courtney, if it had been possible to bring a blush to the cheek of the right hon. Gentleman it would have been when he referred to the subject of free education. At the end of the year 1888, when he desired to expropriate £250,000 a year of Imperial taxes to the relief of local rates in Scotland, I remember well getting up at three o'clock in the morning, and making a present to the right hon. Gentleman of an idea. I said to him if he wished to make himself the most popular Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the most popular man in Scotland, instead of criminally wasting the money in relief of rates he would apply that money to free education. Well, Sir, on that occasion the right hon. Gentleman treated me, as I no doubt deserved, as a species of uninspired lunatic; and it would have been impossible even to make a start towards free education if on the following day I had not been able to invoke the services of the late Mr. Biggar, and with his aid the Irish Members occupied a large part of the time of this House which might have been mischievously employed in forwarding the business of the Government, till at last—sweet are the uses of obstruction—the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to take his first step towards free education. As we all know, and as was admitted by the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Government had no love for free education. It was, as he graphically put it, extorted from them by the Scotch Members at the point of the bayonet. But my object in referring to that at the present moment is not to go back upon by-gones, but to point out that the right hon. Gentleman, when he did make up his mind to give free education to the working men of England, chose a mode of doing so which was least favourable to them, and most onerous to them, and most injurious. If the right hon. Gentleman had desired really to confer a boon upon the working men he would have employed his two millions not in relief of fees, but in reducing the Tea Duties, or even the Tobacco Duties. If he had employed that money in reducing the Tea Duties, he would have conferred a benefit which would have been equally, or almost equally, distributed over all classes of the community, the larger share of which would undoubtedly have fallen to the most numerous class. In order to give distinctness to this conception, I may point out that the sum of money which the Government applied to free education—nearly two millions—would, if it had been applied in the reduction of the Tea Duties, have resulted in a benefit to every family of 6s. 8d. a year.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This criticism is not pertinent to the Resolution now before the House.

MR. HUNTER: I was only perhaps going a little wide in order to lay the foundation. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman throughout his whole career has been to reduce the taxation of the rich, and especially on property, and not to diminish the exorbitant burdens on the working classes. Our whole system of Imperial finance is ingeniously arranged in such a way that the richer the man the less the percentage of taxation he is called upon to pay, our whole system of taxation being perfectly graduated. A millionaire is not taxed three per cent. of his income; but the poor man, with an income of £50 a year, is taxed nearer thirty per cent. upon his taxable income. The right hon. Gentleman has said that that portion of the community for whom he had had the most genuine compassion were those who had not less than £150 a year; but five-sixths of the population have less than that amount. For the idle rich he has compassion, but for the working man he has no mercy. The right hon. Gentleman's maxim is, "To him that hath shall be given, but from him that hath not shall be taken away the little that he hath."

*(9.13.) MR. LENG (Dundee): I was very much surprised that the hon. Member for Whitechapel (Mr. Montagu) threw out a suggestion, which was quite contrary to the principle laid down in the early part of his speech, to put a tax upon bill-posters. He forgot that that would, to a large extent, affect a great number in the printing trade, as well as a considerable number of bill-posters. But I did not rise so much to allude to that as to acknowledge the concession made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the fees on the renewal of patents. That concession, although somewhat tardily and reluctantly made, is an important one. Under the new scale the fees will be largely reduced during the earlier years of the patent, more especially from the fifth to the tenth year, and on a very simple and ingenious scale which can be easily understood by patentees. The charge for the fifth year will be £5, and for the sixth year £6, increasing £1 a year until the fourteenth year, the last year of the patent. The total charge will now be £99, as against £154 previously, the great benefit being the reduction in the earlier years. I believe that the augmented number of patents which will be taken out will in the next two or three years more than compensate for the reduction in the fees. I would suggest, however, to the right hon. Gentleman the expediency of making a proportional reduction in the fines now imposed upon those who require a slight extension of time for the payment of their renewal fees, so as to make the fines correspond with the new scale of fees. At present the cost for one month's extension is £3, two months £7, and three months—the utmost limit—£10. These fines were rigorous enough when the fees were £10, £15, or £20, but they would obviously be out of proportion to the reduced scale of fees. The existing fines were about one-third of the renewal fees, and in the same proportion, under the new scale, the fine for one month's delay in payment should not exceed £1, two months £3, and three months £5. Here, again, such an increase in the number of payments is likely to occur as will fully make up for the reduction in the amount of fines. I will not trouble the Committee with figures showing the remarkable increases both in the number and amount of the fines since 1884, which support this contention. The reduction of the fines follows so naturally on the reduction of the fees that I feel assured the Treasury will not hesitate to sanction the smaller as they have now sanctioned the greater change. There should be the less hesitation to deal in a liberal spirit with the whole of our patent system since it may soon come to be seriously affected by a proposal which has been made in the American Congress. General Bearden, himself an inventor, who declared he had suffered greatly from the defects of the Patent Laws in this country and in America, has brought in a Bill applying the principle of reciprocity to patents, so that British patentees may only obtain patents in the United States at the low charge of £7 for fourteen years, if American citizens can obtain patents at the same rate in this country. General Bearden wishes to enforce on this and other European countries the advantages of the American patent system, which, if they are wise, they will adopt without such compulsion. I wish also to say a few words on another subject. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has been lately refusing his assent to useful expenditure, such as an increase of grants to our scientific colleges, on the plea of want of money. I would point out a way by which, without adding a penny to the taxation of the country, the right hon. Gentleman might safely have estimated on a surplus of from a quarter to half a million. I refer to the drawback allowance of 2d. per gallon on all British spirits exported from this country. This allowance, the right hon. Gentleman stated, amounts to £363,000 a year.

or nearly £1,000 a day. I fail, from an examination of the Revenue Returns, to see how that sum is made up, and it evidently includes more than the item to which I have referred. I submit that there is no justification whatever for paying this 2d. per gallon out of Imperial Revenue on every gallon of the large quantity of whisky and other spirits exported from this country. Not only do the distillers enjoy this bonus of 2d. per gallon on all they export, but they are further benefited to the extent of 4d. per gallon by the difference of the duty on all spirits imported as against home-manufactured spirits. The former is 10s. 10d. per gallon and the latter only 10s. 6d. There was a time when there was a reason for this excess of charge on importation, but we live in very different times. Antiquated charges of this kind should not be upheld when the occasion for them has passed away.

*(9.28.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in regard to the Patent Laws. No doubt we may congratulate ourselves that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given way to the pressure brought to bear upon him last year on this subject. We may thank him for small mercies, but I for one will not be satisfied until the inventors of this country are treated as well as those of the United States. I gathered from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night that he leaves everything to his successors, and that the Tory Party are going out of power at the General Election. I have noticed that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes what is considered a telling speech he generally reminds his audience that he has reduced the National Debt by about one hundred millions. Possibly that may be correct, but if he has done so, he has to that extent confiscated the money of the bondholders, and he must not complain if another Government reduces rent in the same measure, because, personally, I see no distinction between the two. Perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite right in reducing the rate of interest, although no great virtue attaches to that action. I do complain, however, that the product of his proceeding in that respect has been wasted either on the Army or Navy. We propose to spend during the incoming year a little over ninety millions, and this with local grants and loans will be increased to nearly one hundred and two millions. In my opinion that amount is more than should be expended on the Government of this country, and I believe that the management of affairs would not be less efficient were the sum smaller. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Leng) has remarked that the general answer to requests for grants in aid of scientific purposes is lack of money. That, I notice, is the general answer whenever money is wanted for useful objects in contrast to the treatment of the Army and Navy. The amount we are to spend on these Services during the current year is, I see, thirty-two millions. That appears to me a monstrous sum, and I am persuaded that a great proportion of it goes in the direction of useless incomes and pensions. That remark, of course, does not extend to the pay of soldiers, because I believe the time is coming when their remuneration will have to be increased. What I do protest against is salaries paid to officers and others who give no return in the form of work. There are one or two other matters I should like to refer to in order that information may be offered by the right hon. Gentleman. One of these topics is the House Duty and Property Tax. On several occasions since entering this House I have called attention to the manner of assessment; but so far I have failed to get a definite answer. The probable reply to it will be that the revenue from those sources would be reduced by an alteration of the assessment. That, however, is not a point about which I concern myself, having no objection to increasing the tax generally, if I could thereby remove an injustice. Last year the House Duty was collected on what is called the gross assessment, and the same form of assessment is observed in regard to the Property Tax. Were local and other rates collected on that basis, there would be not so much reason to complain. Parliament, it should be remembered, has declared that the gross assessment is an unfair assessment, and has solemnly declared rateable value to be the fair value; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer still proposes, in regard to the House Duty and Property Tax, to adhere to the gross assessment. Some years ago the right hon. Gentleman told the country that he was in favour of the alteration I desire. I wish to know whether he retains that opinion, and, if so, why he has not during his term of office done something to carry the change into effect. We may be told that this would entail a re-valuation of property in the United Kingdom. But in answer to that I would point out that there is already every fifth year a re-valuation in London, and a proper valuation in all the large cities and towns. I trust, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman who has assumed this is his last year in office will give his successor the benefit of his opinion on this matter. I also desire to allude to the Income Tax, in order to urge the adoption of a graduated system, and also in order that I may ask the right hon. Gentleman why he has not attempted to alter the incidence of this taxation. My view is that there ought to be a distinction between tax on realised property and upon income, which is naturally precarious, and, as the right hon. Gentleman has not much money to spare, I should have thought he would have turned his attention to this subject. It is said with great truth that the masses of this country are overtaxed and that it is the classes who are relieved. Now, I should like to see the right hon. Gentleman turn his attention to the Income Tax, and give the country the benefit of his views on that matter while he is in office. No doubt, when he is out of office we shall hear fine speeches from him as to what ought to be done, and we shall be reminded that he cannot carry them out because he is out of office; and, therefore, while he is Chancellor of the Exchequer, I should like to hear his views with regard to the matter I have mentioned. I remarked just now that seven or eight millions yearly are handed over to the Local Authorities as grants in aid. Speaking for myself, I may say emphatically that I do not believe in these grants. Money which comes easily to Municipal Bodies is likely to be spent freely and without that care and consideration which would be the case if the money was raised by direct taxation from those ratepayers to whom they are responsible. But considering that these aids are given, I think the right hon. Gentleman would have organised a fairer system of taxation if he had imposed taxes on the ground values. I know it may be said that that would be a tax on the rich, especially on some Dukes and people of that class; but almost everybody admits now that there should be a tax on that kind of property, and that it is very unfair that the occupier should pay the whole of the rates. There is another matter to which I should like to draw attention. I refer to the duties on tea, coffee and cocoa, and those other articles which constitute the free breakfast table. I think the duties on these articles should be abolished, and that they should be placed on luxuries as much as possible. Now, Sir, we make a large profit out of the Post Office. I find that the income is ten and a half millions yearly, and the expenditure six and a half millions, showing a profit of four millions. It seems to me that we should not charge the people of this country any more than what the postal business costs. The State ought not to go into business for the purpose of making money. At any rate, I think there are some ways in which a portion of that four millions of profit could be better spent than on the Army and Navy. For my own part, I should like to see some part of this large profit devoted towards cheapening the Postal Service to the public. Another item to which I should like to refer is the Death Duties. I think it is generally admitted by all Governments, and by everyone who will take the trouble to look into the subject, that the manner in which the Death Duties are collected is very unfair to the people of this country. I want to see the percentage of Death Duties exactly the same on real property as on personal property. I have never heard a reason why Death Duties should be paid on personal property and not on real property, except that it has nearly always been the object of the Government of this country to relieve the rich at the expense of the poor and middle classes. The people of this country are now taking a much keener interest in these questions than formerly, and when we have put our house in order by giving Home Rule to Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and England, and to London, we shall have time to consider and deal with these important matters.

*MR. MURDOCH (Reading): The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton), whom we are beginning to recognise as the Admirable Crichton of the other side, has proceeded to enlighten us to-night on the subject of finance, but I do not quite know whether we can take him seriously on the subject. The Debate has not been very lively for the last hour, but I fancied that a deeper gloom settled over the Committee when the hon. Member told us that he intended to come back after the General Election. Amongst the things he told us to-night he spoke of the confiscation that has taken place in consequence of the reduction of the National Debt. I should like to know whether the hon. Member considers that confiscation has taken place when a railway or other company which has debentures running at four or five per cent. is enabled, from its improved financial position, to offer its debenture holders the option of either being paid off or remaining at a lower rate of interest. The reduction of the interest on the National Debt was conducted on exactly similar lines. Every holder of Consols knew, or ought to have known, that the Government of the day had the power, by giving one year's notice, either to pay off the holder at par, or to make terms with him for the continuance of the loan. Her Majesty's Government exercised that power offering the holders money to remain at two and three-quarters per cent. interest for fourteen years and two and a half per cent. in future. What confiscation is there in that process? The Government, in the interests of the country, merely carried out what was for the advantage of the country. They did what the Government was bound to do, and what the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) attempted to do; and the reason why the scheme of the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) was not successful was because it was too complicated and because it did not follow the proper lines. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) also put forward the idea that hardship had been inflicted on the holders of Consols by this Conversion scheme; and he also put forward the idea, which I think is a fallacy, that in consequence of the reduction of the interest upon the funds the holders had been driven into securities such as Argentines and other risky securities. I must say my own experience is that the people who had held Consols did not go into the class of security to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred but invested in the Debenture and Preference Stocks of the first-class railways. I think everyone who has any banking experience will bear me out when I say that the class which went into Argentine, Brazilian, and Costa Rica Bonds, and bonds of that description was not the class who held Consols. It was a class who always look for a high rate of interest, and with that are prepared to take some risk as to the security of the bonds. The right hon. Gentleman must have forgotten that the number of private holders of Consols is comparatively small. Consols are held chiefly by those who are obliged to hold them. They are largely held by bankers in trust, by savings banks and other institutions, who are compelled to invest in these securities. May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his final reply to say something as to what is being done with regard to the light coinage in this country? I know that provision has been made in this Budget for the calling in of a certain amount of the light gold which is in circulation; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer on two occasions, referring to the issue of one pound notes, has said that one reason for the issue of those notes was that it would enable a quicker calling in of the light gold which is in circulation. Personally, I thought that was one of the best features of the scheme, and I shall be very glad to hear that the Chancellor of the Exchequer hopes to accelerate the calling in of this light gold.

Mr. Morton

*(10.13.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): A point that is of the very greatest importance in connection with this discussion is the future prosperity of the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer mentioned amongst his sources of revenue a sum of £50,000 for the new Charter of the Bank. Surely we are entitled to expect that connected with the issue of this new Charter some effort should be made to put the business of the country on a sounder footing. I do not gather from his speech that he has any immediate idea of taking action with that view, and yet all are agreed that the business of the country now rests on a very insufficient and dangerous basis. The right hon. Gentleman himself demonstrated that in a speech which he made in Leeds; and if he fails now, when people are still under the effect of the warning they received two years ago, to deal with this question in an efficient manner I am afraid he will lose his opportunity, and a few years will witness what he has shown will be a great financial disaster. And if he were not supported by the great bankers in his efforts, I think it would argue something approaching almost to madness on their part. In the winter of 1890 you did not meet a man with any pretension to commercial or financial knowledge who was not prepared to consent to very strong measures being taken to put the business of the country on a proper footing. At that time they were prepared to make sacrifices to secure that end, but that, I am afraid, has now worn off, and the feeling is more languid than it was two years ago.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The point that the hon. Member is raising is outside the present discussion.

*(10.19.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): We have been waiting a long time for this debate, and for what may be called the dress attack which was to be made by the Party opposite upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

There has been a sort of attack all along the line by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton), but he only fired blank cartridge, and there is no necessity whatever for anyone on this side to attempt to repel his attack. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), who speaks with past experience, and who seems to look forward to coming to this side of the House at an earlier date than we anticipate, made his particular attack on one point, and one point alone. His complaint was of the failure of the present Government, and especially of their Finance Minister, during their five and a half years of office in not having paid off a larger amount of the National Debt than he did, but I hope to be able to show that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has reduced the National Debt by at least four times as much in the same number of years as was done by right hon. Gentlemen who are now on the other side of the House. Debt can only be paid off in one or two ways—by reducing expenditure or imposing taxation; but the hon. Member for Derby in his voluminous attack forgot to say in which of these ways the Government ought to have done it. The right hon. Gentleman would not like to go to his constituency having suggested fresh taxation to pay off the National Debt, and he did not show any extravagance on the part of the Government. Taxation might have been reduced in three ways, but I suppose no hon. Member on that side will complain of the three millions additional in relief of taxation. Then the three millions increase of expenditure on our Naval Forces has never been challenged. As to the three millions to free education, I do not think hon. Members would like to go to their constituencies saying they preferred that that sum should go to the reduction of the National Debt. But I say that the reduction of Debt by this Government is four times as great as that of their predecessors. In 1880 the total net liabilities of the State were 739½ millions in round figures; in 1886 that had been reduced to 713½ millions—that is a reduction of 26 millions. In 1891 the total had been reduced to 680½ millions—a reduction of 33 millions; so that while the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in six years reduced the Debt by 26 millions, during the five years of this Government it has been reduced by 33 millions. That is not all; the State does not really owe 680 millions to the people, but simply the amount to be paid annually to the annuitants. In 1880 the annual charge was a little over 22 millions, and in 1886 a little over 21 millions, a reduction of £781,000 only; but in 1891 I find it has been reduced by £2,318,650, which is more than three times as much. Capitalised at 33½ years' purchase £781,000 is equivalent to £25,700,000, while the £2,318,650 is equivalent to over seventy-seven millions. Beyond this, in the arrangement for the reduction of the interest on the Funded Debt, there is a provision that in eleven years there is to be a further reduction of  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent., and the present value of that reduction is no less than £28,800,000. Adding that to the £77,200,000 we get a total of £106,000,000 reduction due to the action of the present Government. When we give these figures it is useless to say that higher taxation should have been imposed, or that useful expenditure should not have been incurred so that the theoretical annual amount set aside for the Debt might have been retained. For these reasons I shall support the Government in the Budget Resolutions.

(10.22.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): Some hon. Gentlemen opposite appeared to assume that approval of the conversion of the National Debt by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was confined to that side of the House. The right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) distinctly expressed approval of the conversion, and congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on his success in carrying it out. All the criticisms have been limited to matters of detail in the carrying out process, and not to the principle. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton) expressed strong disapproval of the plunder of the Fund holders as he said, but I regret that anyone should so speak of a very just application of the great credit of this country to a reduction of this annual obligation. The immediate Resolution before the Committee is that dealing with the duty on tea, in which I take a somewhat greater interest. That practically unites with the question of grants in aid of the rates. If I asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to repeal the 4d. duty on tea he would say, "It is impossible; I have not the money to do it." But he has taken about four millions out of Imperial taxation to relieve the rates. If he had not done that he would have had ample to extinguish the Tea Duty, which only amounts to about three and a half millions. He says this has conferred great benefit on the ratepayers;—yes, upon certain classes, but not upon the larger number. Five-sixths of the ratepayers would be putting money into their pockets if the duty were taken off and the grant in aid taken away. We are told that in 1889 the annual consumption of tea was about 5lbs. a head. Then the average family would not be over supplied with 12lbs. of tea in the year. What is the average rating of a poor man's house? Throughout the whole country the average rating of the workingmen's and artizans' houses is £7 10s. It is impossible to tell how much the grant in aid has reduced the rate on that. But even assuming it has reduced the rate by as much as a halfpenny or penny in the pound it is a greater disadvantage to the poor ratepayer to have to pay fourpence on each pound of tea than to pay halfpenny or penny in the pound on his house. Suppose in one place the grant in aid reduces the rate halfpenny in the pound, a poor man living in a cottage rated at £7 10s. gets relief to the extent of 3½d. On his tea he has to pay 4d. on the pound, and that on 12lbs. makes 4s., so that he loses by the transaction made for him by the Chancellor of the Exchequer 3s. 8d. By the grant in aid he saves 20s. a year; and he only pays the same duty on his tea. On twelve pounds of tea he pays 4s. in the year. By the transaction he gains, instead of losing, the difference between 4s. and 10s.; in other words, he makes a profit of 6s. I do maintain that by these poor small ratepayers being charged 4s. a year on the average to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to relieve the rates they suffer a very considerable loss. That is not the only evil effect of applying Imperial taxation in aid of rates; but I am indisposed to pursue that subject any further, as I desire to confine myself at the present time to this particular instance of needless taxation, that is the duty on tea; and I do most earnestly contend that by the imposition of this tax—for it practically amounts to that—upon an article of necessary consumption, he causes a very great loss and inflicts a very great injustice upon the poor, who are, I suppose, about five-sixths of the population. I do not think that this is the best time to take a Division, and I do not desire to urge the matter further. At the present moment I only desire to raise some protest—and I think we are bound to continue our protest—against what I consider a very unjust mode of taxation.

*(10.40.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The closing remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and also the remarks of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Murdoch), with reference to the failure of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) to carry out his Conversion Scheme, render it necessary that one should make one or two remarks with regard to that Scheme, and with regard to the difference between it and the scheme which the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has carried out in such a successful manner. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh proposed a scheme for the conversion of a portion of the National Debt at a time when things were somewhat different from what they were when the present Chancellor of the Exchequer made his proposal. When my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh made his proposal Consols stood, I believe, at 103; and I think when the present Chancellor of the Exchequer made his proposal they were only a little over 101. Therefore, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh was justified in endeavouring to obtain for the Public Purse the full advantage of the Money Market of the day.

MR. MURDOCH: I think what I said was that where the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh erred was in consequence of options. If the right hon. Gentleman recollects, there were certain options that were to be converted into Consols.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am not just now discussing the question of where my right hon. Friend erred. What I want to do exactly is to make it clear to the Committee what was the position when he proposed his Conversion Scheme. The Money Market was more favourable then than it was in 1888. The terms which my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh offered were much more favourable to the fundholder than those offered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There were some other peculiarities about that scheme. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh was not allowed by the Parliament of that day in any way to deal with trust funds under the control of the Court or the Government, or even with private trusts, without the consent of the cestui que trust. I remember when the late Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) came down and strongly supported another late Member of the House, Mr. Gregory, when the proposal was carried that there should be no dealings whatever made with Trust Fund Consols except with the consent of the parties interested, and that there should be no conversion of funds under the control of the Court without a number of safeguards conceived in the interests of the fundholder, which practically gave him an opportunity of expressing his own opinion; and there was no man who was more strongly in favour of that view than the late lamented Leader of the House. The Act of Parliament under which the present scheme was carried out materially differed from that. By the Act under which the scheme now in operation was carried out, the cestui que trust was not bound to give his assent at all—a provision was inserted very adroitly.

I often wondered how it was done, and by whom it was done. When the Bill was introduced there were certain provisions inserted in order that the persons interested in the fund might have an opportunity of being heard, and that a trustee should not have power to consent to Conversion without the consent of those for whom he acted; but some words were inserted in the earlier clauses to the effect that accepting new Stock should not be treated as a change in an investment, and would not, therefore, require the consent of those parties whose consent would otherwise be required, and subsequent clauses dealing with consent were quietly dropped. Therefore, practically this Conversion was carried out without the consent of the parties really interested. There were 100 millions of Consols under the control of the Government and the Court, practically, where no consent was required; and, therefore, there was an enormous difference between that operation and the operation proposed by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh. But I could tell the hon. Member for Reading another distinction. He said my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh erred. He did err; but in what did he err? He did not offer any commission to the banker. That was the essential difference between the two schemes.

MR. GOSCHEN: And solicitors.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: And solicitors, and brokers, if you like. I can give an illustration of the erring of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh. My right hon. Friend told me that when he proposed his scheme certain lady friends of his, who were holders of Consols, consulted their bankers as to accepting the Conversion; and the bankers wrote to them telling them on no account to consent to the Conversion—that it would be disastrous to their interests, and that they must at once dissent; and the ladies did dissent, and they did not convert. But when the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, which was much less favourable to these ladies, came in force, the same bankers wrote to the same ladies urging them to accept the Conversion, and they accepted it. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby said, there are two sides to this question. We all admit, no doubt, that the Government of this country ought not to pay one shilling or one penny more interest than the market value of its credit requires; and any Chancellor of the Exchequer who would not take the opportunity of reducing the interest on the National Debt when that interest stood higher than the current interest of the day on similar securities would be neglecting his duty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has frankly told us to-night what his own belief was at the time he offered his Conversion Scheme to the House. He believed the new Stock would stand at par. He did not believe that that Stock would go down to 95. If he did, that was practically confiscation; that was taking away by force of law and by force of Parliament without consent from the capital value of the property of a most helpless class of people. The difficulty of dealing with property of this sort is that you cannot always prognosticate the amount of its value. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby has called attention to the effect this transaction had upon the general investment values in the country. What. I take it, my right hon. Friend meant by what he said was that the effect of the operation of reducing the rate of interest on large masses of trust funds was to take them out of the funds and put them into what are called the "gilt edge" securities, the higher class of Debenture Stock, and other Stocks of that description; and that it threw into that sort of investment a large sum of money which was previously held in Consols, and which, invested in that sort of investment, would bring three per cent. The people who held the "gilt-edge" securities, finding them advancing, sold out, and these were the people who subsequently invested in the purchase of the speculative securities to which reference has been made. My own impression is that there was a great dislocation in the investments in the Stock Exchange. The hon. Member says that bankers were the principal holders of Consols,

and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "What did the bankers think?" We all know that bankers for the last twelve months make it a point to say that they have written down the value of their Consols to 90, which practically amounts to this—that they anticipate that there will be a reduction in the value of their property when a substantial reduction of interest, from two and three-quarters to two and a-half, takes place. I am aware that it has been said that in consequence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's transaction Consols are rising in value, and are now touching 98. But this is the month of May and I have a very strong impression that the National Debt Commissioners, are buying largely in Consols at the present moment, and that the present rise in the price of Consols is owing very much to the investments made on behalf of the public with public money. [An hon. MEMBER: Government money.] Well, Government money—that is the same thing. I should now like to say a few words upon one or two points to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded in his speech; and the first that I would mention is that section of his remarks which related to the remission of taxes. The right hon. Gentleman justified his action upon the whole question of the remission of taxes by reference especially to the Income Tax. I have gone very carefully into the question of the taxes which have been remitted or imposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the period of five years upon which he has challenged our criticisms to-night. I will say nothing at the present moment about the allocation to local purposes—I will deal with that separately, and will take now simply the reduction and imposition of Imperial taxes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has reduced the Income Tax by £4,000,000. I am not going to say anything just now about what are called the wealthy classes, and about the classes that are not wealthy; but there is a great line of distinction between the people who get their living by weekly wages and the people who pay a higher rate of taxation in the shape of Income Tax and the other taxes similar to it. Now, I find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has imposed upon property—he will know the sense in which I am using the word "property"—increased Stamp Duties, increased duties upon Debenture Stock and upon wine; he has increased the Succession Duty and the Estate Duty. This new taxation I put at something over £2,000,000 per annum.

MR. GOSCHEN: More than that.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I make it £2,177,000. It is probably realising more now. Therefore I should say that the advantage which the Income Tax-paying class is receiving is £2,000,000. What has been the advantage of the class that is not Income Tax-paying? The Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken off three great duties—at least, two great duties and one very little one—the Currant Duty is hardly worth counting; I think it is something like £200,000 a year. He has taken off upwards of a million of the Tea Duty, and he claims—and my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) conceded, what I am not prepared to concede—that he has taken off a certain amount of the Tobacco Duty. That remission was no boon in any shape or form to the consumer. When Sir Stafford Northcote put on that 4d. in the pound he said that it would add to the price of tobacco one farthing an ounce—that whereas tobacco was selling at 3d. an ounce, it would sell at 3½d. an ounce, and that, therefore, the consumer would pay the duty. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer came to deal with that he most frankly admitted that that had not been the case, and that the price of tobacco had not been raised one fraction. Tobacco, in fact, was, has been, and is 3d. an ounce. I admit that the addition was a tax on the manufacturers, of which the large manufacturers bitterly complained, and no doubt they recouped themselves, possibly by an increased amount of moisture in the tobacco. I remember one of the largest tobacco manufacturers in England stating to me, after the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in his Budget—he did not follow the right hon. Gentleman in politics—"I am not going to complain of it, for the taking off of the duty will bring thousands into my pocket." Therefore I do not include the Tobacco Duty in the taxes which have been reduced for the benefit of the working classes; and although my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) put the relief which the working classes have received at something like £2,000,000, I prefer to put it at something like £1,250,000. And, so far as the Revenue is concerned, there has been no reduction on that ground. That being so, the million and a quarter having been taken off the same class, the reduction of the Tea Duty is not £1,500,000. I have got it here, though I do not know whether we are to believe these Government statistics now-a-days. It says here, "Tea Duty, result in a complete year."

MR. GOSCHEN: What is the date?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The last Statistical Abstract.

MR. GOSCHEN: What is the date of the statistical year?

MR. GOSCHEN: That is the year 1889-90.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I have got the receipt here for 1891, when the Tea Duty was £3,412,000; the receipt, when the tax was not taken off, was £4,629,000, and therefore it is not £1,500,000. I suppose the Government accounts must be abandoned as not being correct. I only wish the Treasury would give us something that can be relied upon. I will take, then, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own figures. Admit that it is £1,500,000, although the Revenue has not been reduced to anything like that amount, still you have imposed—I admit rightly imposed—a duty upon spirits and upon beer, which is practically equivalent to what has been taken off. So far as the consuming classes are concerned, they are neither better nor worse off by the fiscal legislation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What he has taken off on the one side he has put on on the other. I think it is a very great improvement—it is better to tax spirits than to tax tea. But the enormous sums which have been placed at his disposal in the few years this is the practical effect as far as the reduction of taxation is concerned. He gives the Income Taxpayer £2,000,000; he has not any other class any appreciable at all. He says—"Is it not to take the Income Tax off?" It is an enormous relief. I quite agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the lower end of the middle class, the people who are just struggling up, are very heavily taxed. I believe they are the heaviest taxed people in this Kingdom, the way to relieve them is to gradually reduce the Income Tax, and not to relieve enormous incomes and those enormous incomes upon which the bulk of the taxes are raised, and we are not doing very strongly when we urge that is not the proper mode of dealing with it. We come, then, to the question—in connection with that—of the way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has apportioned to local taxation. It is a great difficulty in finding out what that sum is.

MR. GOSCHEN: Not at all.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Chancellor of the Exchequer says "I don't know." Well, then, am I right in saying that the amount is £7,500,000?

MR. GOSCHEN: Approximately.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: £7,500,000 has been appropriated for the purpose of local taxation, although £3,000,000 of a previous grant has been discontinued. Therefore, the increase represents £4,500,000. We have had some considerable discussion as to whether it bears the burden of these rates, but I frankly confess that I am a disciple of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that point. I have read his Blue Book Report, and I have read the very document he drew up in 1871, in which he believed no writer on political economy has more accurately and more fully described the incidence of taxation between owner and occupier than the Chancellor of the Exchequer did at that time.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

years ago. The impression he left on my mind was this: that in rural districts, in the rating of farms as apart from house property—that which was expressed very concisely the other night by the President of the Board of Agriculture—the rates upon farms were ultimately paid by the owner of the farm. As rates went up rent went down. In towns I would hold the contrary opinion. I believe that the competition for house property, and other circumstances which the Chancellor of the Exchequer mentioned in his book, show practically what he has said to-night: that the onus, the burden, of the rate in the town is paid by the occupier; and, therefore, while I, of course, would not contend that four millions in these circumstances in aid of local taxation is absorbed by the owner, the question I would ask is how much of this seven and a half millions—of which four millions only is additional—has gone to the town and how much to the rural localities? One of the great grounds of complaint that we have against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and against the system of finance of the present Government is that that enormous subvention was granted on unsound and unfair principles. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says—“Will you go to Liverpool, or to Glasgow, or to Birmingham, or Leeds, and ask them to give up their subvention in aid of rates?” No; but what they want is to have their fair share of that subvention which they do not get now. I have got here the Report of the Local Taxation Committee—a Committee chiefly of landed proprietors. How do they apportion this seven millions? About half of this subvention goes to the counties, one-fourth goes to London, and one-fourth goes to the other boroughs of England. To appreciate the full force of that allocation, you have got to remember that the entire rateable value of this Kingdom is one hundred and fifty millions, that ninety millions represents the rateable value of the counties, thirty millions the rateable value of the boroughs, and thirty millions the rateable value of the Metropolis. Well, then, you have got the property which is rated at ninety millions, which is paying a much less rate than is paid by either the Metropolis or the boroughs, receiving more than one-half of the contribution. In connection with that, there is the point raised just now by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton)—namely, as to the respective share which the different classes of ratepayers receive when Imperial Funds are spent in relief of local taxation. Now, I am going to quote a speech delivered in this House by a very able man a good many years ago. He says—

“What I have now to ask hon. Members to consider is the effect which these grants in aid of local rates have had on the incidence of Imperial taxation. I find that Professor Leone Levi estimates that the working classes contribute one-sixth to local rates, and the upper and middle classes five-sixths. This estimate was adopted by Mr. Gladstone when addressing this House in 1873. On the same occasion Lord Beaconsfield took the proportions of one-fifth and four-fifths. I am content to take Lord Beaconsfield's estimate, and, if it is a fair one, it follows that the working classes have been relieved to the extent of so much [and he gives the figures], and the upper and middle class so much. What I wish to call attention to is this: that just in proportion as you make grants from the Imperial Exchequer in aid of local rates, you relieve the middle and upper classes to the extent of four-fifths, and the working classes to the extent of one-fifth.”

If you take a sovereign out of the Imperial Funds—which sovereign I shall be prepared to argue is contributed equally between the upper and the lower classes—and apply it in aid of local rates, the working man will be paying ten shillings and receiving only three and fourpence. Therefore there is another injustice in this transfer. Those who pay rates and those who pay taxes are two entirely different bodies. In his Budget speech of 1887, the Chancellor of the Exchequer fixed the expenditure of the country at £90,000,000 per annum. The expenditure this year, according to the present Budget, is £97,500,000. To this sum we have to add £3,000,000 as the difference in the amount of the Sinking Fund; the large difference occasioned by the new method of dealing with the accounts, and the difference caused by the gross expenditure being now converted into a net expenditure. That cannot be put at less than £1,500,000, and therefore we have practically an increase in five years of not much less than £10,000,000 sterling. That is the salient feature of the finance of the

Chancellor of the Exchequer. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) pointed out to the House the very exceptional seasons of prosperity with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been favoured. I would like to point out that the right hon. Gentleman has had at his disposal such funds as probably no other Chancellor of the Exchequer would have again under such circumstances. The increased production of the Income Tax has actually disposed of one-half of the reduction which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made in it. Last year the Post Office produced £1,000,000 more revenue than it did in the year when the Chancellor of the Exchequer took office. In 1886 the Drink Duty produced under £26,750,000, but last year it produced £31,250,000. Stamps in 1886 produced £11,780,000, and last year they produced nearly £16,000,000. In whichever way we look at the financial position we find an enormous increase in the Revenue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has imposed additional taxation for additional purposes, and the result has been the granting of free education. I do not detract from the credit which the Government have in passing that measure, but in addition to these enormous contributions to local taxation, the right hon. Gentleman has increased the Military and Naval Expenditure of the country by something like £4,000,000. I do not think that this is a financial result of which, during all these years, the Government have any reason to be proud. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was nothing he was more satisfied with in his expenditure than the enormous increase in the Naval and Military Expenditure. There is something to be said for that view if hon. Members are satisfied that they are getting their money's worth for the expenditure. When the First Lord of the Treasury can find a night to discuss the Report of Lord Wantage's Committee, the House will probably be told that our Army is a delusion and a snare. It has been said that the expenditure on the Navy has not been challenged by the Opposition. I think it is one of the happiest features of Parliamentary Government in this country that there is no instance in which a Minister of the Crown has come to Parliament, and on his responsibility asked for a grant of money for the defence of the country, which has been refused. We have, of course, a right to criticise, and we divided on the Naval Defence Act.

MR. GOSCHEN : On the method.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER : No ; on the principle of it—on the principle of depriving the House of Commons of the sole and uncontrolled right of expenditure, and on the association of the House of Lords with the finances of the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he had a surplus. With great respect I say to the right hon. Gentleman that he has not a surplus. I do not refer to the borrowed money, but on his own figures the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not a real surplus. It seems to me that the debate has left untouched the contention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) that in a time of unexampled prosperity the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not paid off the amount of Debt which the country had a right to expect would have been paid off, and that he has made large and lavish grants for the purposes of local taxation. The right hon. Gentleman wants a quotation from the Economist. I should, therefore, like to call the Chancellor of the Exchequer's attention to the following passage, which is taken from the Economist of 29th February of this year. :—

"The essential unsoundness of Mr. Goschen's scheme of local finance becomes more apparent with every new development of it. The effect of the system instead of being to foster economy is to encourage extravagance. The money which really comes out of the pockets of the people is made to appear as a lucky find, which, as it has come easily, may be suffered to go easily."

No one who has had any familiarity with the working of our system of local administration and local expenditure will dispute the soundness of the axiom that if we want true economy the body who spends the money should be the body who raises it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, has made lavish grants which are not being economically or fairly distributed. We complain also that, in the remissions of taxation which the right hon. Gentleman has been enabled to make through the enormous increase in the Revenue during the last few years, he has not dealt with one or two taxes which press heavily on the working classes. The right hon. Gentleman has not availed himself of the opportunity to afford relief in that direction, and he has left untouched the injustice of the Death Duties, the mode in which they are assessed, levied, and paid. Whether it be his fate or that of any one else to deal with the finances of this country in the next Parliament, he may depend upon it that, whether the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party are in power, the country will insist that the injustice of the Death Duties shall be promptly, vigorously, and fairly dealt with.

\*MR. GOSCHEN: I will endeavour in the first place to clear up one point about which there is not much to be said. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has made some remarks with regard to the Conversion of Consols which I think are rather unfair to the great bodies of bankers and solicitors to whom he referred. I think it was unworthy of the right hon. Gentleman to suggest that the bankers and solicitors gave those who consulted them advice, in the soundness of which they did not themselves believe, for the sake of obtaining the 1s. 6d. per cent. which was allowed them in respect of these Conversion transactions. I do not know what view the right hon. Gentleman takes with regard to the honour of the profession to which he belongs; but I hold too high an opinion of the solicitors of this country to believe that they would wrongfully advise their clients for the sake of the small amount they were to receive. The right hon. Gentleman quoted a particular story which was related to the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), but does he realise this? Is it not fair to bear in mind that the bankers themselves, holding millions and millions of Consols, accepted the Conversion just as they recommended their clients to accept it. Therefore, to suggest that bankers and solicitors really gave improper or hired advice, if I may say so, to their clients, is taking a view of the character of two great bodies in this country which I am sure they do not deserve, and which few hon. Members in political discussion would like to impute. The right hon. Gentleman also suggests that bankers write down their Consols to 90, in anticipation of the reduction of interest, from  $2\frac{3}{4}$  to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; and, therefore, he suggested that this valuation is in accordance with the estimate bankers make of the future of Consols.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I said, as a fact, they had written them down. You can put what construction you like upon that.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman put that construction upon it. He does not seem to be aware that the price of Two and a Half per Cents. is now 96. To suggest that, because they expect the present Two and Three-quarter per Cents. to fall to Two and a Half per Cents., they should on that account write them down to 90, seems to me an argument due to carelessness or want of thought on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. It is quite possible that bankers may write down the value of Consols to a little under their real value, as they do that of other securities, so as to have a margin. But I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that bankers would take other means of dealing with Consols than writing them down if they believed they were going to descend to 90. I think they would rather sell out at 96 than write them down to 90. The right hon. Gentleman called the fundholders a helpless class, but I scarcely think that it is a term which it is necessary to apply to them. The next point touched by the right hon. Gentleman was of a more serious character. He alluded to the remission of taxation and contrasted the remission in the case of different classes. What I wish the Committee to remember is that the 2d., which I had taken off, had been placed upon the Income Tax payers in 1885-86 for a special reason. It was put on at a time when there were special financial exigencies. That purpose being satisfied, the Income Tax payers were entitled to have it removed again. I think, under the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman himself would have taken the course I adopted, and would have thought that in this case there was a primary claim to remission. The right hon. Gentleman, however, seems to think that, instead of reducing the Income Tax, we ought to have reduced the tea and other duties. I wonder in what school of finance the right hon. Gentleman has been educated, because I remember that in the time of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) he did not propose during the whole period of office to reduce the Tea Duty. He proposed to sweep Income Tax away altogether, while leaving the Tea Duty not at 4d. as it is now, but at 6d. It has remained for a Unionist Government for the first time during the last twenty years to make an effort in the reduction of the tax on consumable articles, and yet we have such speeches as those delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), because we do not deal more distinctly with these particular classes. The right hon. Gentleman has argued that the amount of loss to the Revenue must be precisely the same as the amount of relief to the taxpayer, but he forgets to take into account that which all financiers consider—namely, the increase of Revenue which is due to increased consumption when duties are taken off. Therefore, how I calculate my million and a half of relief is this: I take the amount of tea consumed at sixpence and the same amount consumed at fourpence; and as that gives a difference of more than a million and a half, I say that the taxpayer is relieved by that amount. The Revenue has not lost so much owing to the increased consumption. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will do me the justice to say that this is a reasonable explanation, and that it is one which does not entail the rejection of the Statistical Abstract, as he suggests must be the case. Then the right hon. Gentleman says that he will not give any credit for taking off this £600,000 from the Tobacco Duty, because the price remains the same. I explained at the time—I thought, at all events, it was perfectly well-known—that through the watering clauses the ounce contains more tobacco and less water than it used to do, and therefore that the workman does get for the same sum a larger quantity of smoking material than he got before. I can show the right hon. Gentleman great inconsistency in his mode of calculation. When he comes to the Beer Duty, he treats the increase as a burden on the masses; and when he speaks of the £600,000 taken off from the Tobacco Duty, he says that is merely relief to the manufacturer. But beer stands in precisely the same position as tobacco. I do not believe the price of beer has changed. The prices are the same. What I do claim is that both should be treated on the same footing. Either let it be said, in taking off these duties, that both fall upon the wholesale dealer, or let them both be treated as belonging to the working classes. Do not let the right hon. Gentleman say in one case that it is relief of the tobacco manufacturer, and in the other that the burden is placed upon the people. I, myself, think that the simplest way to deal with the matter is to say that, by reducing duties on consumable articles, you are taking it off the consumer. I therefore get a million and a half for tea, £600,000 for tobacco, and I think the right hon. Gentleman must also give me the Inhabited House Duty, considering that the reduction began at a rate which would distinctly affect what I may call the poorest middle class, or the upper portion of the artisans. It has been a very considerable relief to a class which I believe deserve it. Then we come to the most disputed item, the relief given to local taxation, upon which I have joined issue with the right hon. Gentleman before, and probably shall have to join issue with him again. He has taken no notice, and no speaker in this discussion has taken notice, of the fact that this is not merely a question of relief of expenditure—it is also a question of better municipal government. I alluded to this in my speech in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, but the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has taken no notice of the point. What I claim is this—and I state it as an absolute fact not to be disputed—that at present a much larger amount of the rates is spent upon what I may call social legislation, that there is a large amount which does not go into anybody's pocket as relief, but is current expenditure. Now I am sorry to see the right hon. Gentleman showed no sympathy of any kind with this expenditure from the rates. He did not enter into—he did not condemn, but he did not enter into—the great and beneficial expenditure from the rates to the advantage of the working classes. He dealt with figures to show that the relief to the working classes is one-fifth and to other classes four-fifths; but does he not know how large a proportion of the expenditure from the rates is directly for the advantage of the masses of the community through Free Libraries, the provision of open spaces, and in other ways? I have spoken of this before—this additional source of revenue is largely spent for the benefit of the masses of the community. Am I to assume that the cost of this social legislation which is offered, and with which I have every sympathy, for the benefit of the masses in large towns and for the beautifying of those towns, is to come from realty only, and that personalty is not to contribute a single shilling? The right hon. Gentleman is very fair in his description of who are the gainers by this relief of local taxation in towns; he admits that it goes to the occupiers, and therefore the whole talk about this money going to the landlords is mere “bunkum,” and merely used for rhetorical purposes. But in the country the right hon. Gentleman says rents will be raised. Yes, if the value of land is rising. If I remember the words used, they were, “the pull will be with landlords when agriculture is prosperous,” but the landlords will not get any relief in higher rents if agriculture is not prosperous; they will not be able to raise their rents in consequence of any increase in the relief to the rates; and, meantime, the great bulk as at present will go to the advantage of occupiers. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Income Tax and Death Duties, and censured me for not dealing with them. As to a graduated Income Tax, I say again the right hon. Gentleman belongs to a new school, because when it was suggested on this side of the House that some changes should be made in the Income Tax, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian said across the Table it would take a century to re-organise the Income Tax. This is not the occasion for the redistribution of the Income Tax. I doubt whether a Session would be sufficient for the purpose. It may be that a time will come when a Session can be given to the discussion; but certainly we could not undertake such a task in the present Session. Now, I think I have dealt with the main points raised by the right hon. Gentleman, except one—that is, the reference to our increased expenditure. I do not understand that there is any of our increased expenditure to which he objects, except our local subventions and our military and naval expenditure. Therefore, the whole controversy turns on this: Have we spent too much on the Army and Navy, and have we been right or wrong in our subventions to Local Authorities? I believe that we have been thoroughly right in our municipal finance; and, as regards our expenditure on the Army and Navy, I say it has never been seriously questioned in the House. The form of it has been criticised, the principle of the control of the House being exercised has been questioned, but the fact of the expenditure being necessary has never been questioned. The expenditure upon free education has not been questioned; the increase in Post Office expenditure has not been questioned; and I say again, as I said earlier in the evening, our expenditure has practically not been challenged in detail or in principle during the course of five or six years. Our expenditure has increased, but I say we have justified it by argument.

in this House and in the country. Now, there are several hon. Gentlemen whom I have to answer on minor points. The hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Murdoch) has asked me whether the withdrawal of light gold might be accelerated by the introduction of one pound notes. Practically there is no need for taking any measures to accelerate the process, because the Bank of England is prepared to take light gold as fast as bankers are prepared to send it in. We are anxious that the banks should send it in rapidly, as they did in the case of the pre-Victorian gold. Then the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Leng) asked me a question in regard to what he called the "bonus" to exporters of British spirit in the shape of the drawback of twopence. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if he will consult the British distillers in Dundee, if he has an interview with them, I shall be very much surprised if they do not convince him that the twopence fixed some time ago is an entirely legitimate drawback. They claim more—they claim that they are at a disadvantage because the drawback is not greater than twopence; but I have looked into the matter and am satisfied that it would be quite impossible to save the Revenue in the manner suggested by the hon. Gentleman. I am precluded by the Rules of Order from dealing with two subjects raised, but perhaps I may be allowed to just allude to the complaint of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Bigwood) by saying that it is a matter of local government—the question of the Middlesex police force. Then as to the question of what my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Rathbone) calls the new Charter for the Bank of England, perhaps I may be allowed to correct the phrase. There is to be no new Charter, only a fresh agreement with regard to the management of the Debt, the interest on the Debt due by the Government to the Bank, and some other minor matters. The Bill I shall have the honour to introduce will not raise any questions of issue or disturb the relations between the Bank and the State. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) spoke of the Tea Duties and partly anticipated my reply, and I shall be prepared to meet him on another occasion if that is necessary. I must correct one error into which the hon. Member has fallen in thinking that the relief to local taxation does not exceed a half-penny or penny in the pound. In some localities the relief will amount to sixpence, and on an average the relief will be threepence in the pound all over the country. He much underrates the relief which will be given to the poorest ratepayer. Only one other matter remains with which I did not deal in my reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. Last year his figures were not answered immediately, and they were quoted afterwards in the country. I wish to be allowed to state shortly the reduction of national liabilities during the past six years in order to correct the mis-statements persistently made. I will take the figures for the last six years and will compare them with the previous six years. In the years from 1880-1 to 1885-6 the reduction of net liabilities was £28,400,000, while in the six years 1886-7 to 1891-2 the reduction of net liabilities has been £38,823,000, showing a difference of £10,423,000 to the advantage of the present Government. These are absolute facts, and I warn hon. Members with regard to all these calculations as to the amount of reductions of Debt, that it is a favourite method with our opponents in dealing with the figures to include, sometimes unintentionally—sometimes carelessly—I hope not with any motive, items which are simply realisations of assets, thereby making the country poorer on one side while paying off Debt on the other. It is by the sweeping up of the money paid in as capital and then paid out as reduction of Debt that the error is made, but the error disappears when you compare the net liabilities at the end of two periods. Let this be fixed as a fact—that by ten millions the reduction of net liabilities has been greater in the last six years than in the preceding six years; and I should be glad—but I do not suppose I shall get my wish—if future controversies are conducted simply on the basis of net liabilities. I will give up the comparison from the amount devoted out of taxation; but, on the other hand, the distinction must be made as to realisation of assets. The figures given by the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton) included the sums paid into the Exchequer as interest by Local Authorities, and he made an error of ten millions in leaving out the surpluses which have gone towards paying off Debt during our time. I think I have answered nearly all the questions put to me. Some very large ones were opened by the remarks of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton); but the hon. Member will excuse, and not attribute it to any want of courtesy, if I do not now enter into them.

(11.52.) MR. PICTON: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the information he has given me. I am glad to find that the relief is so high as he places it, and am astonished to find it is so. But even supposing it is so high as 6d. in the £1 the amount of actual relief is very small to occupants of houses rented at £7 10s. and as is often the case at £4.

MR. MORTON: I should be glad to have a brief expression of opinion from the right hon. Gentleman as to the principle of levying the Income Tax and House Duty.

*(11.53.) MR. GOSCHEN: The point is a very large one whether it is right the Income Tax and House Duty should be levied on the gross or on the net. My view, as I think the hon. Member knows, is that the present system is an anomaly, and that it would be more fair to levy the tax on the net, but with a change of the kind many adjustments would have to be made. If we made the change by itself we should have the charge made against us that we were relieving realty and the owners of property, adding another crime to the many charged against our financial proposals.

(11.53.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): May I remind the Committee that it is important that we should take the Resolutions now, and that there remains opportunity for discussion at a later stage?

Question put, and agreed to.

TEA.

Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duties of Customs now chargeable on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say) on—

INCOME TAX.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year which commenced on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in ‘The Income Tax Act, 1853,’ the following Duties of Income Tax (that is to say):—

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of Property, Profits, and Gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), or (E) of the said Act, the Duty of Six Pence;

And for every Twenty Shillings of the annual value of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act,—

In England, the Duty of Three Pence;

In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Duty of Two Pence Farthing;

Subject to the provisions contained in section one hundred and sixty-three of the Act of the fifth and sixth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-five, for the exemption of persons whose income is less than One Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and in section eight of ‘The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876,’ for the relief of persons whose income is less than Four Hundred Pounds.”

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I do not want to detain the Committee now, but I give Notice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that when the Bill comes before the House in Committee

I shall raise the question of differential rates as between industrial incomes and, spontaneous incomes—as between incomes from capital and from industry; and unless I get some satisfactory indication that the subject will be considered, I hope to take a Division.

Question put, and agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF LAW.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the law relating to the Customs and Inland Revenue. — (The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [Lords.]

Bill re-committed in respect of Clause 3 and a New Clause.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 omitted.

New Clause—

(Assessments for cost of building or rebuilding bridges.)

“So much of sub-section (2) (c) of section sixteen of ‘The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,’ as provides that the cost of constructing or rebuilding bridges shall be provided for in the same manner as the cost of maintenance of existing bridges, is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is enacted as follows: Any assessment leviable under section fifty-eight of ‘The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878,’ for the construction or rebuilding of a bridge may be imposed and levied as the County Council may determine, either on the county (subject to the provisions as to insular districts contained in the said section) or on the district or districts within which such bridge is situate or partly situated, or partly on the county and partly on such district or districts, and such assessment shall be paid one-half by the proprietor and the other half by the tenant or occupier of the lands and heritages on which the same shall be imposed: Provided that nothing in ‘The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,’ or in this Act, shall prejudice the power of borrowing for the purposes of such construction or rebuilding conferred by section fifty-eight of ‘The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878,’ but any assessment in respect of such borrowing may be imposed and shall be payable as in this section before mentioned,” —(Mr. Esslemont.)

—brought up, read the first and second time, and added to the Bill.

Bill reported; as amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

POOR LAW SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

BILL—(No. 276.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The House will, perhaps, allow me to give a short explanation of this Bill. There is one Poor Law school in Ireland, at Trim, under the joint management of two Boards of Guardians, and the managers in the one Union have no power to charge to the rates the travelling expenses incurred in the duties of management. All that the Bill does is to confer that power—a power similar to that which exists in this country. It is much desired, and I think there is no objection to the Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Jackson.)

*MR. JACKSON: The payment of expenses.

MR. SEXTON: I have some acquaintance with the proceedings of Boards of Guardians in Ireland, but I do not know that the expenses of the Guardians are ever supposed to fall on the public funds. The case the right hon. Gentleman desires to meet has arisen, he says, only in one Union; but he has not said whether the Bill is introduced at the instance of the Guardians of that Union. The Bill will have a general application, and, on the whole, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to the postponement for a day or two, that we may have the opportunity to consider it in its application to the 160 Poor Law Unions, and whether the ratepayers approve of such expenditure.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT (1882) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL—(No. 336.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I find that all this Bill proposes to do can be done by means of an Instruction to the Committee on the Municipal Corporations Act (1882) Amendment Bill, which has passed its Second Reading, and, therefore, I move the withdrawal of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order be discharged."—(Mr. Brunner.)

ADJOURNMENT.

IRISH NATIONAL EDUCATION BILL.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

(12.12.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I desire to bring to the notice of the First Lord a matter of particular urgency—a question arising in reference to the Irish National Education Bill. I understand that a deputation from the executive body of the Irish national teachers are now in London, and that they have sought an interview to-day with the Chief Secretary. It has become a question of vital importance to them, considering the Bill proposes to allocate a sum of £200,000 this year and in succeeding years towards the salaries of the teachers, to learn what steps the Government propose to take to secure that the money shall be allocated this year. I wish to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman or from the Chief Secretary whether the executive body of the Teachers' Association have made any representation on the subject; and, if so, what reply has been made? I think it must be evident to every Member in the House that in the general condition of political affairs, and the state of uncertainty as to the duration of this the last Session of Parliament, these officials have every reason to be anxious, so far as their interests are concerned in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman will remember that at an earlier stage I submitted a suggestion that the Bill should be divided, and that the part dealing with the allocation of the £200,000 should be distinct from that part of the Bill which raises questions which, in view of certain declarations of opinion in Ireland, cannot be regarded as other than likely to give rise to considerable debate. There will be no contention as to the allocation of the money, and I would renew my suggestion that this part should be made a separate Bill. I think it will be admitted that the programme before the House—apart from these national teachers' clauses—whatever may be the intention of the Government in regard to the duration of the Session, as to which I have no intention to inquire, is such that it is extremely unlikely that after the Local Government Bill there will be the opportunity of passing the National Education Bill unless its scope is reduced. Therefore, I put my question, will the right hon. Gentleman separate the Bill, and will he make special arrangements by which this money shall be allocated to the teachers in the present year?

(12.15) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am sorry I have not heard from my right hon. Friend (Mr. Jackson) what has passed in the interview with the deputation which I understand the hon. Member to say has waited upon my right hon. Friend.

MR. SEXTON: Such was the intention.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not heard whether there has been such an interview, or what may have taken place. I may say, in answer to the hon. Member's question, that I have seen no reason to alter my opinion as to the advantage of treating as a whole the subject he has alluded to, the allocation of £200,000 and the question of the application to Ireland of some modified form of compulsory education. I am unwilling to divide the Bill into two, as the hon. Member suggests. I will report to my right hon. Friend the purport of what has passed in the short conversation, and can only say now that I hope an opportunity will be found for reading the Bill a second time before we separate for the Whitsuntide Recess; and if the Bill is met with only reasonable controversy, I see no reason to doubt that it will pass into law this Session.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman alter his arrangement, and take the Bill before the Local Government Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have been pressed by hon. Gentlemen to take the Local Government Bill immediately after the Committee on the Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, and I adopted that course, from which I do not think it is expedient to depart.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at twenty minutes after Twelve o'clock.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, in moving the Third Reading of this Bill, I do not propose to revive the subject of controversy which gave rise to some discussion on the last stage of the Bill; there is only one point which was referred to by the noble Marquess on which I wish to say a word or two. The noble Marquess suggested a doubt whether there were any cases of real hardship owing to the regulations upon alienation of assignment of a lease, and owing to a forfeiture for breach of the covenants relating to not assigning. Now, my Lords, I quoted on that occasion one or two cases that had been brought to my notice, and I think it right to say that since that time I have had several communications which point to the conclusion that cases of hardship and harsh and inconsiderate treatment by lessors are by no means rare. The noble Marquess suggested that there might be an inquiry upon the subject. It will be obvious that when persons have had their leases forfeited, and lost money in consequence, a good many of them are unwilling to make known the fact of that loss, and that by a want of care they have placed themselves in a position of that description; and therefore one can quite well understand that there may be many more cases of hardship, such as I have alluded to, than would be likely to be made public. Nevertheless

I shall certainly keep my attention fixed upon the subject, and, although I am not aware how many cases of such hardship the noble Marquess would consider a sufficient basis for legislation, if I obtain such information to a greater extent than I possess at present, I shall propose to invite the attention of your Lordships to the subject on a future occasion. I now move that the Bill be read a third time.

Moved, "That this Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> accordingly, with the Amendments, and passed; and returned to the Commons.

TARGET PRACTICE (SEAWARDS).

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS: My Lords, I desire to call your Lordships' attention to the question that stands on the Notice Paper in my name. In consequence of a sad accident which occurred a few months ago a Committee was appointed to inquire and report on the system under which artillery practice seawards, whether from ships or from ports, is to be carried out. The Committee was composed of three Members of the House of Commons, one of them being Chairman, two captains of the Royal Navy, and two colonels of the Royal Artillery. The greater portion of the evidence has been given in London, but a local inquiry took place at Plymouth, which is the place where the accident, to which I referred, occurred. The next local inquiry is fixed for Friday next to take place at the west side of the Isle of Wight, and it is the subject of that coming inquiry to which I beg to call your Lordships' attention; for, should this scheme be carried out, as indicated in my question, it will simply result in converting into a mare clausum for certain hours on certain days in each week the Needles Channel, the most important entrance for all vessels from the westward to the Isle of Wight, and those that are going from the Isle of Wight into the Channel. The evidence of the Artillery officer, who for his local experience was called before the Committee, gives no idea as to the class and amount and importance of the shipping that passes through the Needles Channel. He stated that few ocean steamers go through the Channel, and none larger than those of the German Lloyds. The witness was I think very much in error. There are numerous other large steamers besides those of the German Lloyds; there are the Hamburg-American, much larger vessels than the German Lloyds; there are the Donald Currie and the Union Cape Mail steamers; there are the West Indian steamers; there are the Brazil steamers. Besides these, there are troopers, and not infrequently men-of-war, passing through the Needles, and the steamers of the London and South Western Railway Company, three or four of which daily cross between Southampton, the Channel Islands, and the French ports; there are some Scotch and Irish traders, and numerous excursion boats during the summer season. But the witness completely leaves out of account the large number of coasting sailing vessels and craft of all description which frequent the Solent; and that is the class which will suffer most if the proposed scheme be carried out. In bad weather frequently the sailing vessels run to the Needles for shelter, and after bad weather one may see twenty or thirty coasting sailing vessels getting under way to go to sea in the Needles Channel. Are these vessels to be stopped or interfered with? I strongly suspect that their captains will not lose the chance of a fair wind and tide in order to obey the instructions of an Artillery officer who wants to fire at his targets, but will pay no heed whatever to such restrictions. I readily admit the very great importance and the very great difficulty in finding stations for the range of these great guns that we have now amongst us; but I am confident the proposed scheme will not avail; it will be impossible to enforce a hard and fast time as to vessels passing through the Needles Channel, unless such enforcement is assisted by a number of tug steamers, aided by despatch or torpedo boats; and I question whether the Admiralty is very anxious to supply these. I hope my noble Friend who is going to answer me will be able to say whether such a prohibition against vessels making use of a much frequented and most important waterway can be legally maintained, and why the summer months have been selected when the number of vessels making use of the Solent and the Needles Channel is enormously in excess of the number at any other period of the year. There are also two other classes of the community to be considered: the poor fishermen, and those who are possibly passing their holidays at the largely increasing and popular seaside resorts in the neighbourhood of the Needles; for during the restricted hours fishing boats and pleasure boats will not be permitted to leave the shore. I trust that some consideration may be given to these subjects which I have ventured to urge, and that some more feasible scheme may be adopted. The principal difficulty is with the guns in Hurst Port, which point towards the Needles Channel; for those of the island shore, from their elevated position, can easily be fired across the Channel into Christchurch Bay, which is very little used by shipping. I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it is the case that evidence has been given by the military authorities before the Target Practice (Seawards) Committee in favour of facilities being given for firing the guns in the forts at the Needles entrance to the Isle of Wight during the summer months; and that the Needles passage, and what is called the North Channel, between Hurst Castle and the Shingles Shoal, should be closed for about two hours for several days in each week for sailing vessels of all descriptions, including pleasure and fishing boats, thereby interrupting the coasting trade which is carried on between ports in the English Channel and elsewhere, and those in the Solent?

*LORD BALFOUR: My Lords, as this Committee has been appointed mainly at the instance of the Board of Trade, it falls to me to reply to the question of the noble Lord. As it stands on the Paper, it asks whether certain evidence has been given to the Committee, and the answer to that must be in the affirmative; a military officer did give evidence somewhat in the direction indicated by the question of the noble Lord. But of course the House and the noble Lord will understand that the Department which I represent is in no way responsible for the evidence which is tendered at the inquiry. My Lords, it seems to me that it would be extremely inconvenient and improper if, under the circumstances of the case as they now stand, I were to express any opinion upon the merits of the questions concerned. The noble Lord has told the House himself that the inquiry is still proceeding, and that there is to be a local inquiry close by the spot affected by the evidence to which he has referred. I venture to think that the speech which the noble Lord has made would afford a valuable contribution to the evidence which might be tendered to the Committee, and that, either by himself or by some one equally conversant with the locality, the noble Lord should put before the Committee the considerations which he has put before the House. I think the House will agree with me that while the inquiry is proceeding it would not be right for a Departmental officer to express any opinion upon evidence which is submitted to the Committee; we should wait surely for the Report of the Committee, and when the Committee has reported it will, I venture to think, be time enough for the Department to consider and make up its mind upon such questions as may be contained in the Report. My Lords, I think I shall be following the usual practice if I express a hope that I shall not be asked at this stage to give any opinion as to the merits of the questions concerned.

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Order of the Day for the Report of Amendments, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, the Amendments which I propose to move on the Report are either verbal or such as are necessary to carry out the intention of applying the Bill to Scotland—a proposal has been received with general satisfaction there—and also for the assimilation in some respects of the laws of the two countries, leaving, wherever it is desired, the Scotch law still intact.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

LORD BALFOUR: My Lords, I have to propose one Amendment in Clause 1, page 1, line 8, after ("may") to insert ("with the approval of the Board of Trade"). The only object of the words is to give an opportunity of protecting any vested interests that may be possessed by officers who are employed by the existing authority, and who, unless some provision is made for their protection, might find themselves out of employment without any compensation on the transference of the duties which they discharge to another authority. The Amendment is approved of by those who are anxious for the passing of the Bill, and I hope your Lordships will agree to it.

Moved, "That this Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>."—(The Lord Balfour.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> accordingly; an Amendment made: Bill passed and returned to the Commons.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 17th May, 1892.

The House met at Two of the clock.

*PRIVATE BUSINESS.*GLASGOW POLICE BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

*(2.10.) MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): Briefly, I will explain how it is I have given notice of the new clause I propose to move. I hope no hon. Member will suppose that the idea suddenly occurred to me to add a clause of this kind to a Private Bill. The Corporation of Glasgow are the promoters of the Bill, and they, among their proposals, brought up a clause (No. 18) similar to this, which, however, was objected to by the Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, and by the Scotch Office it was thought extreme. In accordance with views expressed in opposition to it the promoters modified their clause. It was twice amended, and the clause I now recommend to the House is in the form in which it was finally put before the Committee. Well, the clause was rejected in Committee by four votes to one. The clause, I may say, expresses the deliberate intention of the Corporation and their expressed desire, because, since the promoters became aware that I had given Notice of a Motion to move the insertion of the clause, the Glasgow Corporation, acting as they do for certain purposes as Police Commissioners, passed a resolution thanking me for the action I had taken and expressing a hope that my Motion may be carried. Now, I think it will not be disputed that Glasgow has set an example to many of the large centres of population in respect to matters of this kind. They have combined repression and police action under the law with voluntary philanthropic and religious action, and they have produced the most desirable results. Then they desire to go a step further—the step which is indicated in the clause. Let me also draw the attention of hon. Members to the fact that in this proposal there is no new principle, because we find that the principle of making persons found in improper or unlawful places amenable to the law, as well as the keepers of such places, is recognised in the Gaming Act. If the keeper of a gaming house is convicted, so also are the people found in the house liable to punishment. So also, more or less, does the principle apply to licensed public-houses where the keeper of the licensed house is convicted of the offence of selling drink within prohibited hours. We also punish persons found on the premises. There may be other cases in point as precedents for this clause with which I am not acquainted, but certainly I think these two precedents do apply. It is perfectly clear that persons do not keep such houses as these for their own amusement; but whether it is a gaming house or whether a licensed public-house, or whether a person keeps what is called a disorderly house, in each case it is done for purposes of profit, and I think it is useless to punish those who take the money unless we also punish those who tempt persons to these unlawful actions. For instance, in this very Bill we give power to the police of Glasgow to prosecute persons for betting in the streets, and not only the man who is commonly called a “book-maker,” but those who make bets with him are made amenable. I presume the objection will be raised that this is an attempt to create a new offence by a clause in a Private Bill, and that if such should be passed at all it should be as a general law. Now, on this point I may refer to a Bill which came before the Committee just before the Glasgow Bill, and which affords an illustration of what the Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee constantly do. I do not say the case affords an absolute analogy, for this is rarely to be found. But in the case of the Bournemouth Bill a clause was inserted making the prohibition of games and stone-throwing in the streets applicable to the sea-shore. In the same way we made it an offence to play musical instruments by steam, and to use steam engines in a certain way permitted in other parts of the country. We actually made it an offence for a man to burn rubbish in his own garden if his neighbour thought it polluted the atmosphere. I do not say these are parallel instances, but undoubtedly they are considerable deviations from the general law. There is, then, little force in the objection that this is creating a new offence by means of a clause in a Private Bill. If it is lawful to insert a clause to insure the purity of the atmosphere, then I do not see why, if the Corporation of Glasgow desire it, they should not have this power to assist in the preservation of the purity of the moral atmosphere of their town. I think I need say no more, and will only add, in conclusion, that I have no complaint to make against any of my colleagues on the Committee. They, I am sure, will give me credit for acting honestly in this matter. We have worked harmoniously together on the Committee; and though we have often differed in our opinions and have frequently divided, we have never quarrelled. In this case, however, I feel so strongly that the citizens of Glasgow ought to have this power they desire for the well-being of their town that I venture to appeal to the House from the decision of the Committee.

New Clause—

(Penalty for being in house for an immoral purpose.)

“Upon conviction of any person of having kept, managed, used, or knowingly suffered to be used, any building or part of a building for the purpose of harbouring prostitutes for the purpose of prostitution, any person found in the building or part of the building referred to in the complaint on which such conviction has followed at the time to which such complaint and conviction apply, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, if it be proved to the satisfaction of the magistrate that his presence in such building or part of a building at the time referred to was for an immoral purpose,”—(Mr. Henry J. Wilson), —brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Clause be now read a second time.”

(2.20.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I greatly regret that my first duty in the House as Chairman of the Police and Sanitary Clauses Committee is to discuss this certainly unattractive subject. I acquit the hon. Member who has moved this clause of any motive not highly commendable. For many years he has been a Member of the Committee; and I may say, as Chairman, there is no Member of the Committee to whom we are more indebted for constant attendance and conscientious discharge of his duties on the Committee with knowledge and ability. Still, my duty remains the same. We have to consider the instructions of the House of Commons and the general regulations which govern the proceedings of the Committee. We are bound not to allow any alteration of the general law except upon strong cause shown. We must have proof that the general law is in an unsatisfactory state, and that it is desirable to alter it in the Bill before us, or there must be some circumstances of a local character, which show that it is desirable for the welfare of the section of the community concerned that the alteration should be made in the locality. I am not aware that in the evidence before the Committee it was shown that either of these conditions arose. We were not told that the present condition of the law in this regard was intolerable in Glasgow, or that in the town there was special need for a clause of this kind. We had before us a member of the Corporation who gave us the only evidence tendered in favour of this clause, and when the learned counsel, Mr. Balfour Browne, asked—

“For what reason do you desire to have this power?”

The answer was—

This was the only evidence in favour of the clause, and I may fairly say that evidence of that sort is not sufficient to justify us in altering the general law. There was no evidence to show that the general law was insufficient so far as Glasgow was concerned, and we had no choice in the Committee but to act as we did in pursuance of the instructions given us. My hon. Friend was somewhat unfortunate in his reference to the Bournemouth Bill, because in considering that Bill we rejected clause after clause by virtue of our general instructions, clauses some of which I personally thought would have been desirable, but which we were bound to object to on the principle laid down. As to the general policy of such a clause, I leave hon. Members to discuss it. My duty is to vindicate the action of the Committee, and I hope I have said enough to show the House that we acted according to our duty, and I trust the House will confirm our rejection of the clause.

(2.25.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Our Chairman has entirely answered my hon. Friend, and has left me nothing to say except that I concur in every word he has said. At the outset I may say I have nothing to find fault with in the action my hon. Friend has taken. My hon. Friend is a staunch and conscientious Member of the Committee, and I regret to disagree on this occasion with one whose mature judgment I highly appreciate, and with whom I usually find myself in cordial concurrence. I will not enter the tempting field of ethical and moral discussion. We had in the Committee to do our work under the instructions and restrictions by which we were governed, and we acted in accordance with our instructions in rejecting the clause. We had three reasons for doing so. In the first place, the clause as originally presented to us was utterly, hopelessly, and absolutely unintelligible; and after an explanation, extending over half an hour, we were unable to find the limit to its far-reaching effect. Even now, in its present form, it is not free from that objection. It is a wide extension of the Criminal Law; and if it is expedient to make the extension, then it should be done in a Statute of general application; it should not be smuggled into a merely local Act. In the Eastbourne Bill we did undoubtedly pass one or two clauses inconsistent with the general law, but why did we do so? Because we had witness after witness testifying to the necessity for such regulations for the peace, comfort, and prosperity of the town. But in this instance we had one witness only who stated the motive for the clause. There is nothing to find fault with in that motive, but he made no attempt, nor did any other witness make the attempt, to show us that there was anything in the moral condition of Glasgow which made this special clause necessary. It may or may not be; but there was no evidence that the peace, comfort, prosperity, or outward morality of Glasgow required it. In fact, all the evidence went the other way, and to prove that no town could show a better state in regard to outward morality than Glasgow. No local necessity was shown why we should sanction in a local Act this wide, this formidable alteration in the general Criminal Law. We felt that if we passed the clause we should be going beyond the powers entrusted to us, and I unhesitatingly ask the House to support the Committee in the action taken.

(2.30.) MR. McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I support the Motion for the insertion of the clause. I do not agree that all we have to consider is whether the Committee was justified. That is not what we have to consider. It is a matter of indifference to this House, from our point of view, whether the Committee struck out the clause or not. The Committee, in my opinion, were probably justified in striking the clause out of the Bill, because, as the Chairman of it has said, a Committee should only pass clauses embodying new principles of law when there are certain reasons, some of which he named, for doing so. Therefore the Committee may have been right in rejecting the clause and giving notice to the House that it has done so. But now it is for the House to consider whether, on the merits of the case, it will not re-insert it, as the Glasgow Corporation desires. The Corporation itself practically unanimously wishes for the re-introduction of this clause, and on the 9th May, acting as the Police Commissioners, it passed a resolution thanking Mr. H. J. Wilson, M.P., for the proposed restoration of the clause relating to persons found in brothels for immoral purposes, and it also resolved to send a copy of the resolution to the Members of Parliament for the City, with a request to them to support the action of the hon. Member. That shows that the Corporation of Glasgow desire this clause to be inserted in the Bill. For my own part I think it is a good clause, and one that should be made the general law of the country; but before that is done I think it is desirable that in the second City of the Empire this clause should be tried as an experiment. The Glasgow Corporation has for years been interested in repressive legislation of this class, and I am told by Glasgow citizens that the effect of it has been highly advantageous to the morals of the town. If that had not been the result, the Corporation would not desire to go further with it. The fact that they do desire this clause is the strongest possible evidence that can be given to the House that this repressive legislation has been a success so far. It seems to me that the passage from the evidence which the Chairman of the Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee quoted proves the whole case for the Glasgow Corporation. The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell) stated that the evidence in support of this clause was that the brothels of Glasgow would cease to exist if the Corporation had power to punish their patrons. What could tell more strongly in favour of such a clause? I presume it is the desire of this House that these places should cease to exist. If that is not so, let the House repeal the law which makes them illegal in England. They are illegal in this country, and I presume the defenders of law and order on the other side of the House wish the law to be carried out. Well, we have evidence that if this clause is inserted the law will be carried into effect, and therefore, Sir, I do urge this House to accept this clause. At all events it is our intention to divide the House upon it.

*(2.34.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I wish to say a few words in support of the proposal to insert this clause in the Glasgow Police Bill. Any effort to restrict the traffic referred to in the clause should have, I feel, the warmest sympathy of the House. It is said that this clause is not required; but the evidence given before the Committee points in the opposite direction. I think it would be an advantage rather than otherwise to try the working of this clause in certain towns rather than wait for it to be applied to the whole country. Exceptional legislation has been tried in a great many places. That has particularly been the case with regard to my own country. If there is one evil against which exceptional legislation should be tried, I think it is that which this clause points at. I do not know a worse crime than that which condemns the unfortunate inmates of these houses to a fate worse than death itself. And then we ought to remember the deplorable results which the existence of these houses have upon property in the neighbourhood. Very often persons find the value of their property greatly reduced, if not swept away altogether, on account of some of these brothels being opened in their midst. I believe a law such as is embodied in this clause will protect localities from the opening of such infamous dens. I, for one, would most heartily support the application of such a measure to the whole country, but I believe that is not possible at the present time. We have, however, an opportunity of now trying—in accordance with the wish of the inhabitants of Glasgow—an experiment of this kind, and I believe it will tend to the best results all over the country.

(2.38.) MR. JOHN WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I wish to take some part in this discussion as a citizen of Glasgow, and as representing a part of the City of Glasgow. It has been pointed out by previous speakers that the action of the police of that city has been successful in ridding the streets of open prostitution, and the authorities are now desirous of endeavouring to root out those places which are given up to the purposes of immorality. I wish to take this opportunity of thanking my hon. Friend (Mr. H. J. Wilson) for his courage in standing up for this clause. The Police Bill for the city has been thoroughly thrashed out by the Local Authorities, and I think this House will consider that they know best what is required for Glasgow, and I hope that hon. Members on both sides will vote in favour of the clause. A great deal has been said by the Chairman of the Committee and by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) about interfering with the general law. Well, if the general law of the land is such that these houses cannot be suppressed, the sooner it is altered the better. But I fail to see that this clause will interfere in the slightest degree with the general law, and I hope this House will agree to it.

(2.40.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) : I hope this House will favourably consider and adopt the clause which has been proposed by my hon. Friend (Mr. H. J. Wilson). We have no fault—I do not see how the House could find any fault—with the way in which the rejection of the clause has been moved by the Chairman of the Committee, and seconded by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire. At the same time, I am not able to agree with the reasons of those hon. Gentlemen. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell) began by saying that the Committee were restricted by certain terms, I think, in the order of reference. Hon. Gentlemen felt themselves to a certain degree bound by what they understood to be the view of the House in appointing the Committee, and they are perfectly entitled to that view. But I wish to point out that my hon. Friend himself said that the Committee felt themselves bound—as a Committee appointed by this House for a certain specific purpose—not to introduce any change in the general law unless the general law was shown to be unsatisfactory in its nature. Now that is part of the case. We hold it to be eminently unsatisfactory. The clause as amended and now placed before the House is to this effect—that upon the conviction of any person of having kept, managed, used, or knowingly suffered to be used, any building, or part of any building, for the purpose of harbouring prostitutes, that upon these persons being convicted under these circumstances any person found in the building or part of the building referred to in the complaint at the time, if it is proved to the satisfaction of the magistrate that he was there for an immoral purpose, shall be subject to a penalty of £5. I want to know if that is a serious invasion of what is called the general law on this subject? Now, if it be right that the brothel keeper, the mere agent of those who employ him, should be convicted and imprisoned for keeping the place, is it not to be argued that his clients, or customers, or employers, who are found upon that place at that moment, and who are adjudged to be there for a guilty purpose, should be punished also, instead of being allowed to go scot free? Another proposition advanced in opposition to this clause was that there should be local circumstances suggested when a law of this kind is sought to be applied to one locality. Local circumstances that fully justify the clause have been brought before the House by my hon. Friends on this side. For years the Corporation of Glasgow have been endeavouring, as far as possible, to repress immorality in the brothels and streets of that city. They have successfully administered the existing law as far as it suffices, and they now ask you for a moderate addition to their powers. Is that not a local circumstance which ought to be sufficient to justify special legislation? Now, I must point out how exceedingly moderate and sensible this proposal is. First of all, there is the amplest evidence that the Glasgow Corporation desires it, and the House has listened to one hon. Member for Glasgow who has spoken in favour of it. Secondly, it has been shown that the principle of this proposal, at any rate, is incorporated in the general law. It is analagous to the law under which gamblers are seized in the gaming house, and let me point out that persons found in a private club are treated as participants in the offence which may be taking place there. And then let the House mark the exceeding carefulness and moderation of this proposal. It does not provide that any person found at any time in these places shall be liable to severe punishment, but it provides that when a brothelkeeper is convicted his customers shall not go free. The Chairman of the Committee has said that the Committee felt bound not to entertain this proposal by the terms of the Order of Reference, and they ask the House not to entertain it. I do not see that it would imply a want of confidence in the Committee if the House, in view of the representations of the Glasgow Corporation, did accept this proposal, considering that the Committee felt themselves restricted from entertaining or discussing it. The Corporation of Glasgow are inclined in this case to make what my hon. Friends

call a useful experiment in an admirable direction, and I think we should assist them to do so. I hope this House will take this view, or the view may be forced upon them in a way which will, perhaps, suit right hon. Gentlemen no better than the present. I would ask the House not to refuse a moderate proposal of this kind from a Corporation which has a high character and a long experience which entitles it to make the demand.

(2.51.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I cannot allow this question to go to a Division without stating why I shall support this clause. Analogous powers have been granted with respect to the shebeens, and when a police raid is made on them the persons who are found in the shebeen are liable to be brought before a magistrate and punished. That is precisely what is proposed here, and the penalty is not a severe one. You subject the people found in a disorderly house to a fine of £4, and that is a penalty which is attached to all sorts of petty offences. The inmates of an over-crowded room can be proceeded against, and anyone who has looked through police legislation will have noticed that where the punishment of a fine is imposed, £5 is a very common maximum, and I do not see why it should not be attached to cases of this kind. No one will deny that the action of the Glasgow Corporation in endeavouring to suppress disorderly houses is a laudable one. They have succeeded to a large extent, and I am glad to have the support of the hon. Member for Govan (Mr. John Wilson) in stating that a number of these disorderly houses have been driven outside the city, and the occupants have taken refuge in other places. This is eminently a matter on which the citizens of Glasgow should be consulted, and the constitutional exponents of their wants must be the Town Council. This Bill has not been sent up here without ample discussion in the Town Council, and a large number of the clauses have been the subject of very considerable discussion. The Bill has been before the Committee for more than a year; and when it is remembered that the Town Council of Glasgow have passed a unanimous vote thanking the hon. Member who has brought this matter forward, and asking the Scotch Members to assist him in the retention of this clause, and that this has been done without any protest on the part of any section of the people of Glasgow, I think it will be admitted that a strong case has been made out. There is, unquestionably, a strong feeling in Glasgow that the Corporation should be entrusted with these powers, and I see no reason why they should not.

(2.55.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I cannot help expressing surprise that no Member of the Government has spoken on this matter. There is the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Lord Advocate of Scotland, the Home Secretary himself, and several other officials, and yet they say nothing about the intentions of the Government. I want to know whether the Lord Advocate, as counsel for the Established Church of Scotland, is prepared to oppose this clause? The City of Glasgow is endeavouring to deal with a great and crying national evil, and it asks that the law, as it relates to these places, shall be assimilated to the law in other matters of the same kind. We have been told that the Committee threw out this clause; but if they did so because they felt that the powers conferred upon them by this House did not permit them to deal with it, I would remind the House that our powers are not limited in that way; and, further than that, it would not be inconsistent for any Member of the Committee who in Committee voted against this clause, for the reasons I have stated, to now support the clause before the House. No one can deny that the House is perfectly competent to deal with this matter, and I think this is a very reasonable, moderate, just, and wise proposal. It seems to me that when a clause comes before us with the local claims that this does, it is curious that it should be opposed, but that the Government should sit still and no doubt silently vote against this clause without stating their reasons for it is more than I can understand. I would move the Adjournment of the Debate rather than that the matter should pass like this ; but, as I see the Under Secretary (Mr. Stuart Wortley) is about to rise, I will give way to him.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) : No one in this House has better reason than the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down to know the views of the Government on this question, for no one has more fully or more recently availed himself of their known views as the point of procedure here raised. The opinion of the Government is that alterations in the Criminal Law of this far-reaching nature should not be made in Private Bills on evidence that is not before the House, and cannot be before the House. This clause comes before the House in a doubly bad position. It comes before the House as an alteration in the general law in the direction of creating a new offence, and also in the position of having been rejected by the Committee which this House has specially selected for the purpose of ascertaining on sworn testimony, and with the assistance of skilled counsel, whether there does exist in this particular case any local need for legislation. It comes before this House like a charge at a Court of Assize which has been thrown out by the Grand Jury. We had a recent experience in the Eastbourne case of the unwillingness of the House to make a special exception in the Criminal Law—an unwillingness strenuously counselled in the very quarter from which this clause is now pressed upon us. I submit that the House will do well not to entertain such a very far-reaching proposal, except in connection with a measure intended to apply it to the whole of Her Majesty's subjects.

*(3.0.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley) : I must say, after having listened to the argument of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stuart Wortley), that this case is not on all-fours with the Eastbourne case. The two are entirely different. The Eastbourne case was practically a proposal to rescind a special law granted to a certain locality. What we are now asked to do is to give additional powers to carry out the law which exists everywhere at the present moment. These disorderly houses require police supervision and the strong arm of the law ; and the ordinary law has been well tried in Glasgow with a view of bringing some sort of order into these houses, or, at all events, to keep them within the limits of the law. The Corporation come now and ask us for additional powers to carry out the law. The hon. Gentleman said the Committee threw out this clause like the Grand Jury throw out a bill at an Assize ; but here, again, I contend that the cases are entirely different. If it were explained that the Committee threw out this clause because they thought it did not come within the province of the inquiry that had been placed before them, that would make an important difference. It seems to me it is perfectly open to the House to give additional powers to a municipal body in order to put down gross immorality which they find cannot be put down without these additional powers. It does not require any great alteration in the Criminal Law, and I think it is a pity that the Government will not assist in these small alterations of the law to facilitate the action of the Local Authorities in putting down the immorality which exists in all the large towns. As far as I can understand, we are only asking that Glasgow should have powers which practically exist elsewhere ; but if it were a question of stretching a point and giving extra powers to a great municipality, I think we might trust them, and the only thing I regret is that they have not the power to do what they ask without coming to this House. It seems to me that everyone who is anxious that immorality shall be restrained as much as possible in our large towns should support this clause which has been brought forward by the hon. Member for Holmfirth (Mr. H. J. Wilson), and I must once more express my regret that the Government should have stated in such very strong language their opinion that this clause would be a bad thing.

(3.5.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) : I shall vote in the same Lobby as my noble Friend who has just sat down (Earl Compton) ; but I scarcely agree with a single word

he has said. It will be in the recollection of the House that this Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee was appointed by this House in order to prevent unwise extensions of the Common Law. A number of very extraordinary proposals were made in Private Bills, and Mr. Hopwood, who is no longer a Member of this House, obtained the appointment of this Committee in order to restrict the practice and to prevent such cases in the future. The Chairman of the Committee has made a speech this afternoon, and has rested his opposition to the clause entirely upon the motives which prompted the institution of the Committee. He said that the Committee could not, under the powers delegated to them, entertain this clause. I think he is entirely right. The Committee could not have accepted this clause and allowed it to remain in the Bill. But what the Committee could not do, we, the House, are perfectly at liberty to do. It is said that this is a question of law, and it is a proposal to make that an offence which is not now an offence. But we can look at the proposal on its merits and see whether this proposal is one that we are bound to resist, because it will be local in its application. The proposal is that when the keeper of a disorderly house is convicted of keeping a disorderly house, the persons found in the house—and I take it that the clause applies to both males and females—for the purpose of disorderly conduct, and who by their presence may be said to promote disorderly conduct, may be subject to penalties. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) pointed out, there is a precedent for legislation of this kind in the Gaming House Act, and there is a precedent in the legislation which was directed against bear-baiting, cock-fighting, and other amusements of that kind, under which not only the persons who promoted them were punishable, but the persons who assisted and encouraged by their presence were also liable to limited penalties. Now, the Corporation of Glasgow, after much discussion and much deliberation, come to the House and ask, in order that they may prevent the commission of that which is an offence under the general law, that they should be allowed to try a legal experiment. I confess I think there is much to be said in favour of making this the general law, and as it is desired by Glasgow with such unanimity, I am prepared to assent to it. It has been said that this is a new crime, but there is a great difference between crimes and mere police offences, and I see no objection to the clause, and I shall vote in its favour if it comes to a Division.

*(3.9.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): All of us who have been at work in the cause of social improvement will realise ~~that some effort is needed~~ to do away with a great deal of the immorality that exists. It is an unsavoury subject, and I am sorry to say that no one can speak on these matters without being regarded as an enthusiast, but we must recognise the fact that something must be done to improve the state of affairs in this country. I do not say that this is what we want, but it is an experiment determined upon by a large and influential body of men who can have no other wish than the improvement of the morality of the great city which they are elected to govern, and I shall be glad to support the proposal.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: My hon. Friend has asked why the Lord Advocate has not spoken. I can tell him. It is because the Scotch Office has no objection to the clause.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The hon. Member is in error. The Scotch Office reported against the clause on the ground that it was an invasion of the general law.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: The Committee were told in the Report from the Scotch Office, which I have in my hand, that the clause was too stringent and ought to be modified, and this very important modification was made, that whereas at first the burden of proof was thrown on the accused to show he was not there for an immoral purpose, in the form in which the clause is now presented the burden of proof is thrown on the accuser. A representative from the Scotch Office was present to assist the Committee, and he stated that in its modified form there would be no objection to the clause. I find no fault with the Committee and entirely agree in what has been said by most of the speakers that those who felt hampered by the Instruction of the House might very well vote against the clause in the Committee, and yet vote in support of it in the House.

MR. HALDANE (Haddington) : I sympathise very much with the general object of those who support this proposal ; but I think it wants more consideration than it has yet received, as it is a most serious alteration of the law. In it two distinct offences are dealt with. One is keeping and systematically using a house as an improper house, and the other is the proposal to convict anybody who is there, not for the purpose of assisting in keeping the house, but for an immoral purpose. You do not in the second part of the clause connect the mind of the person you propose to punish with the substantial offence—the intention to keep an immoral house—struck at in the first part of the clause ; it creates an offence quite distinct from that which is the subject of the earlier part of the clause. The first part deals with persons having kept, managed, used, or knowingly suffered to be used, any building for the purpose of harbouring prostitutes for the purpose of prostitution. That is one thing, but when you deal with the people found in the building, it is a different kind of offence. The clause seems to me to be another illustration of the immense difficulty of trying to alter the general law in special Statutes ; and, while I am in sympathy with every attempt to improve the condition of our great towns, I do not see my way to support my hon. Friends in the case of this particular clause.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) : I do not like to go to a Division without expressing my reasons for opposing the clause. In Glasgow, I am glad to say, we have thoroughly pure streets—streets as free from trouble as any town I know ; but this clause, which is now being discussed, does not give any additional power to the authorities either to clear the streets or put down brothels or disorderly houses. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken is under a slight misapprehension as to that. The police have most stringent powers elsewhere to put down these houses. This clause does not give additional power to deal with these houses, but the power to deal with individuals who frequent them—that is to say, it makes sexual immorality in itself a punishable offence in any man or woman. I think that is too strong a clause to bring in in a Private Bill, even for the second city of the Empire. It is a matter for argument as regards the general law of the land ; but I do not see that it is possible, either as a matter of general policy, or considering the amount of discussion the provision has had in Glasgow, to bring in a clause so new and going back so completely to ecclesiastical discipline as this would be. Therefore, while I fully recognise the spirit in which those who support the clause are acting, I do not feel that it would be safe to support it. No evidence whatever was given in support of it before the Committee, except an expression of opinion on the part of a member of the Town Council that thereby brothels, and, I suppose, immorality altogether, would be put down. I do not think we have any sufficient foundation for making such a great change in the general law.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) : I think the last speaker has entirely mistaken the purpose of the clause. It is not intended to put down sexual immorality ; you never can do that. Why I support the clause is because it appears to be the only manly and Christian way in which this subject can be dealt with. You have already abundant means of punishing the wretched creatures who keep these dens of infamy, but there is one class you do not touch, and that is the men who take the money to these places and keep them in being. If the law is strong enough to deal with the people who take the wages of infamy, let us have the common honesty and decent courage to strike at those men, who now go free, whose patronage keeps these hells in existence. It is because I believe that the clause will strike at the root of the evil that I shall vote for it.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

QUESTIONS.

GIVING SECURITY FOR COSTS IN COUNTY COURTS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that, while suitors resident in England and Ireland can sue a debtor in Scotland without giving security for costs, a person resident in Scotland or Ireland suing a debtor in an English County Court is compelled, under Order 5, Rule 7, to find security for costs to the satisfaction of the Registrar before a summons is issued; and whether he will endeavour to get this anomaly rectified?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) : I was not aware of the existence of any such difference in practice as is referred to until I saw the question of the hon. Member, and I cannot, therefore, believe that any widespread grievance exists. I will, however, look into the matter.

NEW POST OFFICE IN LISBURN.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General when it is proposed to commence the erection of the new post office in Lisburn?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, Ormskirk) (who replied) : The Board of Public Works in Ireland report that they expect to make a contract in July next for the erection of the new post office at Lisburn.

THE AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the amount paid last year for the conveyance of the Australian mails on twenty-six occasions by ordinary express train from Naples to Calais; whether he can state the amount which would have been payable if those mails had been sent by the special express service from Brindisi to Calais; whether he can state, or estimate, the weights of letters and other mail matter respectively which arrived from Australia by the last Orient Steam Navigation Company's vessel at Naples, and which were transmitted overland to Calais for London; and whether he will take into consideration the fact that the amount paid for letters by the special train from Calais to Brindisi, and vice versa, is ten francs eighty cents. per kilogramme, against four francs per kilogramme for letters charged by ordinary express train from Naples or Brindisi to Calais, and also to the fact that the Australian mails arriving in Naples, and forwarded thence by the ordinary express trains, arrive in London from two to four days under contract time?

MR. FORWOOD (who replied) : The answer to the first paragraph is £5,265; to the second £10,089; to the third, letters and postcards 1,469lbs. 7oz., other articles 14,126lbs. 2½oz.; to the fourth, the amount paid for letters by the special train is not exactly ten francs eighty centimes a kilogramme, but ten francs forty centimes. The contract with the Orient Company is not for delivery in London, but at Naples. The average period of arrival at Naples before contract time in 1891 was two days nine hours, and of the Peninsular and Oriental at Brindisi two days two hours. The conditions of the service are not identical.

POLITICAL PRISONERS ON THE GOLD COAST.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what was the date of the last Report from the Governor of the Gold Coast respecting political prisoners confined in that Colony; at what intervals has he instructions to report on their condition, place of confinement, and cause of detention, and how often has he done so since the year 1883; how many political prisoners have been tried and convicted by the ordinary law, and how many detained under Ordinances of the Gold Coast Legislative Council since the year 1883, how many have died in confinement since that date, and how many have been released; are there any persons now detained against whom no charge has been preferred, and, if so, how many, and since when; is Bo Amponsam, late King of Denkera, against whom a charge was made and dismissed, and who was detained under Ordinance No. 5 of 1888, still imprisoned, and is Geraldo de Lima, against whom a charge of murder was not substantiated and who was detained under Ordinance 15 of 1884, still imprisoned; and, if so, will he be brought to trial or discharged; what legal means is there existing at the Gold Coast of testing the legality of the arrest or detention of political prisoners in that Colony; and will he lay upon the Table the most recent Report from the Governor on these matters?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The date of the last Report is 28th July, 1891. The Governor has instructions, as I stated in my reply to the hon. Member on the 2nd instant, to report every six months. These instructions were given by despatch dated 20th May, 1891. The Governor will be asked to supply the information mentioned in the third paragraph of the question. The fourth paragraph was answered by me on the 2nd instant. There are five Gold Coast political prisoners against whom no charge has been preferred before the Courts, as their offences are not such as the Courts could properly take cognizance of; but their release would be dangerous to the peace and order of the Colony and Protectorate. Bo Amponsam, ex-King of Denkera, died in Elmina Castle of cerebral apoplexy on 15th November, 1890. Geraldo de Lima is still detained as a prisoner. He cannot now be brought to trial, and in the Report of July last the Governor stated that he could not recommend his release. The subsequent Report which should have been sent in January has not yet been received, probably owing to the Governor's recent illness from influenza; but it has been called for. For information with regard to Geraldo de Lima's past history, I may refer the hon. Member to the Blue Book (C. 4477) of July, 1885, which will show what a dangerous character he is. The answer to the sixth paragraph is that there are no legal means. It has long been recognised by successive Governments that, in the peculiar circumstances of the West African Colonies, it is occasionally necessary to arrest and detain persons in custody under authority conferred by special legislation. The exercise of this power has, however, always been most carefully watched by the Secretary of State, and has only been resorted to when absolutely necessary for the safety of the Colony. As regards the last paragraph, the Report merely records the Governor's opinion that at the date at which it was written it would not be possible to release the prisoners; but I will show the Report to the hon. Member if he desires it.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has seen a letter recently published in the Gold Coast newspaper by Geraldo de Lima, appealing to the English people for justice, having failed to get any justice from several appeals to the Government?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I have not seen the article to which the hon. Member refers. But if the hon. Member will read the Blue Book I have mentioned he will find that Geraldo de Lima is one of the most dangerous characters in the country.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: What is the date of it?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: July, 1885.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: But does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that the Members of this House are to believe all that is stated by the Governor?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the constant breaches of the Merchant Shipping Act in the ports of Shields and Sunderland by boarding masters, and particularly by one boarding master named Charles Nielson, of South Shields; whether he is aware that Nielson conveyed ten foreigners from South Shields to Sunderland, placed them on board a tug, subsequently transporting them to the sa. Burlington, in the Sunderland Roads, and that the deputy shipping master signed such men, well knowing that they were supplied in contravention of the 147th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which provides that it shall be unlawful for any person other than the owner, or master, or mate of the ship, or some person who is a bona fide servant, to supply seamen under such circumstances; and whether the President of the Board of Trade will enforce the above section of the Act by taking proceedings against the boarding master for supplying men as aforesaid and also against the deputy shipping master for signing on men so supplied?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Seamen's and Firemen's Union have drawn my attention to the case of the ss. Burlington. I have received a report from the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine at Sunderland, from which it appears that the master of the ship made all the necessary arrangements with the office of the Shipping Federation for obtaining the crew, and that it was at his request that the crew signed on board the vessel. In these circumstances, I do not at present think it is a case for a prosecution; but before deciding, I have directed further inquiries to be made as to the position and action of Nielson in the matter.

CADASTRAL SURVEY OF BEHAR.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has decided to push on the operations for a Cadastral Survey of Behar, notwithstanding the serious distress prevailing there, and the adverse opinion of nearly the whole of the local officers; whether the Government of Bengal has received urgent protests against the measure from the representatives of the tenant cultivators of the province, and whether the Board of Revenue has stated to the Lieutenant-Governor that, certainly in one district, and probably in others, "a general enhancement of rent might result from the Survey"; whether the Lieutenant-Governor has admitted that the result of the Survey will be "an increase of the rents now paid by the most influential among them" (the cultivators), and whether, on the occasion of an experimental Survey made in Behar, the tenants ran away on the approach of the Survey party, and what is the total amount of the estimated cost of the Survey in the four districts of North Behar that will fall on the cultivators, and through what agency, in how long a time, and by what instalments, will this charge be exacted from them?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): (1.) The present intention is to begin the Survey in parts of two districts of North Behar in October next, by which time, if the coming rainy season is favourable, the distress will have abated. The Secretary of State is not aware of the adverse opinion of nearly the whole of the local officers. (2.) Representations against the Survey have been received, and publicly answered by the Local Government in Bengal. It is the case that the Board reported that there might be an enhancement of rent in the Champaran District. (3.) The words quoted are to be found in a letter from the Bengal Government. The officer who made the experimental Survey reported that the ryots, as soon as they understood the matter—

"Attended the Survey work readily, and took pains to see that their lands and rents were correctly recorded—they took an interest in the proceedings, and recognised the value of the record."

(4.) Neither the proportion of the cost that will fall upon the ryots nor the manner and mode of incidence have yet been settled. The whole cost of the work is not expected to exceed eight annas per acre.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: Arising out of the answer of my hon. Friend, I should like to ask him whether the House is to understand that this Cadastral Survey has not been commenced and will not be commenced until the failure or otherwise of the coming monsoon has been established, that is to say not until October; and is it a fact that no appointment to the headship of this Survey has been made in Bengal?

*MR. CURZON: The latter part of the question of the hon. Gentleman is new, and I shall be glad if he will put it down on the Paper. With regard to the first part of the question, it is the case that the Survey will not commence, as I said in the opening words of my reply, till October next. Whether its commencement will or will not depend upon the nature of the monsoon I cannot say at this moment; but I believe myself that it will not depend upon that factor.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India when the Return ordered 8th March will be printed, giving the Correspondence between the India Office and the Government of India on the proposed Cadastral Survey of Behar?

*MR. CURZON: The Return moved for by the hon. Member, ordered 8th March, has not been ordered to be printed; but the printing of it is not a matter over which the Secretary of State has any control. Perhaps the hon. Member will communicate with the proper authorities.

NEWFOUNDLAND AND THE FRENCH SHORE BILL.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, as reported in the Times of the 16th instant, the Newfoundland Assembly have rejected the French Shore Bill, and whether it is correct that that Bill was altered after three of the delegates, Messrs. Emerson, Movine, and Munroe, had left London; and, if so, to what extent the Bill has been altered, and why?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Bill has been thrown out. The three delegates named left while the negotiations were in progress; when, of course, the Bill had not assumed its final form. But the Premier, Sir William White-way, and Mr. Harvey, who is also a Member of the Colonial Government, remained, and were distinctly understood to hold full power to continue the discussion, otherwise the negotiations must have come to an end. The principle of the Bill—namely, the appointment of Judicial Commissioners and the creation of a Court—had been agreed to before the three delegates left, and the subsequent alterations related to the details of the measure, and could not be explained within the limits of an answer.

Mr. Curzon

PETROLEUM IN THE SUEZ CANAL.

MR. GROTRIAN (Hull, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the petitions of British shipowners representing about five million tons of shipping using the Suez Canal, in which the shipowners strongly protest against the provisional regulations, and the proposed authorisation of the passage of tank steamers laden with petroleum on the waters of the Canal by reason of its climatic and other exceptional conditions; and, in view of the fact that the shipowners' protests have been sustained to the fullest in the Report of the eminent petroleum authorities, Sir Frederick Abel and Mr. Boverton Redwood, Her Majesty's Government will instruct the British Directors on the Board of the Suez Canal to urge, as Directors, upon the Suez Canal Company, that the whole question shall be re-considered, with the object of securing the protection of navigation in the Suez Canal?

MR. AIRD (Paddington, N.) had notice of the following question: To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have communicated to the other Signatory Powers under the Suez Canal Charter the fact that British shipowners, representing over five million tons, have protested against the provisional regulations and proposed authorisation of the passage on the waters of the Canal of tank steamers laden with petroleum, as a danger which threatens the security, the safety, and the freedom from interruption of the Suez Canal?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Perhaps the hon. Member for Paddington will allow me to answer his question at the same time. In answer to the hon. Member for Hull, I have to say that the Report of Sir Frederick Abel and Mr. Boverton Redwood has been referred to the British Directors of the Suez Canal Company. In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Paddington, I beg to say that I think the hon. Member is under a misapprehension. There are no Signatory Powers to whom the suggested communication could be made. The original concessions for the formation of the Company and for the construction of the Canal were granted to M. de Lesseps by the Viceroy of Egypt and confirmed by the Sultan's Firman. So long as the Company complies with the stipulation in the Concession of 5th January, 1856, to treat the flags of all nations equally, Her Majesty's Government have no locus standi to interfere with the decisions of the Company.

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the statements by Mr. Hume Nisbet, that in 1886 a labour vessel came into the Maryborough River and that violence and ravishments are perpetrated by the lawless crews of the labour vessels upon the almost nude native women whom they convey to the labour plantations; whether he has seen Dr. Paton's statement made in 1889, that at a hospital on the Queensland plantations which he visited he found the patients to be nothing but native women and girls about to be confined in child bearing, and that many white children were borne by them; and that multitudes of native women died at the Queensland plantation hospitals from abuse on the plantations; had the Queensland Government anything but the bare word of the ship's agent and crew as to whether returned labourers were landed on their own islands and amongst their own people; and whether he has seen Dr. Paton's statement that in one case many had been landed on an island twenty miles from their home, while the ship's company declared they had fulfilled the conditions; and whether many natives were murdered through being placed amongst hostile tribes; whether it is true that the Commissioner of British New Guinea has forbidden the recruiting of Kanakas from the territory under his jurisdiction; is he aware that on the islands of the New Hebrides from which these men were recruited twenty-three distinct languages are spoken, many of which are unknown to anyone but the natives, and that in consequence the conditions of their engagements could not have been explained to the natives; and whether in view of these facts, the Government still adhere to their decision to allow the Act to become law?

"Deluged with blood and filled with wounded men, through a rising of the cargo on board";

*BARON H. DE WORMS: In answer to the first and second paragraphs of the hon. Member's question, my attention has not been drawn to the statement made by Mr. H. Nisbet, nor have I seen that of Dr. Paton of 1889. The Secretary of State cannot accept these statements as correct without inquiry; but the attention of the Colonial Government shall be drawn to them, and they shall be asked to report. With regard to the third paragraph, the Queensland Government Agent is instructed to attend the vessel, and to see that the regulations are carried out. I believe it is a fact that some years ago returned labourers were occasionally landed in error upon other than their own islands. This arose from the difficulty of identifying the islands, which were then imperfectly known. I have not seen the statement of Dr. Paton referred to. As regards the fourth paragraph, the prohibition of recruiting Kanakas in New Guinea is contained in a New Guinea Ordinance of 1888, which was approved by the Queensland Government. In reply to the fifth paragraph, I am aware that there is a great diversity of languages in the islands, and considerable difficulty has, in the past, been experienced as regards interpretation; but this difficulty is diminishing, in consequence of the large number of labourers who have now been returned to their homes from Queensland and other places, and who are able to explain to their fellows the nature of the agreement they are entering into. As regards the last paragraph, I would call the hon. Member's attention to a letter from Bishop Selwyn, late Bishop of Melanesia, which appeared in the Guardian of 4th May of this year, in which he says—

"I cannot help feeling that the indiscriminate condemnation of the traffic which has been expressed is likely to do more harm than good. It was true of the traffic in its beginning. It is not true of the traffic as now conducted."

I can add nothing further to the full statement I made yesterday.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial Office is in possession of any Report from the Government of Queensland respecting the manner in which the Kanaka traffic has been carried on since 1886 under the Regulations at present in force; and whether he will lay such Report upon the Table?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: A Report has been issued annually since 1889 by the Queensland Immigration Department, and printed among the Sessional Papers every year. These Reports will be included in the Papers to be laid before Parliament.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us when he may have them?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: With the least possible delay. I cannot fix the date.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Before the Vote on Account?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot fix the date; it is impossible.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Revised Regulations respecting the Kanaka labour traffic have been issued by the Government of Queensland; and whether he will lay a copy of these upon the Table, and also a copy of the Regulations they are intended to supersede?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The existing Regulations will be included in the correspondence to be laid before Parliament; and the revised ones, if not received in time for that Paper, will be added in a supplementary one. A telegram has been sent requesting that copies may be sent home as soon as settled.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether it is not a fact that when he was asked a question on this subject he read a telegram to the House stating that these Revised Regulations were either issued or were about to be issued?

Baron H. De Worms

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Did I not understand the right hon. Gentleman yesterday to say that he had telegraphed that all these Revised Regulations should be sent by telegraph, and that they should not be sent by post?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No, I did not promise that; I promised to telegraph for them. In reply to the previous question, I am not aware that these Revised Rules have yet been issued, or are in process of revision at this moment.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Perhaps it would clear up the matter if I asked the right hon. Gentleman the question whether I am right in understanding that there are two sets of Papers—first of all, Papers which he will lay immediately, and, secondly, those Regulations which he will lay when they arrive?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes.

MR. BRYCE: And will the right hon. Gentleman also say when the Regulations leave Queensland, and when he expects them?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot say when they leave Queensland, or when they are likely to be here.

MR. BRYCE: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to inquire?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I sent a telegram this morning on the subject.

LIMERICK FISHERMEN AND THE CONSERVATORS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has any information as to the condition of the two fishermen, Michael Cronin and M'Inerney, who were shot by the Limerick Fisheries Conservators' bailiffs on the 8th instant; whether the revolvers have yet been taken from the bailiffs, or is it proposed to do so; whether he is aware that these fishermen, who have to live by their calling, were duly licensed to fish, and were engaged on their own waters when the chief bailiff's steam launch ran into their nets and destroyed them, and when they resisted they were fired upon; and whether he will cause the inquiry repeatedly asked for by the fishermen into the composition of the management of the Fisheries Board to be held at once?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): This question is the subject of legal proceedings, and I do not think I can add anything to what I said yesterday; but I shall make inquiry.

LABOURERS' DWELLINGS IN DERRY.

MR. MULHOLLAND (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether representations in accordance with the provisions of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts have during the last six months been received by the Limavady Board of Guardians from Aghanloo, Myroe, Fruithill, and Lislane; whether any improvement schemes have been prepared by the Sanitary Authority; whether a memorial, in accordance with the provisions of the Labourers Act, 1891, has been received by the Local Government Board from any of these districts; and whether it is his intention to obtain a Report upon the sanitary condition of the cottages in this part of County Derry from the Inspector to the Local Government Board?

MR. JACKSON: Representations have been received by the Limavady Board of Guardians from persons residing in the districts mentioned. The Guardians, after reading reports from the medical officers of health, decided that new cottages were not required in the electoral divisions of Aghanloo and Fruithill, there being several unoccupied houses in those districts. They also decided that the owners of the houses represented to be unsanitary should put them into a sanitary condition. As regards Lislane electoral division, the Guardians are of opinion that it has a sufficient number of houses. In Myroe electoral division they are taking steps for the erection of two cottages. Representations have been received by the Local Government Board on the subject; but, under the circumstances represented, they have decided not to interfere at present with the Guardians' discretion in the cases.

COAL GAS STILL.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that several prosecutions have been and are being conducted by the Inland Revenue against Gas Companies, especially that in Sunderland, and against certain chemical manufacturers of the products of coal gas, for infringing an Act passed in 1846 (9 and 10 Vic., c. 90) making it compulsory for every person keeping a "still" to take out a licence for the same, and pay a duty of 10s. per annum, and in default a penalty not exceeding £50; whether stills for the manufacture of gas products have been in use for upwards of thirty years without any attempt to tax them; whether such stills come under the Revenue Act for the prevention of the manufacture of spirits by unlicensed persons; and whether, if the Inland Revenue wish to tax a piece of apparatus which is not used for distilling spirit, he will direct the preparation of an Act of Parliament for the special purpose, instead of permitting an old Act to be used in such cases?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): There has been a prosecution against the Sunderland Gas Company at the instance of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for recovery of the penalty of £50 imposed by the Act 9 and 10 Vic., cap. 90, for keeping a still without a licence. The prosecution was heard on the 6th inst. and dismissed, and a special case is to be stated for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division as to whether the still used by the Company is a still for the keeping of which a licence is required under the Act. In the opinion of the Board of Revenue these stills are capable of being used for the production of spirit. But as the matter is still sub judice, I will not express any opinion upon it.

CONVICTS IN CHATHAM PRISON.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether James M'Kevitt, sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude at the Liverpool Assizes, 1881, is still confined in Chatham Prison; why was he not removed to Portland Prison with the treason felony convicts; when will he be entitled to discharge on a ticket-of-leave; how has he been employed from his conviction to the present; and was he examined by the visitors who took evidence in Chatham Prison in 1890 as to the treatment of treason felony prisoners then confined there; if not, for what special reason was he omitted? The hon. Gentleman also had notice of the following question: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state where the prisoners John Duff, Thomas Callan, and Michael Harkins, whose names are given in the Report of the 19th April, 1890, relating to the treatment of prisoners in Chatham, are at present confined; and what was the date of their convictions and length of their sentences?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The convict James M'Kevitt is still at Chatham Prison, but will shortly be removed to Portland. Arrangements have been proceeding for closing Chatham Prison, and many convicts have been transferred to other prisons; M'Kevitt has hitherto not been one of them. There has been no special reason for retaining him at Chatham. On 1st April, 1893, he will be entitled to discharge, supposing that his conduct has been good. He has been employed as a labourer and as a cleaner. He was not examined by the visitors at Chatham in 1890, whose report states that he was in the infirmary at the time, and that he had informed the Chairman that he had no complaint to make, except as to his sentence. John Duff was convicted on 12th November, 1885, was sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude, and is now at Portland Prison. Thomas Callan was convicted on 30th January, 1888, was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude, and is now at Chatham Prison. Michael Harkins was convicted on 30th January, 1888, was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude, and was released on licence on medical grounds on 12th August, 1891.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what complaint he was suffering from when he was released?

Mr. Patrick O'Brien

MR. MATTHEWS: Oh, I cannot say.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether appeals have from time to time reached the Board of Inland Revenue and Treasury on behalf of the officers of the Inland Revenue, asking for redress for certain alleged grievances, and complaining of class distinctions in the same grade and among officers performing the same or similar duties, and alleging that such distinctions prevent the great body of officers reaching the maximum salary of their grade, and also complaining of the withdrawal of remuneration for the collection of agricultural statistics in England and Scotland, and of certain differences in salary by which certain first class officers get from £10 to £40 per annum more than expectant subaltern officers who hold higher rank; and to be inquired into?

MR. GOSCHEN: Appeals have been made from time to time by officers to the Inland Revenue with reference to alleged grievances; but I must repeat the hon. Member that it is only a year and a half ago since the Treasury examined these grievances in conjunction with the Board of Inland Revenue, and dealt in a broad manner with many of the points which might be proved to give real ground for complaint or show justification for increased remuneration. But other claims of the office they were not prepared to meet; for instance, the claim that classification should be abolished and that practically an officer should be advanced from step to step without selection or examination, simply by seniority. I have several times answered the question referring to the alleged withdrawal of remuneration for the collection of agricultural statistics. In 1890, when the changes which I have mentioned were made in the service, one of the objects was so to readjust salaries as to compensate the officers employed in the collection of agricultural statistics for the withdrawal of the special remuneration for that work. In 1891, I was found that in certain cases the arrangements made would work to the detriment.

ment of a few officers, and further changes were made to insure that no officer should receive less remuneration than he was receiving before. With reference to some minor complaints, I am at this moment engaged in carefully examining them.

SCOTLAND AND THE HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether Section 96 (16), of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, deprives County Councils in Scotland of all the powers vested in them in the whole of Part 2 of that Act, or only of the powers conferred on County Councils by Section 45 thereof; and, in a county which has not been divided into districts under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, Sections 77 and 78, to what Public Authority is the Medical Officer of Health bound to report any case of a dwelling unfit for human habitation, under Section 30 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It appears to me that Section 45 is the only section referred to in Section 96 (16). As regards the second part of the question, the proper authority to report to is the County Council, which, in an undivided county, is the Local Authority under the Public Health Acts, and as such the Local Authority under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890.

THE STORAGE OF PETROLEUM.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that certain Local Authorities throughout the country have, for a considerable time, been issuing notices to dealers and vendors in petroleum (grocers, &c.), warning them that, under the Act of 1871, petroleum cannot be "kept otherwise than for private use, or for sale in certain small quantities," unless the dealer has obtained the necessary licence; and if he will explain what justification there is for such procedure, seeing that the Act of 1871 distinctly defines the petroleum to which it refers as that which, when tested in the prescribed manner, gives off an inflammable vapour below 73 degrees Fahr., and, therefore, does not apply to mineral lamp oils used for domestic purposes, which do not flash below the temperature specified?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir, I have no information as to the issue of such notices as the hon. Member mentions. If they have been issued they do not appear to be justified, in so far as they extend to petroleum to which the Acts do not apply. I may point out to the hon. Member that the Act of 1871, which he quotes, prescribed 100 degrees as the limit to which its provisions apply, and that it was by the Amending Act of 1879 that the present test and the limit of 73 degrees were established.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to give notice that, in consequence of the unsatisfactory reply given by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies to the questions put to him on the subject of the Polynesian labour traffic, and also of the fact that I am precluded from moving the adjournment of the House owing to the notice placed on the Paper by an hon. Member on the other side, I shall raise the whole question of the renewal of Polynesian labour traffic on the next Vote on Account.

MR. BRYCE: I desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can now tell us when it is his intention to bring the Vote on Account before the House?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It will certainly have to be done before the Whitsuntide holidays, and I think it may be about the 25th or 26th of this month; but in the absence of my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, I would not like to pledge myself to the precise date.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): May I ask the First Lord how long the Vote will be taken for?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say; but I should think for a month or six weeks.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I should think so, too.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any representation has been made to the Government by the Irish National teachers in respect of the National Education Bill, and whether he can add anything to what he said last night with respect to the intention of the Government to proceed with it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will be introduced a week to-day.

MR. DALZIEL: I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to resume the discussion on the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At the very earliest opportunity I can possibly find. I am very anxious to complete this stage of the Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, and I think we shall be able to get through it to-day. If that is so, then we shall proceed with the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill immediately.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.—(No. 183.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th May.]
Considered in Committee.

(3.55.) New Clause—

Page 9, after Clause 15, insert the following Clause:—

"In Scotland the County Council shall cause to be prepared and duly registered all deeds, writs, and instruments necessary for completing the title of the purchaser of a small holding, and for securing the payment of any unpaid purchase-money, and shall include in the purchase-money the cost so incurred, or to be incurred, according to scales set forth in tables fixed by the County Council.

Provided that—

- (1.) The County Council, if they think fit, may appoint a person duly qualified (in the opinion of the Sheriff) to carry out the provisions of this section, and shall assign to him such salary or other remuneration as they may determine; and
- (2.) The County Council shall not be liable for any expenses incurred by the purchaser of a small holding for legal or other advice or assistance rendered to him on his own employment.

Section 10 of this Act shall not apply to Scotland."—(The Lord Advocate),

Mr. Sexton

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I am very glad that the Government has responded to the appeal which we made on the last occasion. It would be impossible, I think, to frame a clause precisely on the same principle as an English clause, and I think the Lord Advocate has taken a judicious course in framing his clause on the lines he has done. He has, I think, succeeded in accomplishing the substantial object by providing machinery by which the cost of registration will be largely reduced. He proposes that an officer should be appointed by the County Council on a salary, and fixes the registration at a moderate scale fee. I think that will go a very long way to accomplish the same object as has been accomplished in England by other means.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

(County Council may lease land in lieu of purchasing.)

"Where land through its proximity to a town or suitability for building purposes, or for other special reasons, has a prospective value which in the opinion of the County Council makes it unsuitable for purchase, the Council may take the land on lease or hire for the purpose of small holdings instead of purchasing it."

—brought up, and read the first time.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to move the clause, with a small verbal Amendment. I understand the right hon. Gentleman accepts this clause, and I will not, therefore, detain the Committee.

(4.0.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I accept the clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be now read a second time."

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): The clause which I beg to propose increases the scope of the Bill without adding to the responsibility of the County Council. A good many landlords in years past have been in the habit of consolidating farms and leaving the small holdings to go into decay, or adding these small holdings to large farms. It is a mistaken policy, and now they are anxious to break up these large farms into small holdings, because they find it much easier to let small holdings than it is to let large farms. The object of this Clause is to facilitate that proposal by enabling the County Council to lend money to the tenant in cases where the landlord agrees with the tenant of the farm. I propose that the County Council shall lend the money on the security of the land, if the landlord gives a satisfactory tenure to the tenant. That tenure shall be a perpetual tenure. That is essential in all cases of small holdings, because without perpetual tenure I do not think the tenants will be stimulated to that improvement of their farms upon which the whole success of this experiment depends. My proposal, therefore, is that when the landlord creates a new holding and lets it to the tenant upon terms which are satisfactory to the County Council, and the main conditions of which are embodied in subsequent clauses standing in my name, the County Council shall be authorised to lend money for building sufficient and adequate houses on the small holdings. I hope the purpose I have in view will recommend itself to the right hon. Gentleman, and that he will be prepared to accept the clause, and look upon it as a valuable extension of the scope of the Bill.

New Clause—

Loans for Farm Buildings.

(A County Council may lend money for farm buildings on new holdings.)

“For the purpose of facilitating the subdivision of large holdings a County Council may make advances by way of loan for providing suitable buildings on land which has formed part of a large holding, and is to be let as a separate holding, provided the annual value for the purposes of the Income Tax of such new holding is not more than seventy-five pounds, and that the advance in respect of each holding does not exceed two-thirds of the value of the buildings erected thereon.

“The application for the loan shall be submitted to the County Council by the landlord and the tenant, or proposing tenant, jointly, along with the contract or proposed contract of tenancy, plans of the buildings to be erected, and a suitable portion of the Ordnance Survey Map, with the area of the holding delineated in colour thereon,”—(Mr. Barclay.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be now read a second time.”

MR. CHAPLIN: I entirely sympathise with the objects the hon. Member has in view, but I cannot help thinking the clause is altogether superfluous. If the estate is unencumbered it will be perfectly simple for the owner to obtain money to effect the purpose without going to the County Council at all. But, on the other hand, if the estate is encumbered, then it seems to me that probably the security would be one that the County Council would not be well advised to invest their money in. Moreover, the hon. Member proposes that no loan shall be authorised unless the tenant is to have perpetuity of tenure. That would be importing into our practice in this country a form of tenure which is entirely novel, and to which on other grounds, independently altogether of the question we are now discussing, I should not be prepared to agree. I really do not think anything would be gained by the addition of this clause, and I am inclined to hope the hon. Member will not press it to a Division, for I should not be able, I am sorry to say, to accept it.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I do not see the hon. Member for Stamford (Mr. Cust) in the House, but the clause standing in his name seems to me to be an extremely valuable clause, and I take the liberty of appropriating it and moving it in his absence. The clause proposes that these small holdings, instead of being real property descending to the heir, shall be personal property descending to the personal representative. There is one strong reason why that should be the law. These people who own small holdings have but a limited knowledge of real property, and very often do not make wills. If they do not the property will go to the heir, with the result that the widow will be left without any provision. If this clause passes the property will be personalty, and the widow will take a third. It seems to me right that the law should be altered in this way, and it seems to me, further, that it is not contrary to what we are familiar with on the subject, because when small holdings were created in Ireland under the system which obtains there, the small holdings were made personal property by the Government under the Act which they passed last year. It seems to me that what has been done in Ireland ought to be done in England too. Then, again, we have recently, in the Conveyancing Act of 1881, made trust estates devolve as personalty to the legal personal representatives; and certainly there is nothing anomalous or extraordinary in making land so devolve. Land which is held for a term of years devolves in this way at present. There are various other estates which from time to time have been changed from realty into personalty; and certainly we are not infringing any great principle, or making any general attack on the principle of primogeniture which might be unacceptable to hon. Gentlemen opposite, by making this small proposal.

New Clause—

(Small holdings to be personal property.)

"Land comprised in a small holding shall be, and shall for ever afterwards remain, personal property, and shall devolve and descend as a chattel real, and all enactments and rules of law applicable to chattels real, both as regards beneficial enjoyment, trusts, and the administration of estates, and all other matters shall apply to such land in like manner; provided, that such land shall not be liable to Probate Duty or Legacy Duty, or exempt from Succession Duty,"—(Mr. Haldane.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. CUST (Lincolnshire, Stamford): I am obliged to my hon. and learned Friend for taking up this clause during my temporary absence. I do not wish at any length to take up the time of the Committee in supporting this clause, although it is one to which I myself, and many of my friends, attach very considerable importance. I am aware that it seems to some hon. Gentlemen, including, I fear, the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, a novel and almost a startling proposal; but, as a matter of fact, it follows logically and almost necessarily upon the clauses which the right hon. Gentleman has already accepted. As he has already been good enough to accept a series of Registration Clauses, I trust to again hear that he may be willing to give his serious consideration to a clause which follows so naturally upon them. I am not aware that there is a single instance in the laws either of this country, of the Continent, or of the United States of America, where any system of land registration has not gone hand in hand with a clause of this nature; and as the right hon. Gentleman has been willing to adopt the enormous advantages of the system of compulsory registration—exceptional, I admit, to these statutory holdings and not applying to the whole land of the country—I hope to hear that he may be willing to make an exception for these small holdings in this case, for the whole case is exceptional throughout, and to give his favourable consideration to the present clause, and thus complete that land reform, at least with reference to small holdings, which he has already initiated, and confer still further advantages upon the class which he wishes to benefit. I admit that the clause is stated somewhat badly upon the Paper, but it is in no sense original. It has three direct precedents—if not actually legal precedents in form, at least precedents for the principle which it proposes. First we have the Land Registration Act of Ireland, which was passed last year, by which it is actually laid down that all land purchases under the Irish Land Act of 1891 shall be treated as personal property. Next we have the Land Transfer Bill, which has been introduced by the present Lord Chancellor in another place on more than one occasion, and which directs that the same principle which this clause embodies shall be applied to the whole land of the country. And, third, we have that which, if not a precedent, is at least a very close analogy—the system by which land lying in trust for sale in this country is for the whole of the period which may intervene before it is disposed of (and that period may be one of considerable length)—treated as personal property. I do not wish to detain the Committee by entering at any length into the various distinctions between real and personal property, and I can only lay before the Committee as shortly as possible what will be the practical results of the adoption of this clause. During the lifetime of the owner very little change will be felt, except possibly in additional facilities in the sale and transfer of his land; but it is in cases of death and succession, more especially in cases of intestate succession, that the full benefits will accrue. I desire to remove two possible causes of alarm to which this proposal has given rise. The first is that it would in any way alter the testamentary freedom of property holding, and the second is that it would interfere at all with the present financial arrangements or burdens which rest upon the land, whether Succession Duty, or rates, or whatever public burden it may be. Such charges would remain wholly untouched by this clause, and wholly unaffected. As to the other point, the testamentary freedom of the small holder, even under this clause he would be absolutely free to make what will he chooses for the disposition of his estate, as he is at the present moment. But it is in the case in which he makes no will and dies intestate that this important and valuable alteration in the law will be felt. What happens under the present state of the law? The heir-at-law may be either the eldest son, who may practically reduce his brothers and sisters to poverty, or he may be some distant male relative, who may reduce the widow to beggary. I will give an instance of what has occurred in this direction. It is the case of a labouring man and his wife. The wife unexpectedly inherited £700 or £800. The money was put into the bank. A will was made so that the money was left to the wife. Some years later the man and his wife purchased a plot of land and erected a house upon it, and in their ignorance they had no idea that the Law of Succession had changed. The husband died, and a nephew was declared heir-at-law, the widow being reduced to the position of a servant on the land which her money had purchased. Such a case as this is far from being an uncommon one—there are plenty of instances of the kind to be found up and down the country. There are two cases of a somewhat similar kind at the present time in my own Division of Lincolnshire. I would remind the Committee that although the sums of money in question in such cases are small they are relatively of importance to the persons concerned, and the amount is soon eaten up by litigation. What would be the result of the adoption of this Amendment by the Government? First, the entire property would pass at once into the hands of the administrator, who would be required to settle immediately, so far as the estate was concerned, all claims against it; secondly, instead of the son or a remote male relative succeeding to it, to the total exclusion of the widow or the family, the value of the estate would be divided amongst the family. It may be asked, Why make such an innovation? I would answer it is not an innovation in any sense, because it is based on the action of Parliament last year. Then, again, the holdings we are now dealing with are created solely by Statute; therefore this clause would upset no existing arrangement, and it would do wrong to no one. On the contrary, it would benefit those who most require to be benefited. It is with the object of providing a remedy for the distress, the serious injustice, and the gross grievances which exist that I bring forward this Amendment, and I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will give it his full and careful consideration.

(4.15.) MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I am sure we are all much indebted to the hon. Member for having brought up this subject for our consideration. I sincerely trust that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give the clause his approval. I do not think it is much to ask from the Government, because, as to the principle of the clause, it has already been accepted as part of the Government programme. Not being a lawyer, I should hesitate a great deal in offering an opinion as to the meaning of legal phraseology. It may be that the wording of this clause is somewhat defective; but as to the object of the Mover we can have no doubt whatever. It is to prevent grievous injustice being inflicted by dividing, after a man's death, the property he leaves in a way which he himself, if alive, would not have approved. That principle has been accepted by the Government in a measure which they have proposed to the House. That measure was not passed, because of difference of opinion with regard to some of its provisions; but on this question of dealing with primogeniture there cannot be any difficulty whatever with regard to the principle. What I particularly want to impress upon the Committee is this—that whatever may be the feeling of hon. Members with regard to the general principle of primogeniture, there cannot be any possible objection to dealing with it as is proposed in this particular clause. In many cases the people whom you are going to put upon the land do not make their wills, or, if they do make them, they may possibly be found afterwards to be invalid, and their desire that the estate should be divided amongst those who are dearest to them is frustrated. The additional argument which has suggested itself to me is that in dealing with this land the work of the woman is undoubtedly of extreme importance, because if small holdings are successful it will be largely due to the wife's management of the poultry yard; and it will be an additional hardship if those who have contributed to the success of the holding should, on the death of the owner, find themselves deprived of any further benefit from it. I do not think that the question needs very much argument, and I sincerely trust the Government will see their way to accept the Amendment.

MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): I rise at this moment to say that I am particularly anxious that the right hon. Gentleman should give this Amendment his most careful consideration. He should know that there is on this side of the House a very strong feeling in favour of it. Those who buy their holdings will, no doubt, do so because they believe that the property will afterwards be divided between their widows and their children. They would not like it to go to a distant relative. It is because I believe that great hardship will result if this Amendment is not adopted, that I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to agree to it.

BARON F. DE ROTHSCHILD (Bucks, Aylesbury): I would not have spoken upon the question had I not represented an agricultural constituency. It is my earnest wish that this Bill should meet with unqualified support. I have found in my constituency that the agricultural labourers have a horror of the word "primogeniture." It is one which they cannot understand, and I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will give the Amendment his most favourable consideration.

*SIR W. B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North-West): I wish to say a few words on this very important Amendment. In making a great change, such as that contemplated by this Amendment, plenty of time should be given to consider it. No one wishes more than myself to see this Bill made a fair, full, and complete Bill; but this question is one which I think ought to be dealt with in a measure by itself so as to give full opportunity for its discussion on each stage. My hon. Friend who moved the Amendment pointed out very clearly what has been done in regard to registration in America and other countries that have adopted registration.

A hon. MEMBER: Ireland.

*SIR W. B. BARTTELOT: Well, Ireland does not come into the question, as Ireland is an exceptional case in the way it has been dealt with. Are you going to cast a slur on those you wish to see small holders of land by saying that with the education they have received they will not be able to make a will in conformity with their views and opinions, and thus do what they wish with their own? If education does not teach them this, the first thing they should learn as soon as they have got the property is how to make a will, so that they may be able to leave the land to whom they like. I should also like to ask, Is this property to remain under the law of personalty, or to again go under the law affecting realty in case pre-emption is granted and it is bought by the original owner? I think that is an important question, and deserves consideration. And then, with regard to the rates, my contention is that if it is to be made personal property it should be excused from the rates, as is the case with personal property. As to the law of primogeniture, I must say that I have never understood it is in such disrepute among the lower classes as the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Baron Rothschild) appears to think. I have always been of opinion that they are anxious, if they have property, to leave it to their eldest sons, so that it may be handed down to their children. ("No, no!") Some hon. Gentleman says "No, no," but that has occurred in many cases I have known. But, be that as it may, I have never heard it said before, and if I had not known the opinions of the hon. Member who spoke, I should say he was one of those who are anxious to make an attack upon property.

BARON F. DE ROTHSCHILD: If this Amendment is passed it will not prevent anyone making a will and leaving his property to his son.

*SIR W. B. BARTTELOT: Quite so, if he makes a will; but the object we have in view would be secured better without this proposal. I hope my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) will carefully consider the nature of this clause. It is an innovation to ask the Committee to make changes of such grave importance without giving the House an opportunity of discussing them most fully.

*MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon): I think the right hon. Gentleman will see there is a strong disposition to view this clause favourably. It seems to me, however, that this proposition is mixed up with the question of pre-emption. The one depends considerably on the other, because if this is to be made a question of personal property the point that would arise is, what should be done if it is re-sold to the original owner? Will it then remain personal property, or become again real property? This is one of those matters which should be deferred for Report, as it affects others already left to that stage. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to take that course.

(4.35.) MR. CHAPLIN: I frankly own that there is something extremely attractive to myself and others in the proposition of my hon. Friend, and it has been made not less attractive by the able and sympathetic speech in which he introduced it to the notice of the Committee. But there are some considerations of a practical character which I think deserve the attention of the House before we come to a decision. I think the argument adduced from the case of Ireland was in no way complete. The same principle, it is true, has been adopted in Irish legislation; but there was a reason for it in the case of Ireland that does not exist here. In Ireland there were a vast number of leasehold properties which by the legislation of some years ago were converted into ownerships, and the people who had been accustomed to treat these leasehold properties as personal property never became habituated to the change in the law, and continued to treat them as personal property, although they had become real property, and the law was, therefore, altered to meet their case. Then my hon. Friend pointed out a case in which he showed that great hardship had arisen to the family of a small owner of land, because of the ignorance of the law which existed at the time, and owing to which the whole of the property was divided amongst relations to whom it was never intended to go. Well, I sympathise very much with the hardship in that particular case; but I do not think we should be wise to initiate legislation because of individual cases of hardship. But, Sir, I want the Committee to consider for a moment what are the practical objections to this proposal. It is one with which I myself have full and entire sympathy, and when the hon. Member appears to think that there is something of so novel and startling a character in this proposal that it would probably alarm me so much that I should not assent to it, I would remind him that there is nothing novel and startling in it at all. The precise principle has been adopted by Her Majesty's Government in the Land Transfer Bill which was introduced into the House of Lords; and, therefore, it is not because of anything novel and startling in the proposal that I oppose it. I see considerable practical difficulties in the way of carrying it out with regard to one particular class of landed proprietors, and one particular class alone. Now, take the case of a small holding that reverts possibly to its original owner and ceases to be held for that purpose. There you have the owner holding his land under two different titles—under one of which it is real property, and under the other personal property. My right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir W. Barttelot) has also raised the difficulty with regard to the rates, and I am bound to say it seems to me to be a matter of great inconvenience that by passing a clause in Committee in the House of Commons one afternoon we are suddenly to create two classes of landed property in this country. I think these are considerations which ought to engage the attention of the Committee before we come to a decision on this subject. It has been frequently pointed out in the course of the Debates on this Bill that one of the things we should, above all others, guard against with regard to these small holdings, is their possible sub-division in times to come. But surely, if we adopt this proposal, we shall be doing more to facilitate the sub-division of these holdings than anything else I can imagine. I hope, Sir, for the reasons I have stated—although I am entirely in sympathy with the object of the clause myself—that the Committee will come to the conclusion that it is too large a question to be hurriedly settled in an afternoon towards the close of the discussion on a Bill. Although there is no doubt that on the first convenient opportunity the present Government will endeavour to carry out the proposals they have made already on the subject, I strongly recommend the Committee on this occasion to abstain from supporting the proposal of the hon. Member.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): It appears to me that the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has adduced against this proposal might have been fairly urged against the proposal in respect to small holdings, carried by his own Government under the Ashbourne Act. The main argument of the right hon. Gentleman has been that it is not desirable to create two classes of ownership of land under different forms of succession in the case of death. But that has been done in the case of the small holdings under the Ashbourne Act; and I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that not only did this apply to future purchasers under the Land Purchase Act of last Session, but also retrospectively to all land sold to tenants under the Ashbourne Act. Therefore, the strongest argument that can be conceived in favour of this proposal is that its principle is already embodied in Acts which the present Government have placed on the Statute Book. The right hon. Gentleman further said that it would make a great difficulty in the case of land being redeemed by its former owner under the clause which he has promised to bring up on the Report; but I think it would be quite possible to consider that question when the clause relating to the redemption of land by the former owner comes before the House. But let me point out that the land redeemed in that way would cease to be a small holding under this Bill, and consequently it would revert to the ordinary law of the land. For my own part, I venture most sincerely to hope still that the Government will take into consideration the strong feeling on the other side of the House in favour of this proposal and give appearance of many of the small holders in the past has been largely due to the great complications attending transactions connected with the succession or transfer of land. If we had the general rule of applying the law of personal property to land—especially to small holdings—we should not have had to resort to this exceptional and artificial system of creating small holdings. Under these circumstances, I think that the House opinion on both sides may do well to yield upon this point, and of the Bill that on the Report stage for the purpose they will bring up a clause for pose of carrying into effect the important suggestion of the hon. Member.

(4.44.) MR. CUST: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has said that the hardship which exists under the existing law is exceptional, and that on that account we ought not to make a change of the sort now proposed. So far from being exceptional, it is a hardship that is almost universal. It is a mute hardship, and for very natural reasons. People who suffer from it have not the opportunity or knowledge to bring the matter before public notice. The only people through whom that can be done are the local lawyers, and they, for very natural reasons, do not desire to see this change in the law. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's objection that we should have two classes of property, I will offer two remarks in answer. Surely it is unnecessary to talk about the danger of having two different classes of property when we are speaking of the English Land Laws. If we had a symmetrical Code, nicely cut and dried, then there would be some reason against making a disturbance; but while there exist such absurdities—and how can we expect labouring men to know them?—as a leasehold for life being personal property and a freehold for life real property, or that shares in a Water Company are personal property and shares in the New River Company are real property, it is unnecessary to discuss this question as if it would interfere with a delicate symmetry. Another point raised by my hon. and gallant Friend behind me was that it would be an innovation far too great to introduce on a side issue. But this innovation is not one bit greater than the principle of registration which was swallowed whole by the Committee on Friday night, and which has opened up the way for the change now proposed. In every other country the two changes have gone hand in hand, and it does seem to be a case of straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel for the Government to accept the principle of registration of land, and then absolutely refuse to take what follows. The question as to whether the acceptance of this proposal would make small holdings personal property in cases where the land is redeemed by its original owner might be held over until the Report stage; and if the right hon. Gentleman will agree to that, I am sure we shall be willing to meet him. Otherwise, I think there is a strong feeling amongst hon. Members on this side, as well as on the other side, that we should take the sense of the House upon this clause.

*(4.47.) MR. DARLING (Deptford): If there be such a strong feeling on this side of the House as a majority in favour of this proposition I am the more proud to say that I do not share that opinion. This appears to me to be a much smaller question than it has been represented to be. It is a mere matter of how land shall devolve where the tenant dies intestate, but it has been stated that in the majority of instances he will die without a will. In that case, I believe one of the chief merits of this Small Holdings Bill will be gone if this proposition is accepted, because if the tenants die intestate there would then be a distribution of the land, or its price, amongst the personal representatives. To my mind, the great merit of this Bill as it now stands is that one person will succeed to the property, which would not happen if the property was sold whenever a tenant died intestate. This proposal is founded on what makes the worst kind of law; that is, on cases of individual hardship. To alter the law of England simply because a few people make bad wills is to make a great change for a very small reason. If it be true that the Government contemplate making a change one day in the devolution of real property, let it be on a general Bill. I would point out that the one kind of property where the rule of primogeniture is most useful is that of small estates. Everybody, except the Radical agitator, knows that the great estates of the country do not devolve because of the rules of primogeniture, but because of the law of settlement. The principle of primogeniture affects small estates, where there is no settlement, far more than large estates; and it is because I consider it far better that these small holdings should be year after year in the same family rather than be constantly thrown upon the market that I shall oppose this clause.

MR. CHAPLIN: I have heard nothing in the course of the discussion which has removed my objections to the clause for the reasons I have already stated. At the same time, I recognise that there is a strong feeling on the part of the Committee, with which I sympathise; and if it will meet the views of hon. Members, I will undertake to re-consider the matter with a view, if possible, to deal with it on the Report.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think we should quite understand the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman. Re-considering a question may mean re-considering it with a view to its rejection as well as with a view to its acceptance. If the President of the Board of Agriculture says that he now accepts the principle that this property is to descend as personal property, and that all he wants is an opportunity of considering details, we need not prolong this discussion for another moment; but if he is not prepared to accept the principle, then this House should express an opinion upon it.

MR. CHAPLIN: I said that I would re-consider this question with the view of dealing with it on the Report.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I think the Committee should know what that means.

MR. CHAPLIN: I mean that we should postpone dealing with this question till the Report stage in order that I may examine into it. I might possibly on further consideration find it impossible to accept the proposal, and if so I should not consider myself pledged to go on with it. The House would then have the opportunity of discussing the subject on an Amendment moved by anybody else, but my intention is to re-consider this question with a view to accepting the principle of the proposal.

MR. HALDANE: As I recognise the desire of the right hon. Gentleman to deal with this question, I will ask permission of the Committee to withdraw the Amendment.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

(Extension of Provisions of Settled Land Act, 1882.)

“Where a tenant for life within the meaning of ‘The Settled Land Act, 1882,’ sells, exchanges, or leases any settled land to a County Council for the purposes of this Act such sale, exchange, or lease may be made at such a price, or for such consideration, or at such rent as, having regard to the said purposes, and to all the circumstances of the case, is the best that can be reasonably obtained, notwithstanding that a higher price, consideration, or rent might be obtained if the land were sold, exchanged, or leased for another purpose.”

The object of this clause, which is of a technical nature, is to enable life tenants and limited owners of land to sell more cheaply and freely than they otherwise would be able to do. As the Bill is now framed, a life tenant or limited owner who desires to sell must take advantage of the Land Clauses Act, and thus incur the expense and go through the formality of appointing two arbitrators. I understand it is the view of the Government that some Amendment for getting over that difficulty is necessary, and I gather from the hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Webster) that he is prepared to accept this clause.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be now read a second time.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I shall be prepared to recommend my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) to adopt this clause, subject to further consideration before the Report stage, as to whether an alternative machinery could not be devised with the view of providing proper safeguards as to price.

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. HALDANE: I have now to move the following clause:—

(Power to Limited Owner to Sell at a Fee Farm Rent.)

“A tenant for life within the meaning of ‘The Settled Land Act, 1882,’ may grant the settled land, or a part thereof, to a County Council for the purposes of this Act in perpetuity, at a fee farm or other rent secured by condition of re-entry, or otherwise as may be agreed upon.”

The reason that this clause is limited to England is on account of the scandalously backward state of entail in Scotland. In England we have mended the laws over and over again; but in Scotland, when we have mended them, it has been only to put them a quarter of a century behind those in England. If I blame one party more than another for this, it is the party to which I belong. In 1882, the Settled Land Act was passed for England at the suggestion of Lord Cairns, but in Scotland an Act was passed of the most meagre description, and provisions were deliberately inserted in it which made it impossible for freeholders there to have the same scope as those in England. I regret very much that I cannot apply this clause to Scotland.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. CRAWFORD: The hon. and learned Gentleman has delivered a speech of a kind I have often heard. We are told that the position of the law is such that it is necessary that we should be shut out from something. It is unfortunate that the Lord Advocate is not here to give us the information, for I suppose the Attorney General will profess once more his entire ignorance as to whether this clause would apply to Scotland.

MR. HALDANE: There is no doubt about the matter. The particular part of the Bill to which this new clause refers could not possibly apply to Scotland, because of the Act which has been mentioned.

MR. CRAWFORD: On the last occasion the Attorney General said he did not know whether it would apply to Scotland or not.

SIR R. WEBSTER: Indeed, I said nothing of the kind.

MR. CRAWFORD: It may be well worth the consideration of the Government whether in regard to entailed property it would not be well to include Scotland. With respect to this matter, the Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) is under a habitual mistake. He forgets that the land which would be described as settled land in England is in Scotland governed by the law of entail, and there are ample provisions for giving facilities to deal with this land. I would press upon the President of the Board of Agriculture that he should communicate with the Lord Advocate on this matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

*(5.10.) SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to move the following New Clause:—

(Rating of small Holdings.)

"For the purposes of poor rates and of all other rates the rateable value of a small holding shall be taken to be the same as that of agricultural land of the like quality in the neighbourhood of such small holding, and the rateable value of a small holding shall not be estimated from the rental where such rental exceeds that of such agricultural land as aforesaid, by reason of (a) the price which has been given by the County Council for the land of such small holding, or (b) the legal expenses of transfer thereof, or (c) other expenses of the Council in relation thereto which have not increased the value of the land."

After the Allotments Act was passed there was a complaint about the heavy rating, and I should be sorry to see the same difficulty arise in this matter. In some parts of Suffolk the allotment holders were rated in some cases four times as high as the farmers; and in consequence of the widespread feeling of the general unfairness of this, a Bill was brought in making special provision that the allotment holders should be rated under the provisions of the Public Health Act of 1875. But in spite of that experience there is no provision in the present Bill to prevent injustice in the way of rating being practised on the small holders. I am not wedded to the special form of clause that I have put on the Paper; but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept some words which will secure the object I have in view—that of protecting these small holders from excessive rating. The land, in the first place, will have been bought at a high price, and that price increased by the necessary legal proceedings, and the rent will consequently be very much in excess of the agricultural value of the land. The consequence will be that while a farmer is rated at 25s. or £1 an acre, the small holder will have to pay on 30s. or £2. If we apply the provisions of the Public Health Act and also pass this clause we shall prevent considerable injustice and agitation, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept the clause.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. CHAPLIN: If the contingency foreshadowed by the hon. Member were to arise, it would be wise to put in a clause like this; but I do not think it is likely to arise, nor do I understand from the hon. Member that the clause is necessary. He says the rateable value should not be higher than that of other holders or farmers in the same neighbourhood; but I do not see how the fact that they are likely to be rented higher than their neighbours affects his argument. The rateable value is not estimated on the rental alone, but on the rental at which the land might reasonably be supposed to let from year to year. Therefore, I do not see that the clause would be necessary; but if, on examination, I find there is any reason for apprehending the danger which the hon. Member has foreshadowed, I shall be ready to deal with it in a manner which I hope will be satisfactory to the hon. Member.

*SIR W. FOSTER: A difficulty has already arisen on the Allotments Act. However, as the right hon. Gentleman has promised to examine into the matter, I will withdraw the clause

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to move, in page 5, after Clause 7, to insert the following clause:—

(Power to attach grazing rights, &c. to Small Holdings.)

"Where any right of grazing, sheepwalk, or other similar right is attached to land acquired by a County Council for the purposes of small holdings, the Council may attach any share of the right to any small holding in such manner and subject to such regulations as they think expedient."

This clause is the result of a discussion which took place on the first clause of the Bill.

Sir W Foster

Clause brought up, read the first and second time, and added to the Bill.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to move the following clause:—

(Limitation of Advances.)

"No advance shall be made by a County Council under this Act for the purchase of any holding, for the purchase of which any advance has been already made under this Act, until the perpetual rent-charge and the entire annuity for the repayment of the advance shall have been redeemed or repaid."

This clause, which is the last on the Paper, is taken bodily from the Irish Land Purchase Act, Section 9, Sub-section 4. So far as I am concerned, I should be perfectly satisfied if the clause stopped in the middle, because my object is merely to prevent the sale and re-sale of land from owner to owner by means of advances of public money made over and over again on the same land. The clause was inserted in the Irish Act, because it was shown that there had been re-sales under the Ashbourne Act, in which the landlord, having got a tenant to buy at a ruinously high price, bought back the holding from the defaulter at half what he had originally received for it, and then effected a fresh sale by means of a fresh advance from the public Treasury. When I moved this Amendment to the Irish Bill, the clause only went as far as the word "Act" in the middle of the now proposed clause, and the Government insisted on the words at the end being added. They recognised a defect in the law, but they declined to accept my Amendment unless words like these which now appear were added. The words were added, and the clause made part of the Bill, and that is why these latter words stand in the clause which I now submit to the Committee. I trust, therefore, that the Government will have no difficulty in adding to the Bill either the words of the Amendment or the first three lines of it as far as the word "Act."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

MR. CHAPLIN: I have read the clause, but I am unable up to the present to see any advantage to be gained by adding it to the Bill. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not think I am discourteous in any way; but with every desire to ascertain in what way the Bill would be improved by the insertion of this clause, I confess I am unable to see it.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain in what sense he differentiates this present Bill from the Land Purchase Bill of last year, in which the Government accepted the Amendment as a great improvement on the Bill?

MR. CHAPLIN: The circumstances are totally different. I have rather avoided framing this Bill on the lines of the Irish Act, the conditions of the two countries being so entirely different.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Will the Bill be printed as amended, and circulated? [Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes.] I wish to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the skill and success with which he has piloted the Bill through Committee, and on the character of the Bill so far as it goes.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next and to be printed. [Bill 355.]

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 230.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 6th May.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

POSTPONED CLAUSES AND SCHEDULES.

Clause 115.

On Motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON, the following Amendment was agreed to:—

Page 47, line 8, after "The," insert "Commissioners shall keep properly swept and cleansed."

On Motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON, the following Amendment was agreed to:—

Page 47, line 8, leave out all after "street" to end of clause, and insert "so far as is reasonably practicable, and shall collect and remove from the said foot pavements, so far as is reasonably practicable, all dust, ashes, rubbish, filth, and snow."

VOL. IV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

(5.30.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to move, Sir, the addition of the following words at the end of the Amendment just made by the Lord Advocate:—

"So much of any public or local Act as requires the occupier or owner of any premises in Scotland to cause the footways and water-courses adjoining the premises to be swept and cleansed is hereby repealed."

This is a very important matter, because as the Bill stands the Sanitary Authorities will have the duty cast upon them of cleaning the pavements as well as the streets at the public expense all over Scotland, with the exception of five cities which have special Acts, and will not come under this Bill. In Glasgow the duty of cleaning the pavement will still fall upon the shopkeepers and occupiers of dwelling-houses. In London the duty of clearing the snow away has by a recent Act been thrown on the Public Authority. In these five cities, of which Glasgow is one, that duty will still devolve upon the shopkeepers and the occupiers of the ground floors of dwelling-houses, and they will have to act as scavengers; but whenever you cross a boundary, say to Govan, you will find that the work is done by the Local Authority. The duty of clearing the pavements used to devolve on the occupiers in both England and Scotland, but in the recent Act the Government altered the law as regards London, and imposed the duty on the Public Authority at the expense of the general rate. The Lord Advocate in this Bill is doing exactly the same for all the burghs of Scotland except the five cities I have referred to. Now, in the case of these cities the shopkeepers and occupiers will still have to perform the duty of scavengers when a snowstorm comes, and the object of my Amendment is to provide that in these cities the duty shall devolve upon the Local Authorities, as in the burghs which come under this Bill. The shopkeepers have to pay heavily to the rates, and I do not see why they should have to clean the streets as well. In a matter of this kind we are not acting on behalf of the Town Councils of Glasgow and the other cities, but are speaking about a clause for the protection of the shopkeepers and occupiers of dwelling-houses, and we say that they are entitled to have this provision made as a matter of justice. As the Government have adopted the principle for London, they should be willing to extend it to these five cities of Scotland. The Government having decided that in all the burghs in Scotland which come under the Bill the duty of keeping the pavement clean shall devolve on the Sanitary authority, I maintain that there is an injustice in those cities where the duty is still made to devolve on the shopkeepers and occupiers of dwelling-houses. The refuse on the premises is taken away at the public expense, and why should not the snow and refuse outside on the street be taken away at the public expense? I cannot see why the Government should insist in taking a different view in reference to this matter with respect to Glasgow from what they take with respect to the rest of Scotland. I beg to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

As an Amendment to the Lord Advocate's proposed Amendment, page 47, line 8, at end, add, "So much of any public or local Act as requires the occupier or owner of any premises in Scotland to cause the footways and water-courses adjoining the premises to be swept and cleansed is hereby repealed."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(5.36.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think that the hon. Gentleman will see why the Government cannot accept his Amendment, and why we could not interfere with the distinct understanding which we have arrived at with regard to the five great central towns of Scotland. We should simply destroy the Bill if we were to attempt in this or any other clause to bring any one of these great towns within the meshes of this measure. I hope the hon. Member will not persevere with his Amendment.

(5.37.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I hope my hon. Friend will not press his Amendment. Glasgow, if it pleases, can adopt this clause the day after this Bill becomes law; and I think it would be better to leave the matter to the discretion of the Glasgow Corporation.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 116.

MR. CALDWELL: This clause relates to public health and cleansing, and if the Lord Advocate will look at Clause 316, he will find that most ample powers are given by it to the Local Authorities to make bye-laws for doing all the things mentioned in this clause. It empowers them to make bye-laws for removing the contents of ash-pits, dungsteads, drains, and all these other things mentioned in the clause. It seems to me that it would be much better and much more convenient to delete this clause in an Act of Parliament which will stereotype the law on this subject, and leave the matter to be determined by each Local Authority upon bye-laws; because you have another clause in the Bill which gives them the most ample powers to deal with these and other matters. By this Clause 116 you say that the Sanitary Authority may require the owner of a house in Scotland which shall be occupied for less than six months to white-wash "every part and pertinent" of it once a year; whereas by Clause 118 you make the most ample provision for dealing with the occupier of any dwelling-house which is in a filthy state. I venture to say that all you can ask is that it should be kept clean. I think that all these Clauses, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, and 122 might be omitted and that the matters to which they relate might much more reasonably be left to the operation of bye-laws.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I hope the hon. Member will not persevere in his line of criticism on this Bill. I have gone over the Bill very carefully since the last discussion in Committee, with the view of seeing whether I could not eliminate some of the clauses and leave the matters to which they relate to be dealt with by bye-laws, and these are not amongst the clauses which I thought it expedient so to treat. I hope, therefore, the hon. Member and other hon. Members will not follow this line of criticism.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 117 and 118 agreed to.

Clause 119.

MR. BARCLAY: I beg to move that the clause be omitted. By this clause the owners of "all private courts, yards, areas," and so forth, are obliged to keep them clean. In the first place, I think that it should be the duty of the Sanitary Authorities, and not of the owner, to see that this is done. In the second place, I do not see how the Burgh Authorities can enforce these regulations where there are a number of separate occupiers. I do not think there is any use in this clause at all, because what it aims at is already provided for under the Sanitary Laws. I hope the Lord Advocate will not consider it necessary to insert this clause, because I think it will be found to be unworkable.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "To leave out the Clause."—(Mr. Barclay.)

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: In the first place, this clause is practically a reproduction of a previous clause. In the second place, the Sanitary Authorities have not, in my opinion, the power to deal with what is contemplated by the clause, because the Sanitary Authorities rather deal with a thing after it has become a nuisance. I hope the hon. Member will not press his objection to this clause.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 119 to 126, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 130.

On Motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON the following Amendment was agreed to:—In page 51, line 1, leave out "takes up."

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I beg to move, in page 51, line 5, to leave out all after "pounds," to end of Clause.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): May I ask whether this clause is in the Police Act?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: The words were objected to at the previous stage of the Bill. That is the reason why the clause was postponed. It seems to me that this matter may safely be left either to the Common Law or to arrangement between the magistrate and the person who takes up or removes "the pavements, flags, or other materials." I think the words are unnecessary.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 133 and 136 to 139, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 140.

(5.45.) MR. CALDWELL: I beg to move on behalf of my hon. Friend and insert "owners." This clause as it stands would make it obligatory on the Burgh Commissioners to maintain for the future pavements or footways after they were once put in order to their satisfaction by the owners of lands or premises fronting or abutting on any street. The effect of this provision would be, in towns like Glasgow, to involve the Commissioners in considerable expense. The way that the Lord Advocate has put it is open to objection, for this clause as it stands takes the responsibility for the pavement, of whatever kind, off the owner, and he is thereafter relieved of all expense in connection with it. I think the Lord Advocate will see that that is a very important matter. The Commissioners should not be bound to take up the burden of keeping the pavement in repair unless they also have the power of insisting that a pavement of a permanent character should be put down. This is how they have it in Glasgow. I move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 54, line 14, to leave out the word "Commissioners," and insert the word "owners."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Commissioners' stand part of the Clause."

*(5.53.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: If this clause raised the question spoken to by the hon. Member it would indeed be important, but the hon. Member's remarks are utterly wide of the object of the clause. It is not the case that the clause provides that the Commissioners are to take over the pavement, and to thereafter relieve the owner of all expense. It puts it in the discretion of the Commissioners to do so in the first instance; and, in the second place, that discretion is to be exercised in a way and manner which shall be determined. Those two restrictions make the hon. Member's remarks utterly inapplicable. This is a matter which was discussed in Committee at an earlier stage of the Bill, and various hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House voted for it. Under the law as it now stands the Commissioners cannot take over the footways of a town unless they take over the footways of the whole town. This virtually enables them to do that piecemeal, and street by street. I hope the hon. Member will not divide the Committee on this point.

MR. ESSLEMONT: This clause works very well in practice, and I think the difficulties which my hon. Friend has alluded to only exist in his imagination.

MR. CALDWELL: There is no question of the meaning of the clause. The pavement required might be mere causeway foot-paving, and the owner having provided that in terms of the requisition of the Local Authority, then, in the words of the clause, "The Commissioners shall thereafter, from time to time, repair and uphold such footways." That is to say, if an Order is passed on the part of the Commissioners that such pavement is to be made, thereafter the Commissioners are precluded from making any further Order, and in all future time the pavement is to be upheld by the Commissioners.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 245.

Amendment proposed.

Page 87, line 39, leave out all after "shall," to "Commissioners," in line 17, page 88, and insert "subject to the provisions of any bye-laws made by the Commissioners, introduce water thereto, and shall fit up in some window, recess, or other well-lighted and ventilated place a sink sufficient to carry off the whole foul water; and after a like notice every such owner shall also, subject as aforesaid, provide for such house or part of a house occupied by a separate family, wherever practicable, a sufficient water-closet."—(Sir C. J. Pearson.)

Amendment agreed to.

On motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON, the following Amendments were agreed to:—Page 88, line 20, after "may," insert "subject as aforesaid"; line 24, leave out "always," and insert "further."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 247 and 248 agreed to.

Clause 249.

On Motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON, the following Amendment was agreed to:—Page 89, lines 27 and 28, leave out "after visiting the premises or."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 250.

On Motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON, the following Amendment was agreed to:—Page 90, line 24, leave out "Board of Supervision," and insert "Sheriff, whose judgment shall be final."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 251 to 256 inclusive, 259, 270 to 276 inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 284.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I have put down two Amendments, at the request of the Town Council of Dumfries, with this object. A considerable sum—I believe £2,000—has been spent on slaughter houses in Dumfries under the two miles' protection of the present law, but the effect of this Bill will be to take away that protection after the money has been spent. I believe the Lord Advocate the Solicitor General for Scotland will propose other words, and I therefore do not wish to insist upon any Amendments. I shall, before Report, have an opportunity of seeing the framework of the amended clause, and of considering whether it meets our case.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: It has been agreed to accept the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for the Montrose Burghs (Mr. Shiress Will), slightly modified, so that it may read as follows:—

"And to prevent evasion of the use of such slaughterhouses, all persons who shall, after such slaughterhouses are provided, bring within the boundaries of the burgh, for sale or consumption therein, the carcass or part of a carcass of any cattle or beast slaughtered within the distance of two miles beyond such boundaries elsewhere than in slaughterhouses provided or duly licensed in pursuance of any Act of Parliament shall, on bringing such carcass or part of a carcass within the said boundaries, be liable in payment to the commissioners of the amount of the rates or sums then being levied for cattle or beasts slaughtered in such slaughterhouses provided by them, provided that where before the passing of this Act any burgh shall have erected slaughterhouses, no other slaughterhouse shall be erected within a distance of two miles from the existing boundaries of such burgh, unless either it is erected with the consent of the commissioners of such burgh, or is situated within the area of another burgh."

Question proposed, "That those words be added to the Clause."

MR. BARCLAY: I hope the Committee will consider well before they introduce this clause into the Bill, as it would have the effect of extending the jurisdiction of the burgh. The question has been discussed before, and the proposal has been rejected as placing a tax on an article of food, and as, therefore, being opposed to public policy.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Bute): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has misapprehended the effect of the clause. It will not in any way extend the jurisdiction of the burgh, and it will not have the effect of checking the meat supply.

MR. CALDWELL: This is a matter which requires very careful consideration, and the Committee should have further information as to the effect of the clause before deciding the question.

MR. BSSLEMONT: I cannot help thinking that this question is occupying a great deal of time unnecessarily. It is necessary, of course, to take every precaution to secure the wholesomeness of meat; but, at the same time, the question of jurisdiction has to be considered.

MR. BARCLAY: I certainly object to this protection of the burgh as regards the use of slaughterhouses.

DR. CAMERON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider this question, especially as to the sanitary enactments with reference to slaughterhouses.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 286 and 290 agreed to.

Clause 300.

MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name, and my object in doing so is to prevent friction between the Local Authorities.

Amendment proposed, in page 106, line 11, to leave out from the words "and the bye-laws," to the word "boundaries," inclusive.—(Mr. Mark J. Stewart.)

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It really does not seem to me to be a matter of much importance either one way or the other.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 301 to 305, inclusive, agreed to.

On Motion of Sir C. J. PEARSON, the following Amendments were agreed to:—Page 111, line 37, leave out sub-section (4); page 112, line 3, leave out sub-section (5); page 112, line 14, leave out sub-section (7).

Amendment proposed,

Page 113, line 24, leave out sub-section (7), and insert,—"(7.) For providing that cattle, dogs, and poultry shall not be kept in such places or in such manner as to be a nuisance or annoyance to the inhabitants; for prescribing the situations or places in which swine may be kept, and for prohibiting, on cause shown, the keeping of swine.

(8.) For requiring owners or occupiers of houses and buildings to keep clean closes, areas, courts, passages, stairs, roofs of out-houses, and common water-closets, and thoroughfares owned or occupied by them; and also for paving private courts, common passages, and common areas other than bleaching greens.

(9.) For regulating the sweeping and cleansing of common stairs in accordance with the clauses of this Act relating to cleansing and fencing and keeping the same clear of obstruction.

(10.) For carrying out the provisions of sections two hundred and thirty-seven to two hundred and fifty-six, both inclusive."—(Sir C. J. Pearson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CALDWELL: I merely wish to point out to the Lord Advocate that he is asking to confer power on the Commissioners to make these bye-laws for all purposes. In Section 117, however, he has laid down how these duties should be performed; but they might make bye-laws which would entirely alter the operation of this section.

MR. BARCLAY: I wish to point out that Clause 119 places upon the occupier the duty of cleaning out the areas. This bye-law seems to give power to the Commissioners to put that duty upon the owners. I do not object to that in the least, but I want to know how these two parts of the Bill are reconciled.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: No bye-law will be able to place the duty upon any other shoulders than those on whom it now rests.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 326 to 330, inclusive, agreed to.

Clauses 340 to 382, inclusive, omitted.

Clause 383.

MR. BARCLAY: This is a clause which fixes the incidence of taxation of the boroughs entirely upon the occupier—one of the most important questions raised on this Bill. The rates to be paid for are the police, drainage, public health, and the maintenance of the streets. I am aware that under the existing Act the taxes have been laid upon the occupier; but since that Act was passed in 1862, this House has considered the incidence of such taxation; and if we compare the maintenance of streets in boroughs with those in the counties we find that as far back as 1878 the Government provided for taxation between the owners and the occupiers. The County Government Act goes still further; practically, the whole of the Police Tax is laid upon the owners, and other taxes are divided between the owners and occupiers. I think this is a fitting opportunity to consider the subject, and, therefore, I submit the Amendment standing in my name. This Bill proposes future taxation of the boroughs, and I think the subject ought to be dealt with as in the recent Acts referring to Scotland, and according to the principle adopted by the House—a division between owners and occupiers.

Amendment proposed, in page 134, line 23, after the word "assess," to insert the words "in equal proportions."—(Mr. Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It would, I think, be very unfortunate in the interests of the progress of this measure if we were to enter into the question of the incidence of taxation in boroughs. That is a question which ought not to be dealt with in a Bill consolidating the police law. This clause simply continues the system which has been in vogue many years in Scotland; and the analogies which the hon. Member drew do not hold, because even if we take the Local Government Act the division of certain rates between the owners and the occupiers was simply for the purpose of bringing in the occupiers in view of the increased representation they were obtaining under that Act. I have never heard the present practice called in question. The clause deals only with the assessment for general purposes, and its justification is that it preserves the status quo.

DR. CLARK: The right hon. Gentleman is scarcely accurate. The Bill

does make considerable change, and that in the direction of relieving the owner of his liability. My hon. Friend the Mover of this Amendment (Mr. Barclay), and the hon. Member for Cardiganshire (Mr. Rowlands), when the Bill was before the Committee were in favour of placing on the occupiers this burden of maintaining the pavements, and they did so deeming it better, instead of a twopenny assessment, to place the pavement under the control of the Commissioners, and to compel the owners to pay half of the rate. If the Government are determined that the burden which has been borne by the landlords shall be transferred to the community, then the landlords should bear a portion of it. The Amendment of the hon. Member goes back to the condition of things before 1862. The Act of that year was hurried through the House very much as this is being hurried through; pressure was brought to bear, and the whole question was not fully considered. By that Act the whole burden was transferred from owners to occupiers, and very unfairly, I think, and that is what we are repealing. So far as any change was made by the Local Government Act, it was to transfer burdens to the occupiers. The rate was consolidated and paid a moiety by each owner and occupier, though until then it had been borne entirely by owners. It is only right that owners should bear their fair share, and we shall then have uniformity of rating throughout Scotland. At the present time the owner pays half of the poor rate and half of the education rate, and all we desire is that he should pay half of the police rate, the improvements, the lighting, and the general expenditure, which is defrayed from the assessment. It is only fair, now that you are placing an extra burden upon the occupier until now borne entirely by the owner that the owner should in this case bear a fair share of it. I have much pleasure in supporting my hon. Friend's Amendment. Let us have uniformity of assessment.

(6.43.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I am not much impressed with the value of the Bill. It is badly drafted, and the substance is not much better than the form. But now we come to a matter of real and serious practical importance, the division of rates between occupier and owner, and if the result of our discussion were to imperil or defeat the Bill it would be a real benefit to the people of Scotland. It would be disastrous if we in 1892 were to give the slightest sanction to this law passed in 1862. Several things have happened since that date. In 1867 the suffrage was extended to workmen in towns, and in 1885 it was extended to workmen in the counties; and are we to be told in 1892 that those who had no voice in the making of this law of 1862 are to be equally ignored to-day as if they had no more voice now? Does anyone suppose for a moment that if in 1862 workmen had had the franchise they would have submitted to the process which has since gone on, the removal of these ancient burdens from the landlords to the shoulders of the occupiers? What did the Chancellor of the Exchequer tell us last night? I listened to a very interesting discussion between the right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) on political economy, and the right hon. Gentleman on this side professed himself a disciple of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was a very edifying talk, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer assured the House that all the rates in towns which were paid by the occupiers came out of the pockets of the occupiers, and were not a burden on owners. Now, I am not going to discuss that question on its merits, or to say whether I agree with the right hon. Gentleman on it or not; but I take the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government on their own ground occupied last night, that all these local rates payable by the owners are taken out of the pockets of the occupiers, and I say we live in a time when the working classes are not disposed to agree that the whole burden of these rates should fall on their shoulders. They are disposed to demand that as in the case of the poor rate and education rate, so in this rate, to the extent of half, it should be borne by the proprietors. Can the Government show us any reason why occupiers should bear the whole cost in burghs? This is a matter of infinitely greater importance than all the other questions raised by this so-called Consolidation Bill, and I venture to think that unless the Government will meet us on this point it would be wise policy on our part to take care not to give fresh sanction in a new enactment in these days to a principle acknowledged now to be unjust towards a large portion of the community.

(6.50.) MR. BARCLAY: This is a very important question of principle, and we ought not to dispose of it immediately. It is worthy of the consideration we can give to it between now and our next sitting on the Bill. The Lord Advocate says the Bill does not afford the proper opportunity for dealing with the question, but that it should be dealt with as part of the general incidence of taxation; but I say this is precisely the time for dealing with it when we are dealing with the incidence of local taxation for the whole of the burghs of Scotland with five exceptions. I see no prospect of any other opportunity.

MOTION.

SEA FISHERIES.—RESOLUTION.

(9.3.) MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): In rising to move the Motion on this subject, in which I ask the House to assent to an inquiry, it is hardly necessary for me to insist on the food supply of the country being a matter of supreme importance. Taking the Returns of our fish supply in the years from 1886 to 1891, I find there has been a steady decline in the quantity from 6,412,000 cwts. in 1886 to 5,966,000 cwts. in 1891, a decrease of nearly half a million cwts. in six years—a serious falling off in a source of food supply at a time when the population of the country is increasing, and the purchasing power of the people at a still greater ratio; and surely it is time that such an inquiry as I suggest should be instituted. Probably the greatest falling off in the supply has been on the North-West coast, where formerly the fishermen had a prosperous occupation, finding markets for their fish in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Glamorganshire. The Railway Companies are anxious to increase the traffic, and though there have been complaints of the rates of transit being excessive, the Cambrian and other lines are now doing all in their power to resuscitate this important branch of their business. In the United States, in Canada, and in Continental countries much has been done in consequence of attention being paid to pisciculture, and this may also be said of Scotland and Ireland and some parts of England. Indeed, it would seem that Scotland and Ireland have but to ask for inquiries of this character and the request is granted as a matter of course. Formerly large quantities of oysters were found off the coast near Port Madoc and Pwllheli, and fish of all kinds rewarded the fisherman's industry, but I think that Aberdovey is now the only Welsh port which does not show a considerable falling off in the amount of fish landed. When the tourist season is over the Welsh sea-coast towns offer little occupation to the working population, and any means of reviving the fishing industry would result in the greatest benefit to the inhabitants. Professor Huxley, no mean authority in such matters, has stated that an acre of good fishing ground will produce in a week as much food as an acre of the best land will produce in a year. If that be true, and coming from such an authority I do not know why we should doubt it, the importance of reviving the Welsh industry is apparent. The first requirement is harbour accommodation, with refuge from storms; next some instruction and directions on scientific principles are required, for I fear with the decay of the fisheries our fishermen are somewhat behind the times; and the pollution of rivers needs inquiry, mining operations in Wales, especially lead mining, having done much harm to the fish. On these points, together with the means of cheap and quick transit for the fish from the port of landing, inquiry would I feel sure be followed with useful results, and therefore I make my Motion.

(9.8.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): In seconding the Motion there is no occasion for me to dwell upon the importance of this industry, whether in regard to the employment of our sea coast population or as furnishing a food supply to the whole community, an important consideration in these times of hostile foreign tariffs. We are endeavouring to restore agricultural prosperity; and scarcely less in importance is it to restore the fishermen to our fishing grounds than our labourers to the soil. Without doubt, in recent years our fishing industry has grievously declined from causes, some purely local, others general in character. Probably all countries have suffered more or less in this respect from general causes, but this country is alone in not making strenuous efforts to remedy the evils. My hon. Friend has referred especially to Wales, and to Wales my references will chiefly be as being that part of the subject with which I am best acquainted. In Cardigan Bay, for instance, there is a serious falling off in the fish landings. Taking the port of Pwllheli alone, I find from Returns that the amount landed last year was 132 tons as compared with 296 tons six years ago. The proprietors of a very ably conducted paper, the Cambrian News, a short time since instituted an inquiry into the state of the fishing industry in Wales, and it was found that while in nearly all the ports there was a very considerable falling off in the amount of the fish landed, in some ports the industry was practically dead. More especially has there been a decline in the oyster fisheries. There is then a condition of things to amply justify an inquiry into the causes and the remedies to be applied. The first point that demands attention is the want of proper harbour accommodation, and this has been so often urged that I am sure the President of the Board of Trade must be fully sensible of its importance. It is obvious that fishing boats cannot lie by their nets for any length of time, unless the fishermen have the security of refuge in stormy weather; and on the other hand, a good catch of fish is valueless unless there is means of landing and quick transit to market. The best port in Cardigan Bay, Pwllheli, has but its natural accommodation, unimproved by any artificial means. We want a port which boats can enter at all states of the tide and in all weathers, so that advantage may be taken of the train service, which is not frequent in a thinly populated country. Bearing on this question of harbour accommodation there was an inquiry held by a Committee of the House of Commons some years ago—in 1883; but unfortunately no evidence was taken in reference to Cardigan Bay and many other localities where the fishing industry is or was carried on. The inquiry appears to have been of a very general character—it was not so thorough as the importance of the subject demanded, due I suppose to the fact that the Committee was appointed very late in the Session. The late Sir John Coode, an acknowledged authority, gave evidence before that Committee on the relations between harbour accommodation and the prosperity of the fishing industry. He advocated the construction of harbours with a depth of twelve to fifteen feet of water at low spring tides for the accommodation of fishing vessels and the class of vessels unable to keep the sea in rough weather, and he showed how often the prospect of good fishing was lost because the men dared not venture out when the appearance of the weather was threatening, knowing they had no port under their lee upon which they could rely as being accessible at any time. The most successful fishing is frequently carried on when the weather is unsettled. The opinion of so high an authority deserves attention, and I find it supported by the evidence of Mr. Young, at that time Inspector of Scotch Fisheries, who pointed out how, after improvements were made in the harbours at Peterhead and Fraserburgh, the fishing industry in the localities immensely increased. There was another witness, Mr. Stevenson, Vice-President of the Royal Society, Edinburgh, who expressed an opinion that with judicious additions to the harbour accommodation on the Scotch coasts the fishing trade might be increased to an illimitable extent. This opinion has been confirmed by other authorities, and there is practical experience that with increase of harbour accommodation there has been development of the fishing industry. Now in Cardigan

Bay there are most valuable fishing grounds, but from end to end of the Bay there is not a port which fulfils any of the conditions laid down by Sir John Goode—secure shelter from storms, good holding ground, and easy access at all states of the tide or the weather. It may be said that the decrease in the trade cannot be due to the want of harbour accommodation altogether, inasmuch as there was no better accommodation years ago when the trade was better. But conditions have changed. The markets cannot be found in the vicinity of the ports, the fish have to be sent to the great inland centres of population; and to whatever cause it may be due, it is a fact that fishing that formerly could be successfully conducted within a few miles of the shore, has now to be carried on farther out at sea. In Scotland, too, they complain that they have not sufficient harbour accommodation; and, in fact, the Fishery Board in their last Report point out that there are many points on the Scotch Coast where harbours are required, and that they have not adequate funds at their disposal. It may be mentioned, however, that in 1889 they were enabled to spend something like £10,000 in subsidising the making of proper harbours, and that during the eighty years the Act has been in force £250,000 of Imperial money has been spent upon harbours in Scotland. During the whole of that period, however, not one penny has been spent on fishing harbours in Wales. The right hon. Gentleman on a previous occasion, in replying to me, alluded to Holyhead and Milford. I do not know whether we can properly call them fishery harbours, because they do not afford easy access to the fishing grounds. That the whole of the local fishing during the year only amount to 87 tons is undoubtedly owing to the circumstance that Holyhead is not located near the fishing ground, and I think the same may be said of Milford. In Ireland, too, grants have been made from time to time. An Act was passed to devote the sum of £250,000 out of the Irish Church Fund for the purpose of making harbours along the Irish Coast. Thus, while in Scotland and Ireland

the provision of proper accommodation as essential to the development of the fishing industry has been recognised, nothing has been done as regards the English and Welsh Coasts for the express purpose of developing the fisheries; and, speaking of Cardigan Bay, I can say with the utmost confidence that nothing has been spent there by the Government. The second point complained of is the want of proper boats and tackle. That something should be done in this respect is more essential than formerly, owing to the distance from the shore at which the fish are taken. I find that in Scotland the biggest hauls are made thirty or forty miles away. The boats in use in Cardigan Bay are not fit to travel such a distance from the shore. In that bay the average tonnage of the boats is from three to seven tons, and in the largest port the average is something like eleven tons, as against the Scotch average for last year of 29½ tons. I think it was Mr. Grady who, in giving evidence before the Irish Fishery Commissioners, valued the boats engaged in the Irish herring fisheries at £1,000 to £1,100—an amount the boats in Cardigan Bay do not approach. It may be asked why the fishermen do not supply themselves with proper boats and appliances. The answer to that query is that they lack capital for the purpose, and during the inquiry instituted by the Commissioners it was discovered that to supply the fishermen with boats and gear had, as an investment, always proved a failure. In Scotland, under the Crofters Act, the Treasury was empowered to grant loans for this purpose, and the same thing has been done in Ireland. I do not, however, believe in these loans, for two reasons. One is that they are demoralising, and the other is that there is no guarantee that the proper boats will be purchased. Then, again, in the North of Scotland the instalments have not been regularly paid. One-half of the instalments are in arrears, and the Fishery Board report that there is no chance of recovery. I suggest, however, that an inquiry should be instituted as to the means of supplying fishermen with proper appliances, and, as a mere hint, that the Fishery Boards might be empowered to buy boats and let them out on hire by the year. I simply submit the matter as a proper subject for inquiry. Another matter which I think might be very properly investigated is the subject of fish culture. I find that almost every other country has done something in this direction. In Scotland there has been experimenting. The United States has taken the question into consideration; hatcheries have been placed at various parts of the coast, and in Massachusetts it is stated that the fishermen ascribe the phenomenal quantity of fish to the efforts of the Fishery Commission in relation to artificial production. Last year five hundred millions of eggs were distributed. Germany, too, has done something, with very beneficial results, and in Newfoundland the Commissioners report that the highest authorities are becoming more and more unanimous as to the desirability of the artificial production of cod. Norway has not been neglectful, and in South Holland as many as three millions of French oysters have been laid down on the banks. Formerly Cardigan Bay afforded very prolific oyster fishing. Now the beds have been destroyed, and no amount of protection will restore this branch to its old prosperity. All that can be done is to follow the example of Holland, Newfoundland, the United States, and France, by laying down oysters at such parts of the coast as are adapted for the cultivation of oysters. That, too, is a fitting subject for inquiry. I come now to the last part of the Resolution—that it is necessary to confer further powers on the Fisheries Board. At the present moment they have simply powers of restriction as to fishing in certain waters and as to modes of fishing; but they can do nothing in the way of developing the culture. In the interest of the restoration of the prosperity of our fisheries, I consider it essential that their powers should be enlarged. Scientific investigation, for instance, and other elements all tending to the development of our fisheries, might be adopted. These are points I merely suggest; but there can be no question as to the enormous importance of re-establishing and developing the fisheries of this country, and as to the necessity of England not being behind in the attention paid to this subject. I have great pleasure in seconding the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That this House is of opinion that an inquiry should be instituted into the question of the desirability of making further provision for the protection and development of Sea Fisheries on the coast of England and Wales, with special reference to the following points: (a) improved harbour accommodation; (b) the securing of expert and scientific guidance for Sea Fisheries District Boards, and the conferring thereon of larger powers; and (c) the amendment of the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act of 1888.”—(Mr. Octavius V. Morgan.)

*MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): In rising to support the Motion, my only difficulty is as to what the Government can possibly say against it. I represent a county which is especially interested. It is a long, narrow county, with a great extent of sea-board, and its fishing industry has been in a very much more flourishing condition than at present. It is said that the inhabitants themselves ought to be more alive to the well-being of this industry, but that alone, even assuming it to be true, does not seem to me to be an answer to our demand that the Government should grant this inquiry—that they should furnish us with means of knowing how far any neglect to avail themselves of natural resources or to acquire proper appliances is to blame, or how far the industry is dependent on the results of scientific research and upon the bestowal of Governmental aid. It is undisputed that the industry has been in a much more flourishing condition than it is now, and that alone is a fit subject for inquiry. It is also undisputed that there is no harbour accommodation, properly so called, from one end of Cardigan Bay to the other, and therefore the best method of remedying this defect is a legitimate subject for inquiry. I do not suppose that anyone will contend that these harbours are not capable of being rendered valuable adjuncts if they are only made to insure easiness of access, and shelter, and are given the other requirements necessary to the efficiency of the fishing industry. Moreover, the important question of fish culture is one that demands and ought to receive the attention of the Government. The same state of things exists pretty much in Pembrokeshire, where there is now comparatively little fishing. It might be within the province of those who conduct the inquiry to see how far that traffic has been retarded and kept back by the railway arrangements in the county. And in dealing with the county of Pembroke I should mention the oyster industry, to which allusion has been made. In the River Cleddau there was formerly a very important bed and an abundant supply of oysters, which were quite as good as the celebrated native or Whitstable oyster. These beds have been very unproductive of late; it may be from causes which the Government are powerless to rectify; but that is no reason why the Government should decline to grant an inquiry. One very extraordinary fact, which I do not know how the President of the Board of Trade will explain, is that whereas grants, in the shape of loans, have been made to other parts of the United Kingdom, at all events to Scotland and Ireland, no grant has been made to Wales. Wales is a very poor country, and, with the exception of certain districts, has no industry except that of agriculture; and this is, to my mind, an additional reason why the Government should look into this fishing industry, which has been more flourishing, and which, properly looked after, is capable of finding employment for people who have never received any encouragement from the powers that be. The demand we make is, I contend, a reasonable one, and I am anxious to hear what the President of the Board of Trade can urge against it. The Government have considered the principle that the question of harbour accommodation and the fishing industry are matters to be looked into and assisted in other parts of the United Kingdom, and Wales is as poor as any other part of the Kingdom, and might as properly receive attention and assistance. I maintain that in the present state of the food supply, and in the face of a rapidly-increasing population, and the danger of the lack of an ordinary supply in certain contingencies in a country like ours, it becomes more imperative and desirable that this matter should be looked into, and I urge upon the Government to accede to this very reasonable request. It is not as if we brought up a proposal crowded with detail to which the Government might object, or which they would be justified in criticising. We only ask that a matter which they have confessed is of the greatest importance should be made the subject of inquiry, and that a stimulus may be applied to an industry which was once flourishing, but is now, more or less, in a state of decay.

(9.45.) MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): Hon. Members who have taken part in this Debate are more or less connected with the West Coast of England, and the House would get a manifestly incomplete view of the situation if the East Coast were not represented. It is a striking circumstance that the returns of the amount of fish brought into the ports of the three Kingdoms during the past three years show a decrease to the enormous extent of something like 800,000 cwts.; but there is also this striking fact—that in spite of that enormous decrease in quantity the value of the diminished supply was something like one million higher than the value of the larger supply we had three years ago. This, to my mind, shows conclusively that the supply has by no means kept pace with the demand, and when we reflect that this decreased supply is in spite of the extension of steam power, improved appliances, and larger vessels, it is clear that the subject is a most serious one. Of this decrease of 800,000 cwts. for the three Kingdoms, 600,000 cwts. represents the decrease on the East Coast alone, and that opens a very serious consideration. The President of the Board of Trade must be aware of the diminished quantity of fish from the North Sea, not only by complaints from the East Coast ports, but from the countries on the other side. One thing seems to me to be very clear—that all round the three Kingdoms there is a diminished supply of fish in the inshore waters. This has brought about a very serious condition of things on many parts of our coast, because sea-fishing is the only industry that is possible to many men living in the villages and some of the smaller towns, and the decay of the industry has brought privation and distress upon those engaged in it. It is very difficult for these men who have been trained to a seafaring life to take to other occupations in middle age, and this fact adds to the distress and privation. We were very largely indebted to the President of the Board of Trade for the Act which established Sea Fisheries Committees, and perhaps he may say that it is rather soon to have an inquiry which will touch those Committees. But the Act has been in existence four years, and some of the Committees have been at work two years, and in that time some things must have been cleared up and others brought forward supplying reasons for further powers being given to these Committees. On the North East Coast there is a strong feeling that the beneficial effects of the Act of 1888 will be very largely lost unless some means are found for enabling the practical fishermen appointed by the Board of Trade to attend the Committees. Whilst the important question of trawling was under discussion they did attend, but since then they have not felt justified in making the sacrifices which attending the meetings involved, for not only did their absence from work make a considerable difference in their income, but the travelling and other necessary expenses materially increased their expenditure. Unless we can secure this, the hopes of the fishermen of the utility of these Committees will be disappointed, and I hope the President of the Board of Trade will be able to give us some assurances on that matter. Further, I may point out that the duties of those Committees are largely restricted to the regulation of the fisheries. They have no power to take in hand a decaying industry and put it on a better and firmer foundation. The question of bait has also been mentioned, and the right hon. Gentleman must be aware of the increasing difficulty which the fishermen experience in getting mussels. They have to get them from a distance, and sometimes have to pay as much as £2 or £3 for a week's bait, and then suppose, in consequence of the weather or any other cause, they are prevented from going out the whole of that expenditure is lost. This subject has already received attention, and I put it to the President of the Board of Trade that our fishermen should not be placed at a disadvantage as compared with their Scotch brethren in the facilities which are given to them in this direction. We are not likely to see any considerable revival of the mussel beds nor of the oyster beds until the Fishing Committees can do something more than merely regulate the fisheries. They ought surely to be able raise money to take up matters of this kind and so develop the fisheries. In France the experiment with the mussel beds has been remarkably successful, and it seems to me that there is nothing to hinder the same thing being done along our coasts. Another point to which I should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman is that the Fisheries Commission recommended the appointment of a Fisheries Board in England to make scientific experiments in the same way as is done by the Scotch Fishery Board.

Notice taken, that forty Members were not present; House counted, and forty Members not being present,—

till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 13th May, 1892.

Mr. SPEAKER was in his place shortly after Twelve o'clock. At half-past Twelve, attention being called to the number of Members present, Mr. Speaker counted and a quorum was not found.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE. FORMATION OF A QUORUM.

(12.40.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask you, Sir, looking at the delay in forming a quorum, is it not within your competence to direct the Serjeant-at-Arms to require the attendance of Members who may be sitting on Committees, or others who may be wasting time in other parts of this building?

*MR. SPEAKER: Members sitting on Committees have had their attention drawn in the usual way, by the ringing of the bell, to the fact that the House was being counted with a view to form a quorum. If those Members please to come down from the Committee Rooms they may do so, but it would be a strong step on my part to interrupt in the way suggested what may be very important proceedings in Committee. I will, however, let those Members know that the House is waiting for a quorum. The Serjeant-at-Arms will inform Members of Committees that the House has been long waiting for a quorum.

(12.45.) Attention again called to the number of Members present, and a quorum found in their places.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PLURAL VOTING (ABOLITION) BILL.
(No. 42.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The Bill which I have the honour to ask the House to read a second time contains one very short and simple clause for the purpose of applying a remedy to what many of us believe to be a gross anomaly, inequality, and injustice, which has survived the Reform Acts of 1867 and 1884, which was not fully appreciated when those measures were passed, and which has been considerably and inadvertently increased by the later of those Acts. It is a matter which offends against the great principle of equality of political rights under the Constitution, and which lends itself to operations for creating votes for the express purpose of overruling the votes and opinions of the resident electors in many constituencies. I do not think it can be contended that we are precluded by precedents from dealing with such a question without re-opening all the other debateable points in the franchise and distribution of seats. The House will recollect that in 1868 it remedied a grave defect in the Reform Act of the previous year by virtually getting rid of the spurious principle of the personal payment of rates as a condition of the franchise. In the same manner, I propose to ask the House to deal with the special grievance of the plural vote. I believe I am justified in saying that the Constitution has from the earliest times recognised the principle of the absolute equality of electors, in the case, at all events, of individual constituencies. But it has never conceded to electors of wealth or status a superiority of voting power over their fellow-electors. A proposal was made to give a dual vote to certain classes in 1859, but it was scouted by the Liberal Party of that day, and has never again appeared in any Liberal Reform Bill. The same principle was again proposed in Lord Derby's Reform Bill of 1867. It did not, however, meet with approval in any quarter of the House. It was condemned by the best authorities of all Parties—by my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in the strongest terms; by Mr. Lowe, the then leader of a section of Liberals who had defeated the Reform Bill of the previous year; by Mr. Henley, and by the present Prime Minister, then Lord Cranborne, who described it as unpalatable and impossible. It may be worth while to quote the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, as they seem to be almost equally applicable to the plural vote. He said,

"To the dual vote I record an implacable hostility. This dual vote is, in the first place, a gigantic engine of fraud. It is a proclamation of a war of classes. The British Constitution rests, and has rested from time immemorial, on the mutual goodwill, respect, and good feeling of the people—upon the equality which they enjoy before the eye of the law. But when you place in the hands of the rich man, under the notion of fortifying his position, this weapon to use against his poorer countrymen, on that day you sow oppression."

Mr. Lowe followed with these words—

"I cannot express the repugnance with which I view the dual vote. It seems to me to be more invidious than anything which can be devised. You are raising up a sham sort of oligarchy to control and overbalance the will of the people. I will not associate the giving of power with any shabby expedient to counteract it."

Now, it appears to me that these arguments apply—possibly not to the full extent, but to a very large extent—to the system of plural voting. It was expected that the proposal would apply to about 200,000 persons, but it was withdrawn by Mr. Disraeli, and not a tear seemed to have been shed over it. In County Council elections and elections for Municipal Corporations not only is the dual vote unknown, but if an elector has two or more qualifications in separate wards or districts he may vote only once, and, having given a vote in one ward or district, he would subject himself to a very severe penalty should he vote again in another ward. A different rule prevails in Parliamentary Elections, and although an elector is prohibited from voting in respect of more than one qualification within a borough—even where that borough is divided into several electoral districts—yet if he has separate qualifications for other boroughs or other county districts he may vote at a General Election as many times as he has separate qualifications. Before the counties were divided, in olden times, when travelling was expensive, and when tradesmen and shopkeepers in boroughs resided in their places of business, the possibility of giving plural votes in respect of different constituencies produced very little effect. But as it became easy and cheap to travel the non-resident freehold voters assumed a much greater importance, and it became worth while to acquire freehold qualifications in counties for the express purpose of giving votes. In London also, and in most towns in the country, it became the fashion for men of business and tradespeople to reside in villas and houses other than their places of business, and where there happened to be in a different constituency such persons were able to vote in respect of both qualifications. Lastly, the system under which counties have been divided into one-membered districts, and London has been divided into twenty-seven different boroughs, has greatly increased the number of plural votes. In the first place, a man may have as many votes for different county districts as he has freehold qualifications in them. Secondly, he may have as many occupation votes as he has boni fide residences in different constituencies. I know many men among my own friends who have four or five votes for different constituencies. I know men of wealth—men with very large means—who have only one vote, and I know others of smaller means who have two, three, and four and five votes. I have myself five votes for five different constituencies—not that I have sought the votes by purchasing property for that purpose; but they have come to me accidentally on account of holding property in different places. Two are occupation votes, two freehold votes, and one is for a University. But I know many who have a great many more votes than five. I think it was Sir Robert Fowler, a late Member of this House, who used to boast that he had no fewer than thirteen votes in different constituencies, and that he was able at one General Election to record them all. Then there is the well-known case of the Oxford tutor—a man who had eighteen different qualifications, and, at the Election of 1874, voted in respect of these different qualifications eighteen times. But this case pales before one I heard of recently. A clergyman of the Church of England, who has a hobby for acquiring qualifications in different constituencies, has been able to obtain fifty votes in different places, and I was informed that at a certain General

Election he contrived to vote in no fewer than forty different places. I could multiply cases—perhaps not so extreme as that—in which persons possess and record a number of votes, and I shall be able to show presently that there are in London special facilities for persons obtaining many votes in different boroughs. In the meantime, I will venture to point out another anomaly which arises out of this system of plural voting. It is one of the peculiar features of the great towns of the North, such as Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow, that they have been cut up under the Redistribution Act of 1875 into several electoral districts, but they still remain part of the same boroughs, and any voter having different qualifications can only, by law, vote in respect of one. On the other hand, where counties are cut up into several Divisions, persons having different votes may vote in the different Divisions. The county of Lancaster, for instance, is divided into twenty-three electoral districts, and I am told that there is more than one case of a firm of brewers who, by virtue of their public-houses scattered all over the county, have a large number of qualifications in a large number of different constituencies. Another anomaly arising from this system is very well illustrated by the town of Bradford—a Division of which I have the honour to represent in this House. Under the Redistribution Act of 1885 Bradford is divided into three Divisions, and there are 1,200 persons there who have qualifications in respect of two of these Divisions—that is, they reside in one, and have their places of business in another; but in a General Election they can only vote in one of the three Divisions. If they had their residences just outside the borough, as well as a place of business in the borough, they would get two votes—one for Bradford, and one for the county. It is, however, in London and in the adjoining county districts that the greatest anomalies occur, and that the system of plural voting is exhibited in its worst form. I have already pointed out that plural voting is not permitted in the London County Council elections, but it is otherwise in the case of Parliamentary Elections. It did not appear to have been considered in 1885 that London was a single community. It was treated as a congeries of distinct boroughs, and not as a single borough, like Liverpool. Before 1885 there were eleven distinct London boroughs, and a person having qualifications in two or more of them could vote in each borough at a General Election. The Act of 1885 increased the number of London boroughs to twenty-seven, and therefore the possibility of plural voting was very much increased at the same time. Some of these London boroughs are sub-divided into two or more electoral divisions. For instance, the Tower Hamlets is divided into seven divisions, Hackney into three, and St. Pancras into four; but if an elector has a voting qualification in each of these separate electoral divisions he can only vote once in any one of the boroughs, though, as I have already pointed out, if he has a qualification in another borough, he may vote also in respect of that. If his qualification arises in connection with any of the twenty-seven boroughs into which London is divided, he can vote in as many of them as he has qualifications. The effect of this sub-division has been very much to increase the possibilities of plural voting, and has very largely increased the number of votes which can be given at a General Election in the different boroughs of London. I might illustrate that by the case of a lawyer who has an office in Gray's Inn, and has a residence in Barnsbury. Before 1885, as both places were within the same borough, he could vote only once—for Finsbury. But under the Redistribution Act, one is in Holborn and the other in Islington, and such a person can vote twice. The same thing occurs in many parts of London. Nearly all professional men, most tradesmen, and a great many shopkeepers have residences in London, or in the neighbourhood of London, where they live apart from their places of business, and the number of double qualifications arising from this cause is extremely great. The fashion also has grown up for people in business to have places of business in different parts of the Metropolis, and there are many firms who have places of business in four, five, six, and even fifteen and twenty different parts of London; and I have actually ascertained that there are four or five firms in London who have places of business spread about in the different boroughs in London in greater numbers than there are boroughs, and it may be presumed, from the way in which these are scattered about, that they have qualifications in each one of the twenty-seven boroughs into which London is divided. These persons are not only on one side of politics, for a Liberal agent told me the other day that he had been successful in putting four brothers, who were members of a firm engaged in the coal trade, on the register in twenty different constituencies. Those four brothers will, therefore, have eighty votes amongst them in London at the General Election which is about to take place. I have no doubt these are representative cases, and that there are many double qualifications, and qualifications giving four, five, and even eight and ten votes to one person. The case of London is aggravated by the votes of the members of the Livery Companies in the City. There are about seven thousand liverymen who have votes for the City of London by ancient custom. Of these, five thousand have no qualification in the City of London other than that which they derive from the companies, and they are nearly all of them persons who have qualifications in other parts of London, and therefore exercise a plural vote. Then, again, the case of the counties round London is of an exceptional character. Before 1885 Middlesex was one county, and all the freeholders of London voted in the County of Middlesex. By the Act of 1885 the county was split up into seven different divisions, and the freeholders were attached to four—namely, Tottenham, Hornsey, Ealing, and Harrow, and in these divisions the freeholders of London vote not because they have any property in those divisions, but by virtue of the freehold qualifications they have in other parts of London. Take the case of Tottenham as an illustration. There are 2,800 non-resident voters, and of these 500 only obtain their qualification within the division; the other 2,300 derive their qualification from freeholds in Hackney, Tower Hamlets, and other parts of East London. They are separated from the division of Tottenham by many miles. They do not even go to Tottenham for the purpose of recording their votes; they have voting places erected specially for them in the East of London, and they vote for Tottenham, though they have no real connection of any kind with the people of Tottenham. The consequence is that they exercise a great, and indeed overwhelming, influence in the elections which take place; and Tottenham, which is really a typical working man's constituency, is converted into a preserve of another kind by the 2,300 freehold voters in the East of London. These people are entirely separated from Tottenham; and the result is, that the whole thing falls into the hands of the election agents, whose policy and duty it is to look about in the East of London for Parliamentary voters whom they can put on the register for Tottenham. The opinions of the people of Tottenham are overruled by these freeholders, who are put on the register by the election agents to achieve that purpose. The same thing takes place in the other divisions of Middlesex—Harrow, Ealing, and Hornsey; and I have great complaints from all these three places as to the effect of the present system of plural voting arising from these non-resident freeholders in other parts of London, who have no connection with the divisions, and do not even go there for the purpose of voting. The freeholders of the City of London vote for the division of Hornsey, with which division they have no connection, either by property or residence, and on the election day polling places are erected for them in the City. I have also had very great complaints from the Harrow Division as to the multiplication of freehold votes by rent-charges on freehold property in London. In one single property in a part of London, which for this purpose is attached to the division of Harrow, there are no fewer than twenty rent-charges imposed for the purpose of creating twenty different qualifications for electors in the Harrow Division, and all these twenty persons have other qualifications for other constituencies. On another property, also within the part of London in which the freeholders vote for Harrow, there are no fewer than fourteen rent-charges, by which fourteen persons are entitled to vote for a division. The same thing takes place in Wimbledon, that portion of the County of Surrey which is nearest to London. The freeholders of London, south of the Thames, about three thousand in number, are attached to that division, and they exercise an overwhelming influence on the elections for Wimbledon, though they have no more connection with the division than the freeholders of East London have with Tottenham, and do not even go to the division for the purpose of recording their votes. They have polling places specially erected for them, and are merely gathered together by the election agents for the purpose of overruling and overriding the popular feeling. I venture to say that these anomalies are of a very extraordinary character, and ought to be removed. I could give illustrations of the same kind of thing in the North of England, and it may be laid down that all the great towns in the North of England are surrounded by county divisions in which the free holders of the towns, besides having votes for the towns in respect of residential qualifications, have votes because of the freeholds in the towns, and are thus able to swamp and overrule the opinions of the actual resident voters. Then there is another class of plural voter—the purely residential occupation voter—to whose case I have already slightly alluded. There are numbers of people who have residences in London and in the country—sometimes more than one residence in the country; and in such cases the plural vote extends not only to them, but also to their servants. I have been told of the case of a gentleman who has three occupation qualifications—one in London, one in the country, and one up in the moorlands of Lancashire—and his coachman, by virtue of the service franchise, has three votes also. How many of these plural voters exist throughout the country it is impossible to ascertain with any accuracy. A Return before the House shows that there are 180,000 non-resident freeholders; but I believe it is admitted that the Return is very defective, and I do not think it can be relied upon. Probably four-fifths of these non-resident voters have other qualifications in respect of which they vote elsewhere, and therefore they are probably all of them plural voters. There are no means either of ascertaining the number of double qualifications arising from the residential and service franchises, but the number of double qualifications and plural votes of all kinds must be very great. It seems to me that the system which I have described is open to all the objections which were urged in 1867 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), Mr. Lowe, and others, against the system of dual votes. It may be described, in their words, as a system of fraud on the constituencies, which strikes at the very root of the principle of equality and of the Constitution. I have shown how full of anomalies it is, how uncertain it is in its operation, and how unequal it is in different parts of the country, and I have also shown how it lends itself to the machinations of the election agent, with a view to the accumulation of votes in a particular district, to overrule the will and opinion of the resident voters. The system I have described is a symbol of class privilege. It is one for which a remedy ought to be applied. The Bill which I ask the House to read a second time to-day proposes to apply a remedy, and it proposes to apply to this system of plural voting exactly the same rule which now applies in the case of the seven divisions of Liverpool and the seven divisions of Glasgow, or in the case of the various divisions into which London is split up for the purpose of the County Council elections. It proposes to enact that a single person having one or more qualifications shall only vote in an election for one place; and that when he exercises his vote for one place, he will exhaust his qualification for every place, and that if, after having voted once, he gives a vote for any other place, he will be subject to penalties under the Corrupt Practices Act. This will not be so severe a penalty as exists in the cases of Borough Council elections, or County Council elections in London.

I thought those penalties were rather high, so I have taken the penalty as provided in the Corrupt Practices Act. It seems to me that there will be no difficulty in maintaining these prohibitions. The prohibition already applies in the case of great towns like Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow, and there is no difficulty in enforcing it; and as plural votes are for the most part in the hands of persons of the wealthy classes, it is not to be expected that they would exercise their votes more than once lest they should incur the penalties of the Bill. The Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) proposes to meet my Bill by an Amendment, which, so far as I understand it, does not traverse the principle of the Bill itself. I understand that the hon. Member by his Amendment practically admits the anomaly and injustice of the present state of the law. He does not deny that the system is unjust in its working; what he practically says by his Amendment is that he and the House are not prepared to make a change in the direction indicated by the Bill, unless it is at the same time proposed to correct other anomalies which exist in the redistribution of seats. It appears to me that the issue which he raises is irrelevant to that which I have submitted to the House, and I gather that his principal motive is to raise the question of the representation of Ireland and Wales. May I point out to hon. Members opposite that this question was raised and discussed at some length on the Redistribution Bill of 1885, and a Motion was moved on the Second Reading by Sir John Hay to the effect that no redistribution would be satisfactory which did not reduce the representation of Ireland in accordance with its population? That Motion was supported by only twenty-five Members, and was rejected by a large majority. It is quite true that then, as now, Ireland was over-represented in proportion to its actual population as compared with the United Kingdom, and that Wales was and is now in the same position: But there were three main arguments which induced the House not to enter upon this thorny and difficult question. The first was, that Ireland was no more over-represented in this House than the purely agricultural counties of England, including the boroughs within this area, and that it would be unjust to take Members from Ireland and give them to the populous parts of England until the same measure had been applied to the English rural districts. It was felt by many that in so far as the existing system somewhat favoured thinly-populated rural districts where the population is spread over a large area, involving great labour in canvassing, there was something to be said for it. Secondly, it was urged that it would be somewhat shabby treatment to Ireland to take Members from her at a time when from causes of a perhaps temporary character her representation had become above what she was strictly entitled to on the basis of population, when for seventy years at least since the Act of Union she was greatly under-represented during the greater part of the time, by of at least half the number her population entitled her to. Thirdly, it was urged that if the Catholics in Ireland are somewhat over-represented there is a very large population of Irish Catholics in English and Scotch constituencies—I should say about one million and a half—who are completely lost in the surrounding constituencies, and who have no direct representation in this House, in the exception, perhaps, of one hon. Member who may fairly be said to represent a portion of them. The arguments had weight with the House on the occasion I refer to, and I believe that in the main these arguments would still prevail if the subject were discussed at any length—at least, in the present relation of Ireland to the Imperial Parliament. I may mention that if we take the eighteen most purely agricultural counties of England, including Lincolnshire, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, Northamptonshire, Oxford, Huntingdon, Rutland, Berkshire, Somerset, Wilts, Devon, and others, you will find that they have a population of four millions six hundred thousand, exactly the population of Ireland; and these eighteen counties are represented by one hundred and one Members, which is exactly the number of Irish Members. To complete the analogy, I find that the minority in these counties is represented in this House in about the same proportion as the minority in Ireland. That shows, I think, that until the whole question of redistribution of seats is entertained, it would not be fair to entertain the question of the reduction of the representation of Ireland. I do not believe there is any general concurrence in favour of reducing the representation of the counties mentioned, and giving their Members to the populous parts of England. Personally, I should not be averse to a redistribution of seats on a purely population basis; but I do not believe public opinion is ripe for such a scheme. It would interfere with too many interests. It would necessitate the extinction of boroughs, in the sense that their boundaries would no longer be the limits of the constituencies, and it would involve a transfer of Members from the rural districts to the populous districts. I do not see any such general concurrence of public opinion as would make such a change possible. Certainly, in the present condition of the relations of Ireland to the Imperial Parliament, and having regard to the arguments I have ventured to present in respect of the agricultural parts of England and of the boroughs, I do not think, if the matter were thoroughly discussed, the Amendment of the hon. Member would be adopted, or that the House would entertain any great scheme of redistribution. The question raised by the Bill, I venture to submit to the House, is one which is altogether apart from any question of redistribution of seats. It raises the questions of equality of electoral rights, and of the abolition of privilege as between the wealthy and the poor; it aims at equal treatment of persons of all classes. Having these great objects in view, it has commended itself to great bodies of people throughout the country, and I believe there is no question raised of recent years which has aroused greater interest in the country, or which is more certain at an early day to require to be dealt with by Parliament. I beg to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

*(1.40.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The right hon. Gentleman said that this question was one in which the country is considerably interested; but if the interest of the country in any question is measured by the interest shown by the House, no one would believe it was a very interesting question who saw you, Sir, sitting there, till ten minutes to one, waiting for enough Members to make a House. There are two ways of meeting a Motion like that of the right hon. Gentleman. There is the way I propose, and there is that suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Whitmore), of rejecting the Bill altogether. Although I do not take that course I am far from denying that there is something to be said for it. We do not under the Constitution give the vote as a right to any man, or every man would have it, and we know that every man has not got the vote. The vote is attached to the holding of a house or land in any part of the country, and it is defensible for anyone on the opposite side to say they will not go behind the register of houses and lands. I do not take those grounds; my Amendment deals with the question as part of the democratic tendencies of the time. The right hon. Gentleman was quite right when he said I did not attack the principle of his Bill. The question has been raised before, but not as one of those great political issues with which we have had to deal in the last sixty years. During that period, by a gradual process of electoral evolution, we have reached our present position, which is the enfranchisement of the capable male citizen. The Bill proposes to break through that. The right hon. Gentleman professes to have discovered for the first time that owing to the property qualification in different parts of the country the rich voter has some advantage over the poor one, and he proposes to disfranchise by his Bill a properly qualified elector who may have a twofold qualification. The right hon. Gentleman says that he has five votes; I have two: one in Dublin and one in Chelsea; and I must make up my mind under the Bill at which of these places I will give my vote. I have said this is not the first time this proposal has been made. The right hon. Gentleman talked about a discussion on dual voting in 1867, but I think he will admit that that discussion ranged more on the question of the creation of faggot votes than on that of dual voting, as dealt with in this Bill. The right hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) then declared his impregnable hostility to dual voting; but in 1884 he positively refused to adopt a Motion precisely similar to this Bill, and therefore I take it that in 1867 he was declaring really his impregnable hostility to faggot voting. In 1884 the Representation of the People Bill was before the House, by which two million new electors were to be added to the electorate. Mr. MacLaren, sitting on the Government side below the Gangway, moved an Amendment in Committee on that Bill proposing to prevent the holder of dual votes voting at both places. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) said that a proposal was made to reduce the Irish representation, which was only supported by twenty-five votes. But how many votes did Mr. Maclean's proposal of "One Man One Vote" secure? It only secured forty-three, and the Front Bench with the right hon. Member for Midlothian declined to support him. It is singular that right hon. Gentlemen find things convenient when they are out of office which they do not find convenient when in office. That is the case here. What is the position I take up in my Amendment? I simply say that I should be content, and those who support me would be content, to go on with the franchise as it is. We consider that the electoral machine is in good order and capable of doing good work; but if there is any overwhelming anxiety to have the machinery renewed, or to have any new constitutional machinery introduced, then we contend that, instead of tinkering with the voting machinery, we should see that the constitutional machinery we are to get and which is to be put in its place is machinery that will stand the wear and tear before it, and that is powerful enough to stand the test to which it will be submitted in the future. That is exactly the position we take up. What would be done by this Bill? I do not speak of the Bill from a party standpoint, because the right hon. Gentleman has admitted that it cannot entirely be called a party question. These dual votes do not belong to one party—they belong to both. What does this question amount to, when we look at it as regards the votes that would be affected by this Bill, if it were passed, in England and Wales? They number 199,843. These are the men out of something like four millions that would be affected by a vote of this kind. In the counties there are 121,287 non-resident voters, and 10,770 non-resident occupation electors; in the boroughs there are 56,630 non-resident occupation voters, and 11,156 non-resident voters; making a total of 199,843 electors. It is not a very large measure at best, and cannot be entitled a party measure, although if right hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition Front Bench did not expect to derive some party advantage from it, they would not be moving it now when they rejected it in 1884. Still, I do not look at it as a strictly party measure, and I do not think it would very greatly matter on either side if it were to be passed. The right hon. Gentleman over and over again in his speech used the words "equality in voting." I agree, if his object be to secure equality in voting, that he ought to be supported. I am in favour of equal voting, and that is the object with which I put my Amendment on the Paper. "One Man One Vote," if you like; but "One Vote One Value," in addition to that. If the right hon. Gentleman is anxious about equality of voting, I cannot see how he can possibly oppose my Amendment. Take the present distribution of the population in the country. The population of England and Wales, according to the Census of 1891, was, roughly speaking, twenty-seven and a half millions, and England has 461 Members. The population of Wales was 1,500,000, and Wales has thirty-four Members. The population of Scotland was a little over 4,000,000, with 72 Members. The population of Ireland was 4,750,000, with 103 Members. If the Members were distributed according to population in the three countries, we should reach this result : In England there would be 484 Members instead of 461 ; in Wales there would be thirty-one instead of thirty-four ; Scotland would have exactly the same number as it has now ; and Ireland, instead of 103, would have eighty-three Members. There would be a reduction of twenty in Ireland, and three in Wales. Now, in order to secure equality in voting, there would not only require to be a redistribution as between the three Kingdoms, but there would have to be a very extensive redistribution in Ireland itself. Let us take some of the glaring anomalies; and I quite admit, as the right hon. Gentleman contends, that this dual vote is an anomaly ; but the Constitution is full of anomalies. All I contend for is this : If we are going to take the Constitution to pieces in order to correct anomalies, let us correct some other anomalies which are equally patent and flagrant while we are at the work. Let us take some of the facts as regards Irish representation, not as affecting the relation between Ireland and England, but as affecting the relation between one part of Ireland and another. Let us take three boroughs represented by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. Take the borough of Galway. It has 1,655 electors ; Kilkenny has 1,639 electors ; and Newry has 1,875 electors. In all three boroughs there are 5,169 electors, and they send three Members to sit below the Gangway in this House ; and the borough of Belfast with 35,000 electors only sends four Members to this House. Now, Mr. Speaker, on what principle has a wretched Galway freeman, worn out by corruption, as the whole class is worn out——? (" Oh, oh !") The whole class of freemen in Galway, I say ; who will stand up and defend them ? On what principle is a Galway freeman to be counted as six times more influential than a Belfast artisan in this House. If that is not an anomaly greater than the dual vote, I do not know how to weigh the comparative merits of questions. Take the Counties of Kerry and Antrim. The County of Kerry has 20,792 electors, the County of Antrim has 36,712 electors. Antrim has 16,000 electors more than Kerry, and they have four Members apiece. Take the County of Longford, and contrast it with the County of Londonderry. Longford has two Members and 10,014 electors, and Londonderry has 20,845 electors, and only two Members. Take Donegal and contrast it with Down. Donegal has 28,149 electors, while Down has 38,982 ; and they have four Members each. The average Unionist vote in Ireland for a seat in this House is 9,100 in the counties ; and the average Nationalist vote is 7,300 in the counties. In the boroughs the average Unionist vote is 8,800, and the average Nationalist vote is 5,200. The right hon. Gentleman thought it would be unfair to interfere with the Irish representation. Some hon. Members in this House have gone so far as to say that it would be unconstitutional ; but that stand has not been taken to-day. It cannot be more unfair to bring the Irish representation into harmony with the population of the country than if we were to attempt to change the relation between England and Ireland on a representation so flagrantly unjust as that. The anomaly is not confined to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that. There are three boroughs in England which have only 13,030 electors altogether, and yet have three Members, namely—Gravesend, which has only 4,695 electors, Hythe, which has 4,167, and Kidderminster, which has 4,168 electors ; whereas the great borough of Wandsworth, a suburb of London, with 16,283 electors, has only one Member. It may not be fair, in the right hon. Gentleman's opinion, to touch the representation of Ireland under the circumstances. I hold it would be unfair and positively unjust to proceed to the discussion of any question involving the relation of Ireland and England with a representation so flagrantly unjust to the Unionist Party as it is at present. My contention, as regards this whole subject, is an exceedingly simple contention. The right hon. Gentleman denies that it would be possible to reconstruct the seats without great labour and without much time. With that I am inclined to agree. I think it would take time and labour ; and because I think that, I complain that it was not done when the seats were being redistributed and the votes were being dealt with. They might have been dealt with in 1884. The right hon. Gentlemen on that Bench neglected to do it; and the real reason why they did not touch the Irish representation was, not that they thought that Ireland had special claims, or that the population of Ireland might be increased in the future; but both sides of the House were afraid to touch it. They ought to have dealt with it; but neither side dared to grasp the nettle. I move this Resolution, not because I am against "One Man One Vote"—I am prepared to welcome it—but, whilst you are seeking for equality in voting, I say you cannot reach that end unless you supplement the proposal for "One Man One Vote" by a proposal for equal electoral districts, and for every vote to be of the same value. So far as I am concerned, what I have to say to the right hon. Gentleman is simply this: If he wishes that end, I am ready to support him, if he is really anxious that every vote should be of equal value and that we should not give a power to one man that another has not got I am ready to support him. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

*(2.16.) MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): In rising to second this Amendment I do not wish to take exactly the same line as that taken by my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone with regard to the Bill which has been brought before the House to-day. I think that a good deal may be said against the measure upon its own merits, and that the principle proposed to be introduced by it requires very careful examination before it should be adopted by us. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was very severe in his criticisms on a voter who might have votes in more than one place; but it seems to me that what is called the non-resident voter may easily have very great material interests in more than the district in which he actually resides. A merchant, for instance, of the City of London may be a useful and valuable member of the community not only in the city where he does his business, but also in the suburb in which he resides. The principle of the Bill is really one which does away with what has been always recognised as a qualification for the possession of the electoral privilege of this country, because it says that although a man may, perhaps, be the largest ratepayer in his own parish, yet he shall be deprived of a vote in that parish. Now, if you take away the electoral right based upon property on that account, are you also going to relieve him from the obligation of paying rates? Otherwise, you will have representation dissociated entirely from taxation. But, as the question of equality of voting has been raised by the Bill, I think it is perfectly to the purpose that my hon. Friend should ask that when this principle is taken into account, other anomalies than that of plural voting should also be discussed. There is no greater anomaly anywhere than the present representation of Ireland. The right hon. Member for Bradford said that this subject of "One Man One Vote" excited great interest in the country. I have spoken to many audiences on the question of the excessive representation of Ireland, and I have found that everywhere it is regarded as a very great grievance by the people of this country. In fact, the excessive representation of Ireland now is considered throughout Great Britain as a fraud upon the constituencies of this country. It seems to me that the Amendment affirms a simple proposition, which I am astonished that any man on the opposite side of the House should not gladly embrace. It lays down the plain statement that in a democratic system of government it is essential that all votes for the election of Members of Parliament shall be of equal value. The right hon. Member for Bradford criticised that proposal, and with a most wonderful amount of ingenious hair-splitting discovered all manner of objections to it. I have never heard even the pretence of an argument in favour of the maintenance of the present system of the representation of Ireland, except one, which, to my astonishment, has been made by some Members on this side of the House, and also by some hon. Members opposite. It is that it is an obligation of the Act of Union that we should maintain the existing number of Members for Ireland. That is an argument which cannot lie in the mouths of hon. Gentlemen opposite, at all events, because they are extremely anxious to repeal the Act of Union altogether, and on various occasions during the present century they have already materially altered that Act. The maintenance and preservation of the Established Church of Ireland was an essential part of the Act of Union, and yet what weight had the moral obligation imposed by that guarantee upon the present Leader of the Opposition when he took it into his head that it was desirable to disestablish the Irish Church? The present representation of Ireland depends upon other considerations altogether. It cannot be described as an essential part of the Act of Union. It was based on considerations of the proportion between the wealth and resources of Ireland with those of Great Britain at the time of the Union; and I have a speech of Lord Castlereagh, made in the Irish Parliament before the Union, which describes very clearly the way in which the conclusion to give Ireland one hundred Members was arrived at by the Government of that time. Lord Castlereagh said—

“As to representation, the object should be to take it in the combined rate of numbers and of wealth. Now, the population of Great Britain was supposed to exceed ten millions and that of Ireland to be between three-and-a-half and four millions. Here was a proportion of more than two to one. On the other hand, the contributions of Great Britain were to the contributions of Ireland as intended to be fixed by the Act of Union about as seven-and-a-half to one. These two proportions taken together would produce a mean proportion of about five-and-a-half to one. If, therefore, with the British House of Commons consisting of five hundred and fifty-eight Members, Ireland should send one hundred, I am of opinion she will be fairly and adequately represented.”

These are evidently shifting conditions. The population of England since that time has increased very nearly threefold, the population of Ireland has barely increased at all, and if you take contributions to the Imperial Revenue into account, I may say the burden of England is proportionately very much heavier now than it was at any previous period during this century.

In that case there ought to be a very great change, according to the conditions laid down at that time, in the representation of Ireland in this Parliament, and England has an equitable right to demand that her population shall be properly represented in this House. The right hon. Member for Bradford, among other ingenious arguments, said that it was not only in Ireland that anomalies exist, but that there are anomalies in the representation of this country. The rural districts, he said, were over-represented in proportion to the great towns. But does he fail to see that, if we take from Ireland the twenty-three Members to which she is not now legitimately entitled, the Members will be transferred to the great boroughs of England, and that thereby the excessive representation of the rural districts of this country will be completely done away with and the representation fairly distributed over the boroughs and the rural districts? Then the right hon. Gentleman also said that there were one and a half million Irish Catholics in this country who were not represented at all. Why, our great grievance is that they are so very largely represented at the present moment. The fact is that the population of England in our great towns has grown very largely through Irish immigration into England. A large proportion of the population of Ireland has gone away from Ireland, part to America, I admit, but a very large part has also settled in England. Those Irishmen who come over and settle in our midst under our free Constitution at once enjoy the privilege of voters. At the time of the 1885 election, it was reckoned that the Irish vote which was so much in dispute between the two great parties in this House was very large in more than forty different boroughs, and that the difference in the strength between Conservatives and Radicals at that time was so small that the Irish vote in most of these boroughs would be quite sufficient to put the balance of power in the hands of Irish electors. That is a state of things with which many of us on both sides of the House must be perfectly familiar, and it is therefore absurd for the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Irish electors of Great Britain are not adequately represented. I remember hearing the hon. Member for North-West Lanark (Mr. Cuninghame Graham), whose frankness we always admire, say in this House that he was elected not by the Scotch voters in his constituency who are supposed to send him here, but as Member for Mr. Parnell; and we all know that in the next Parliament there will be a considerable number of Members sent to support the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, who will really be here as Members for Archbishop Walsh and the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). That is the result of the immigration of a large number of Irishmen into this country; and all we say is that when they come here and get votes they ought to transfer with them from Ireland their fair share of electoral power. As it is, these Irish residents in our midst not only control the elections in our large boroughs, but are still represented in the depopulated districts of Ireland from which they have come by Members who have really no moral right to sit in this House. This is a very great question. An Irish vote at the present moment is not only as good as, but a great deal better than, an English vote; and what we want is fair play all round. I do not think that this proposal can possibly do any injustice to the Irish voter. We are not seeking to disfranchise anyone. We simply say that if we give them votes in England they shall not also maintain their representation in Ireland to the same extent. I am quite persuaded that the Government could undertake no more popular measure than a Bill for redistributing the whole of the representation of the United Kingdom in a fair way. It is very important that this task should now be undertaken, because we have under consideration a vital question affecting the whole of the United Kingdom, and the presence of so large an Irish population in our midst, combined with the excessive representation of Ireland, must prevent the opinions and wishes of the English people from being fairly and freely expressed in this House. In very many constituencies the real opinions of the English people are completely misrepresented by the Members who are sent to this House by an Irish vote which is stronger than the difference between the Conservative and the Radical Parties in those divisions, and when a great vital question of this sort is at issue there can be no doubt that the real feeling of the whole of the population should be expressed upon it. That cannot be done until this excessive representation of Ireland is redressed. I say that the rule of the Unionist Party is to have fair play all round. We are anxious to give to Irishmen everything that Englishmen and Scotchmen can fairly claim in the way of the rights of self-government; but, at the same time, we protest against this artificial misrepresentation of Ireland in the House of Commons, which gives to a small section of the population of the United Kingdom the right, on critical occasions, to determine the destinies of the Empire.

Mr. Maclean

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it would not be just or expedient to carry out the principle of 'One Man One Vote' embodied in this Bill unless the number of representatives allotted to England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland respectively were previously settled in proportion to the population of each of those parts of the United Kingdom, and the principle of equality in voting thus secured."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

(2.32.) MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I have listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. While it was directed to a matter of considerable importance with respect to the question of representation, it was as wide from the original question before the House as one can well conceive. The hon. Member for South Tyrone endeavoured to hold up this scheme as something that is more desirable than the scheme which has been proposed by the Mover of the Resolution. Now, I have sat here since a quarter to one o'clock, and I have listened to two speeches with reference to the Amendment, and I confess that I have been unable to find out what the question of the redistribution of seats has to do with the question of the plural vote; I also entirely fail to see what the question of the plural vote has to do with Unionism or non-Unionism as regards the Union of England and Ireland. It has been pretty generally admitted that the results of plural voting are not so entirely political as they are personal. The hon. Member for South Tyrone stated that he had no sympathy with the argument that it was only fair and reasonable that the people who have property in different boroughs should have votes in each borough; but we wished to hear what arguments he had to advance against the principle which is embodied in this Bill, and which we, on this side of the House, declare to be thoroughly sound. We cannot see the difference between a man having a number of votes in one constituency, and having a number of votes in adjacent constituencies. In London a man may not have a vote in the two divisions of Shoreditch, or in all the seven divisions of the Tower Hamlets. He may, however, vote in any number of the adjacent districts, provided they are not in the same borough. The position of affairs in London, therefore, makes it exceedingly difficult for hon. Gentlemen opposite to argue that it is a fair and right thing to give a man a vote in a number of different constituencies when he has not the right given to him of plural voting in any one constituency. That is a point which hon. Gentlemen opposite do not care to deal with. They try to entangle the question by raising an entirely different matter—they drag a red herring across the track by raising the question as to whether Ireland is over-represented or not. Now, the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment and the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down have spoken as if the question of the redistribution of seats generally were involved, as well as those great anomalies which exist, and in which we find that large bodies of voters are represented to only the same extent as small bodies of voters. But I would point out to the House that much greater anomalies in this respect exist in England than in Ireland, and that if the matter is to be tackled at all it should first be dealt with within the limits of England. What does the

hon. Member for South Tyrone say? Why, that—

But I would point out that the principle of equality is not in any way interfered with. The hon. Gentleman dwelt with considerable force upon the fact that the population of three small constituencies in Ireland was only about one-third or one-fourth of the average population of many boroughs in the United Kingdom, and he said those constituencies were represented by Members of the National Party. Yet the House should remember that there are not fewer than thirteen or fourteen constituencies in England and Wales alone—to say nothing of Scotland, in which there are a considerable number—of the same size as those referred to by the hon. Member, which also elect Members of Parliament. There are likewise no fewer than twenty-eight, if not thirty, borough constituencies in England and Wales which do not contain more than half the number of voters in the average constituencies, which are also represented in Parliament. Out of the thirteen boroughs I have referred to, I find that nearly all of them are represented by the Party opposite. So that “What is sauce for the goose is also sauce for the gander”; and if you say that before you can remedy this anomaly you must alter the representation of some parts of Ireland to meet the wishes of a certain Party in that country, then we answer that these anomalies exist to a much larger extent in other parts of Great Britain, and it is equally useless now to call for their rectification. If we were to take the twenty or the twenty-three Members referred to from Ireland and give them to England, the hon. Member who seconded the Amendment thinks that would enable us to meet the difficulty. Why, the difficulty in England is not only one of under-representation of certain districts, but of the over-representation of others. There are a large number of constituencies—thirty at any rate—in regard to which complete redistribution is required. There are certain parts of England where the over-representation is very marked—as in Cornwall, Devon, and Somerset. Therefore the whole case is full of anomalies, and to imagine that they can be removed by depriving Ireland of a certain number of Members and giving them to England is about the most ridiculous assumption ever made. What the hon. Member should have urged was that there should be a Redistribution Bill brought in to remove the whole of the anomalies, if it is required; but it was not his object to do that. His Amendment was something very different. He says only that Ireland is over-represented, and that we should proceed to diminish its representation. It should be remembered that fifty years ago the population of Ireland was more than half that of England, and very nearly one-third of the population of the whole of the United Kingdom. Then it was represented by 103 Members out of 665—that is to say, by less than a sixth of the whole. That state of things continued till the population of Ireland diminished; it has now come down to a seventh. That has been the result of your precious government of Ireland—that is the way in which you have made Ireland a “prosperous country” as you now call it. I wish the House to observe that practically up to 1880, Ireland was under-represented, and that whilst the population of that country has decreased nearly one-half during the last fifteen years, that of the rest of the United Kingdom has very nearly doubled. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Amendment referred to the Act of Union. The Act of Union guarantees to Ireland one hundred Members in this House. “But,” says the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), “that should not be used as an argument for the retention here of one hundred Representatives, because the side of politics to which you belong are willing to change that Act.” Yes, but the side to which the hon. Member belongs is unwilling to change that Act, and they go through the country declaring that everything is going to ruin, because we are going to change it. That Act is the rock to which they cling; it is the anchor of the whole case for them. Well, the Act of Union is perfectly clear on this matter. The fourth Article of it says one hundred Commoners is to be the number to sit and vote on the part of Ireland in the House of Commons of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. That is a provision of a Clause of the Act of Union, and yet the hon. Member for South Tyrone is perfectly prepared to urge the desirability of meddling with it in order to hinder a desirable English reform. The attention of the House, I am sorry to say, has been diverted from the main issue before us, which is decidedly and distinctly an act of justice. But that is the fault of those who have drawn a red herring across the path in the form of the Amendment. Now, I will ask the House to look for a moment at the magnitude of the figures bearing on this question as contained in a Return obtained by the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) in 1888, and I take it that those figures have not materially altered since then. The Return in question showed that two hundred thousand votes would be struck off the register if this Bill became law. But I venture to believe that those numbers are grossly minimised, and no doubt many hon. Members who have looked into this matter as it affects their own constituency will agree with me. In my own constituency, for example, the outvoters constitute ten per cent. of the whole, according to the register; but I feel sure there are a great many more, because the register is very carelessly made up, and here I may incidentally say that there is great need for a better method of making up the registers. Judging from my own experience, I venture to think that instead of 200,000 votes this Bill, if passed, would affect double that number. To a large extent these plural voters are concentrated in a certain number of constituencies which they are practically able to secure for their Party. The existence of plural votes is especially noticeable in and around London. In the Wimbledon district the sub-voters are twenty-five per cent. of the whole, and in the Tottenham district—and in this case I only speak from memory—

they are about twenty per cent. of the whole. In such constituencies as these, scattered all over the country, the resident voters are completely outvoted by persons from outside, and this constitutes, I think, a very unsatisfactory element in the politics of this country. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced this Bill spoke about the plural voting of London, and it is only as a Metropolitan Member that I have ventured to do so too. I should like to add to what I have already said that in London, on the marked registers, there are more than 35,000 double voters; and basing my estimate on what I know of constituencies, I say that that number does not represent more than half the truth. Well, Sir, I trust the House will see its way to vote in favour of this reform. It is a matter of regret to me that we have to vote on an Amendment which hon. Members who have supported it have failed to show has anything to do with the main issue. It is, however, a consolation to know that if this Bill is not passed in the present Parliament it will be in one not now very remote. Plural voting is a remnant of an old and bad system, which stands condemned amongst the masses of the people, and which the House has practically condemned also, and I trust hon. Members will see their way to support the Second Reading of this Bill.

*(3.0.) MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I agree with the Amendment that if the principle of "One Man One Vote" is to be carried out it must be accompanied by a large and drastic measure of redistribution, which will take into account, not only the relative population of Great Britain and Ireland, but the varying population of different districts of Great Britain itself. But as one who is absolutely opposed to the principle of "One Man One Vote," I think it only right that I should have put on the Paper an Amendment directly traversing the policy of this Bill; and although I shall not have the opportunity of taking a Division on my Amendment, yet in the few remarks I have to make now I should like to say something on the real issue put before us by this Bill. Now I contend, in the first place, that no real injustice is inflicted upon a community or individual voters by the system of plural voting. I contend, moreover, that there is no possessor of a single vote who should feel any sense of hardship in the fact that another voter has more than one vote, providing that that further vote is held in respect of a substantial and bona fide interest in a constituency. It may be well that when this House has to consider the whole question of representation once more it should provide more stringent measures for the prevention of the artificial creation of rent-charges. But by this Bill you are seeking to punish the innocent with the fictitious possessor of a vote. I repeat that a man who has only one vote cannot and does not feel any real sense of wrong because his neighbour happens to have another bona fide qualification. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has told the House that he has five votes. Well, if he possesses them in virtue of a substantial stake in particular constituencies, I confess I cannot bring myself into a state of hysterical indignation so as to grudge him, for one moment, the possession of them. I should like to lay before the House a concrete illustration. Suppose the case of an owner of land in Kent. The man farms a certain amount of land in that county, employs a good deal of labour, pays considerable rates, is an active member of the local bodies, and endeavours to interest himself in every local good work. Suppose also that that man happens to be a large employer in London, as a man of business, and that, in consequence, he is obliged to make his home in the Metropolis during some portion of the year. He must be a large ratepayer in London, and perhaps he exerts himself whilst here in every good work just the same as when he is in the country. Will the House say that that man would not have a proper sense of direct personal injury and wrong if it is decided that he must elect to vote either in London or in Kent, and not in both places? Suppose he elects to vote in London only, and a question involving the nationalisation or municipalisation of land—and, therefore, his land—comes before the country at an election, would it not be a monstrous wrong that he should not be able to give a vote on this question in Kent? Or, if he elects to vote in Kent and the question of a legal eight hours day comes before the constituencies, would it not be a monstrous wrong that he should not have a right to vote in London on that question? When you come to the bottom of this matter, the idea of right hon. and hon. Members opposite is that you can give effect to some sort of equality between men. Well, I do not think that is either natural or possible; I do not believe that by legislation you can prevent one man having more political power than another. You may try, but your idea is Utopian, delusive, and merely encourages false hopes. You cannot create equality between individual voters, for it must always be the case that character, intellect, knowledge and influence in a locality will give to one man more power than to another, despite the most absolutely perfect system of "One Man One Vote." Does it at present look as if the power of wealth to influence voters is at all diminishing? I do not think so, and therefore I believe that any idea of giving to individual men votes of absolutely equal value is illusory, and I think would also be injurious. It is curious to see four ex-Cabinet Ministers and the representatives of Trade Unionism combining in an endeavour to prevent the exercise of the franchise by a body of men who, by the very exercise of their vote, prove their interest, for it necessarily follows that a freeholder living in one place who takes the trouble to vote in another constituency must be genuinely interested. It is curious, too, to note that those gentlemen are not affected by the other gross anomalies which mark representation in different parts of the country. When it comes to the question of the abuse of the illiterate vote—and it is a notorious and undisputed abuse in Ireland—right hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition Front Bench will not even condescend to discuss the question except through the rather indiscreet utterances of an ambitious Whip. The action of right hon. Gentlemen opposite has been to show extreme gentleness to murder, where it was the murder of gamekeepers; they have wept over the woes of a Miss Cass; they are very anxious to find excuses for social intimidation, and some of them have not shown any desire to make the conviction of criminal clerks more easy. But now they come as a united Party to inflict novel penalties on the freeholders of England who, at their own expense and trouble, dare to exercise the vote. For those reasons I do not shrink from meeting the plain issue. I hope this Bill will fail, and I hope that for all time a large majority in this House will maintain with me that no injustice to the community or to the individual is caused by the plural vote in connection with a bona fide qualification of residence or of property.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): We always hear the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Whitmore) with pleasure, but I think we have never heard him with greater pleasure than to-day. It is refreshing, in such an atmosphere as that in which we have been groping about during the last two hours, to hear a downright, straightforward speech, going for the merits and demerits of the question. It is the sort of speech which we wish to answer, and it contains the sort of argument by which we desire to be met when going before the electors. I should be glad to learn that the Government had resolved to fight behind the standard of the hon. Member for Chelsea, rather than behind that of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). The speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone was, as ever, fiery and burning, and it was marked, too, by a most significant absence of argument. It is really hardly possible to answer that speech except in a few sentences, because its arguments were so scanty and so extremely trivial. The first of these arguments was the fact that at this period of the Session there is some difficulty in making a House. The only answer I will make to that argument is that more than once when the question of Household Suffrage in the counties was before the House, we, its advocates, had equal difficulty in making a House. Yet Household Suffrage in the counties is part of the law of the land, and we accept that omen. Then the hon. Member tried the argument of inconsistency. He said: "You Liberals now endeavour to take away the plural vote, whereas you did not show the same eagerness in 1884"; and therefore the hon. Member moves an Amendment to the effect that the representation of Ireland is to be diminished. I will answer that argument very shortly. In the year 1884 it is quite true that this question of plural voting was brought before the House of Commons, and that only forty-three Liberals voted in favour of dealing with it; but it is also equally true that in the course of the same Debate the question of reducing the representation of Ireland was brought forward, and that only twenty-five Conservatives were in favour of it. And so we will put the forty-three against the twenty-five, and I think that even the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the greatest master of the argument of tu quoque that ever sat on those Benches, will not be able to make anything out of it. The hon. Member complained that it would be unfair to pass this measure because, while diminishing the number of plural votes in England, Scotland, and Wales, the Unionists would remain handicapped by the excessive representation of Derry as compared with Antrim, Longford as compared with Londonderry, and in several other instances. It is not, however, necessary for me to meet the hon. Member's argument, because he went on to say that this was not in any sense a Party measure, that there were plural votes on both sides, and that he did not consider one side would be seriously more damaged than another. By that statement he cuts away from himself the power of laying any stress upon his argument that the plural vote in England neutralises the under-representation of Unionism in Ireland. He went on to say that the grievance was a small one, and that there were not more than two hundred thousand voters concerned. That point was insisted upon last year by two able speakers, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie); but care was taken to treat very gingerly such an Amendment as the one now proposed, because they must have known that it did not bear in any serious respect upon the great question of plural voting. The grievance is much more serious, however, than the hon. Member for South Tyrone represents; there are infinitely more than two hundred thousand plural voters. In the towns plural voting depends upon the occupation vote. A man has a villa in the suburbs as well as a shop or place of business in the town. We have a Return about these non-resident occupation voters, and I will give the House one or two extracts. In South Bristol there are 1,374 non-resident voters in one district, in Central Birmingham 1,973, in one division of Liverpool 1,636, in another 1,350, in one division of Manchester there are 4,400; in one division of London there are thirteen thousand, and in the City, not counting the livery voters, there are nineteen thousand. Over and above those mentioned in the Return, there are numbers in Scotland who have carefully taken out a non-resident occupation vote. In a single division of Glasgow I find there are 2,991, of whom 1,500 reside in Renfrewshire and 1,100 in the Partick Division of Lanarkshire. In addition, a great number of non-resident votes must be added in consequence of the culpable negligence which has characterised the making out of this Return. Places have been omitted, and they are precisely those places in which the greatest number of non-resident occupiers live. In London such divisions as the Strand, Westminster, and St. George's, Hanover Square, have been left out. I do not know how many thousands of non-occupiers there are in those divisions, but I am sure the number would come to a good many thousands. The Return also excludes Hull, Sheffield, Leeds, and Salford. Such is its worth. And now let me come to a much more serious question—that of the county voters. The counties are absolutely swamped by plural votes. The Return gives the number at one hundred and twenty-four thousand, but it is most deceptive. I will take a single county district—that of Fareham, in South Hants. The number of freeholders stated in the Return is 4,700, and of these 4,200 are said to reside in the Fareham Division; but they reside for the most part in Portsmouth and Southampton—that is to say, in towns which are technically included for the sake of enabling freeholders to vote, but which are not in the division for residential purposes. In the Lewes Division of Sussex there are three thousand ownership voters put down as residents, but they all live in Brighton, and are Brighton men. They are not in any sense resident voters except for the sake of this Return. I have not the slightest doubt that a genuine Return of the non-resident voters would embrace half the property voters of the country. There is a curious proof of this in a single passage in the Times newspaper. I see that the Return states there are only 280 non-resident voters in East Dorset, but on the occasion of the recent election in that division, the Times said there were upwards of six hundred out-voters, of whom eighty-five per cent. may be reckoned as Unionists. That means that instead of 280 out-voters there are at least six hundred. A few months before, at the election in North Bucks, the same newspaper announced that the election was in the hands of the out voters, 600 in number. So here you have two important elections, one of which went in one direction and one in another, which by the confession of those concerned in the election, depended not upon the vote of the real genuine residents, but on the vote of a number of people who came in for the sake of the election alone. What I should like to know is what on earth the Amendment has to do with the main question. I agree in one respect very much with the mover of the Amendment. I am all in favour of the principle of redistribution according to population, and there are certain people who are seriously injured by this redistribution not being according to population. But how does it help a man who is in the position of being out-voted if you put off this most important reform for the sake of another? Here is a man in, let us say, the Harrow Division of Middlesex; he has not his fair share of representation owing to Ireland being over-represented, but at the same time this man has still further diminished his fair share of representation, because some 3,000 individuals come from St. Pancras and Marylebone, and other parts of London—I forget for the moment what parts are told off to the Harrow

Division—and out-vote this man, and thus prevent him from having his fair share of representation. We wish to remove this grievance, but the hon. Member says “No, you shall not do it, because you will not reconsider the whole question of reform.” One great superiority of our plan over his is that our plan is quite complete. Our plan at any rate will redress this great grievance, and his plan is partial. It affects the relations between different parts of the kingdom, between the different nations; but it leaves equally grave abuses alone. It may be wrong that Wales should have twenty-seven seats when she ought to have thirty, or, taking in Monmouth, thirty when she ought to have thirty-four. But it is wrong likewise that within the confines of England eleven boroughs with a Member each should only have an electorate of 33,000, whilst Bristol, with 39,000, has only four Members; Bradford, with 35,000, has only three; and Newcastle, with 32,000, has only two. There you have a grievance greater than the over-representation of Wales, or even of Ireland; and yet the hon. Member comes forward with this Amendment, and proposes to cross a great and complete reform like this with a mere re-adjustment of representation between the countries, the nations, the provinces—whatever he prefers to call them—that constitute this Kingdom. Now I come to the speech of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Whitmore). He went straight to the root of the matter, and in the first place drew a distinction between the County Councils and Parliament. We are extremely pleased to have a most excellent precedent set us by the Government three or four years ago, when, following the lines of the just system of the municipalities in this country that a man may only vote in one ward in a municipal contest, they laid it down that a man could only vote for one division in a County Council election. But, says the hon. Member, that is a very different matter from politics. I see no difference whatever. The Gloucestershire County Council is the Council of Gloucester; the London County Council is the Council of London, and Parliament is the great Council of the nation. It is right that every man in Gloucestershire

should have one vote for Gloucestershire, and one vote only; to the London County Council the same principle should apply; and each man should have one vote and one vote only for the great Council of the nation, the Parliament. But the hon. Member says, "Oh, yes, very true; but a man may have property in Kent and property in Yorkshire, and when Kent questions and Yorkshire questions are being discussed in the House of Commons, he should be able to have a distinct voice and vote on each of those questions." But some counties are very large. Take the County of Northumberland, for instance. It is cut in two by a range of mountains, and the two parts of the county are entirely different in character. What earthly reason is there for giving a man a voice for Kent and a voice for Yorkshire in the great Council of the nation that there is not for giving a man who has property on the Tyne and property near Berwick-on-Tweed two votes in the County Council of Northumberland? The argument is exactly the same; the deduction should be exactly the same. Take the financial state of these counties. It is proposed to levy a penny rate in Gloucester and a penny rate in Kent, and a man who has property in Gloucester and resides in Kent is interested in both, and can give a vote at both County Council elections; but in Parliament every tax that is made affects the whole community alike, and whereas the rate of Gloucestershire is entirely distinct from the rate of Kent, the Income Tax is exactly the same all over the country. But the hon. Gentleman went to the root of the matter when he told us that this was a question of political equality, and it is for political equality that we are fighting. We are absolutely in favour of political equality. We know very well the difference between the Quixotic cry for equality in matters which cannot be attained—for equality in the matter of wealth, for equality in the matter of intellect, and in everything that fortune and birth can give, and the equality which you can attain and which you ought to enforce in every department of State, and that is equality under the law. Every man should have the same vote, every man should have exactly the same voice in electing a Member of Parliament. That is to say, he should be able to give one vote for one Member of Parliament, and that for a very good reason, because every man in every class presumably has the same interest in the deliberations of Parliament. It is entirely fallacious to imagine that a man's interest in what passes in this House can in any way be measured by his property. The poor depend upon this House, the working classes depend upon it in many respects to a degree that the rich do not depend at all. For whose benefit are most of our sanitation laws, all laws which prevent excessive labour, all the laws which soften the load of suffering and dependence, for whose sake are these laws passed? They are more for the sake of the poor than for the sake of the rich. If you go even to the questions of war or recruiting, the lot of the private soldier is more dependent on the deliberations of this House than that of the officer, and so is the lot of the private sailor, than that of the merchant captain or the captain in the Royal Navy. The poor man depends for his welfare on this House just as much as the rich, and I maintain that he has equal capacity for giving his vote rightly in the election of a Member of this House. Our view is that the most important thing is to get the greatest number of intelligent and independent votes; and since the advance of education in this country the votes of the working classes are, for the purpose for which votes are given, an intelligent expression of the needs and aspirations of those who give them. They are perfectly intelligent, and since the Ballot they are perfectly independent. (A laugh.) An hon. Member opposite laughs. If he thinks the Ballot does not make them independent, then why does he want to do away with the illiterate vote? But the working man has not the same franchise as those who are more fortunate. If you go to ecclesiastical matters you find amongst the congregations of the Nonconformists that the ministers have each one vote, whilst the clergy of the Established Church have, to a great extent, two votes. They vote for the place where they reside, and they vote for the University to which they belong. On a question which to the working classes is absolutely second to none, the liquor traffic, the question of the happiness of their own households, the elevation and sobriety of their own class, it must be remembered that while the working man seldom has more than one vote—and under the existing system of registration it is often difficult to get even that—there is no class which so revels in multiplied votes as that which is connected with the liquor traffic. But I have been reminded that this is not only a question which affects the rich, but that it also affects a great number of working men, who are fond of house property in which to invest their savings. There are such men, I am glad to think, but they will not be largely affected if this Bill is passed. The working man who owns his own house for the most part lives in it, and if he lives in it in a borough he votes for it in a borough, and he does not vote as a county voter. The working man very seldom owns a plural vote, and I will venture to say he never owns a faggot vote. And these out-voters in very many cases vote on sham qualifications, and with votes purchased outright, and without any shame. Look at the Livery votes in the City of London. Again, you often find cases where three or four men are quartered on one poorhouse, the rateable value of which is just enough to cover the three or four votes—a house the locality of which they do not know, the outside of which they would not recognise, and a house which enables them once in four or five years, as I think it ought to be, or once in six or seven years, as it is now, to vote down the opinions and wishes of the real residents. It is said that plural voting is a sort of test of civic virtue. It is no such thing. But there is one permanent test of civic virtue which I am glad to see is always in force, and that is the public opinion of the locality as to the character and intelligence of such and such a man. A man who has the confidence and respect of his neighbours will turn scores and hundreds of votes at a contested election: and that is as it ought to be. The only thing that the faggot vote and the plural vote is a test of is that a man is willing to strain to the utmost the provisions of a bad law, and is ready to spend his money and his leisure to get advantages which his more busy and poorer neighbours cannot obtain. I believe there is no Act of Parliament through which a clever agent could not drive a coach and four unless it is plain, simple, and short in its provisions like this. The only cure for faggot voting is to abolish plural voting, and that this Bill does in a short, simple, and plain manner, in a manner in which it has already been done by the Government in municipal elections and in every English-speaking country where plural voting has been put down. This is a question of establishing equality before the law with regard to the highest of all functions, the most valued of all rights; and if the Government wishes to convince the people at the General Election, which is now all but upon us, that our Bill is inexpedient and unjust, that our Bill is some very much better than this miserable ghost of an argument than which has been drawn red herring will draw across our path.

HUSFIELD (Hackney, N.): Sir, I differ somewhat from my hon. Friend who is prepared to (Mr. Whitmore). I admit extent the concede to the fullest equality, and to principle of political equality as far as in me maintain that principle as which the principles. The principle upon which is based is a position before the House is that perfectly intelligible one: equal voice every voter should have an equal country. in the government of the people from That I conceive to be a principle. It is which it is too late to go back the no use for us to try to put out what hands of the clock of time, but. Mem- we are objecting to is that honest that bers on the other side fail to equally in some cases it may be of the foolish to put the hands forward. clock of time too far for com- We object to a partial and in which plete application of the principle which I have stated. We object to way principle being applied in such a way as rather to make the representation at this country less accurate than it is at the present moment instead of making it more accurate. The principle is seen obvious and plain one, and has been admitted by many Members on our side, but we are accused, when we go to support the Amendment, of wanting to draw a red herring across the trail for one, wish to address myself to the main point at issue in this case, and I venture to think that is, shall we at the present moment make a partial application of the principle, or is it not rather the right thing to make a complete application of the principle in due course? Perhaps I may give a homely illustration which will make my position clear. When a carpenter has to smooth a rough piece of wood, he starts with a jack-plane; he then puts on the trying-plane, taking off a certain further roughness, and then finishes with the smoothing-plane, which clears away the final irregularities, and finishes the work. It appears to me that the Bill is an attempt to put on the smoothing-plane before the jack-plane. That is to say, that so long as there are the vast inequalities in the value of each vote which exist in the constituencies at present, it seems trivial to bring forward a matter of this kind. I venture to think, Sir, that the real motive of hon. Gentlemen opposite is to serve up one of those dainty dishes which are served up from time to time for consumption outside the House. There are great social and industrial questions being discussed by vast bodies of men outside this House which hon. Gentlemen in the House do not discuss, and in some cases refuse to discuss. It is sixty years since the first Reform Act was passed, and we have been constantly mending the Constitution since then, and I think the time has now come when we should put the machine to some practical work, instead of stopping from time to time to dangle these little bits of constitutional change before the electorate. The attitude of hon. Gentlemen opposite reminds me of that of a soldier sharpening his sword periodically at the grindstone instead of going out to test it on the enemy. For sixty years we have been sharpening the sword at the grindstone; I think we should now try to put the instrument we have to some use before we go further with the sharpening process. Hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to me to be straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. If I may invert the metaphor for the moment, I would say if they are prepared to swallow the camel I do not think after that process has been accomplished—doubtless with many wry faces—we shall be unprepared to bolt the gnat.

(3.57.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I am less concerned with the Bill than with the Amendment, which is directed against Ireland. I can understand the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Whitmore) moving the direct negative to the Bill, the principle of which is simple and clear. There are two logical positions which can be taken up with respect to the Bill; either that persons liable equally to the duties of citizenship should have equal electoral rights, or if property is to be regarded as the decisive test the right should be proportionate to it. If the vote is to attach to houses and lands it should equally attach to ships, Consols, or mines. I take the position that men are equal and should have equal electoral rights; or else, if property is the qualification, the right should be proportionate to the property, and that is a position which the most enterprising plutocrat would scarcely care to defend. I will now turn to the Amendment, which is directed against Ireland, and I say so, because the hon. Member who moved it confessed without reserve that its effect if carried would be that England would gain twenty-three Members by taking three Members from Wales and twenty from Ireland. The Amendment is moved by an Irish Member, but not by an Irishman. I doubt if any Irishman would have moved it. No Irishman has spoken in support of it, and I shall be curious to hear from any Irishman who supports it he how reconciles the reduction by one-fifth of the representation of our country with the interests of Ireland. The hon. Member enjoys the political hospitality of Ireland; he was a stranger, and we took him in. But, Sir, not only among civilised, but even among savage, races the receipt of hospitality is supposed to entail some obligations. The marauding Bedouin of the Desert makes it a point of honour not to meddle with the possessions of those with whom he has broken bread or eaten salt. The hon. Member has enjoyed the political hospitality of Ireland, and the way he proposes to show his gratitude is to run away with as much of the political property of Ireland as he can. The guest who behaves in such a manner towards his entertainers would do well to consider the reception which he is likely to have on his return to Ireland. The hon. Member is a member of the Unionist Party, and this is one of the numerous actions by which we are driven to conclude that the policy of the Unionist Party is Separatist at the core. Is this in any practical sense of the term a United Kingdom? If it be, what is the meaning of the argument that as between different parts of the United Kingdom representation ought to be strictly proportionate to population? The speech of the hon. Member is one which I could understand if this were a Federal Assembly and Ireland a separate State. Then you would, no doubt, be entitled to consider the strict representation of Ireland in proportion to her population. But I submit, when you raise here the strict argument of the representation of Ireland, without regard to special circumstances or interests in proportion to population, you raise a question which is Separatist in fact, and not Unionist. The Amendment of the hon. Member may very soon lose practical interest, but we are bound to consider it at the moment. The hon. Member who moved it is a Member of the Party the head of which at the present moment is engaged in fomenting a conspiracy of violence against the constitutional determination of the constitutional claim of Ireland, which we expect to get settled this year by the population of the country and ratified by Parliament and the Crown. And this is the moment selected by the Prime Minister's henchman to propose that the representation of Ireland in this House, which is to be used in making that claim, should be curtailed. If leaders of parties are to excite the population against a constitutional settlement, such a moment is not a fitting one for reducing the constitutional force Ireland may bring to bear on the settlement of the question. The gravamen of the charge of the hon. Member against the towns of Ireland is that only one returned a Liberal Unionist Member. I noticed that the hon. Member cited only those counties where the Unionist Party appeared to be prejudiced, but there are counties where the Nationalists are equally prejudiced. At any rate his reference to the internal anomalies which exist and must exist not only in Ireland, but in the United Kingdom, is entirely irrelevant to the Motion so far as it is directed against Ireland, because he did not attempt to make any reply to the crushing argument of the Mover of the Bill, who showed that in eighteen counties in England, which have the same population as Ireland, the representation is the same as that of Ireland, and therefore there are as striking anomalies in England as in Ireland. I do not think that in any other Legislature in the world, which has to deal with different races, different communities, and different countries, there could be found a man to do what the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has done to-day—to deliberately propose that the representation of the country by which he has been elected should be reduced. He founded his argument on population. You ought to be ashamed to mention it, and to pray to be relieved from any mention of it. The decrease of the population of Ireland under your rule is the most disgraceful and damning fact in your political history. But so long as the argument of population was on our side you said nothing about it; why do you turn to it when it is in your favour, though that may not be for long? When you passed the Act of Union Ireland had a population of five millions and England ten millions, though, if the argument of the hon. Member for South Tyrone is valid, we were entitled to 219 Members in this House. How many did we receive? We received one hundred. It is strange how indifferent you could be to arguments founded on population then. There was another settlement of the representation thirty-two years later, when on the same principle we were entitled to 243 Members; then we received 105. It is only within the last ten years that the argument of population has served your purpose. And how are you entitled to endeavour to come to a decisive conclusion on what may prove to be the transient circumstances of the present moment? It was only within the last ten years that you began to pass reform laws for Ireland. You reformed the land system in Ireland. You have established there a land purchase scheme, the ultimate effect of which will be to make every farmer the owner of his holding, and the result of that will be a manifest and overpowering tendency to increase the population. I submit to you that if ten years ago you could derive no strength from this argument of population, ten years hence the argument of population may be used by the Irish Members in this House to prove beyond the possibility of a doubt that Ireland, instead of diminishing, is entitled to increase the number of her Members. Why has the population of Ireland decreased? It has decreased in consequence of your deliberate policy; and I say you cannot solve a question of this kind by the pure tests of arithmetic. You must remember the lessons of history; and you cannot shut your eyes or harden your hearts against moral duties. The population of Ireland fell because she lost her Parliament; the population of Ireland fell because you insisted upon ruling her from this House. Your repeal of the Corn Laws limited the means of living in Ireland, and drove the population away; your land system, which enabled the landlords to evict their tenants, drove the people from the shores of Ireland; your coercion has made Ireland a hateful place, even to people who love their land so much; and I say you are not entitled, having taken away the Parliament under which she thrived, and under which her population increased, to use your own wrong-doing, to avail yourselves of your usual policy, to make that condition of Ireland, which you have deliberately produced, a reason for robbing her of the means of protection in this House. I say Ireland is a distinct country; a country with separate interests. It is not merely a question of population. Does anyone say that Ireland would be fitly represented here if she had only the same representation in proportion to population as the City of London? ("Yes.") I should have thought that that would not commend itself to anyone who was disposed to give an impartial or intelligent consideration to the subject. The Members for London live at your very door. They are in constant and daily attendance in this House—as a matter of routine. The Members for Ireland, in order to discharge their duties here, have to travel five hundred miles over land and sea. Their attendance here is different. I submit that Ireland, on account of her remoteness, is entitled to special representation; and I also say because of her separate religious creed and separate economic condition, and because of the fact that you are constantly obliged to pass special legislation for her, she is entitled to particular consideration as regards the number of her Members. From your point of view, she constantly needs coercion; from our point of view she constantly needs reform; so that Ireland constantly needs special legislation in this House. I submit that the fall in the population of Ireland is due to your evil policy, that in the future there may probably be an increase of population, and that in the moment of transition between the bad old system and the new system, which we hope to be better, you are not entitled to take advantage of the number of her population at the present moment in order to reduce the representation of Ireland. No; the true mode of dealing with Ireland, a mode dictated by political motives and a mode which is obviously just, is, not to take advantage of your own wrong-doing in the past, but to avail yourselves of a means by which you can get relief from all trouble with regard to that country, and that is, to restore to her the legislative power which your strength took away from her weakness by brute force and by shameful crime.

(4.15.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I had not the slightest intention to intervene in this Debate a few minutes ago, but when the hon. Member for West Belfast, who has just sat down, gave such a direct challenge to Irish Members to get up and support the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, I could not refuse to accept the challenge. The hon. Member for West Belfast has used the most extraordinary arguments in regard to the Motion before the House. He said the Leader of our Party is fomenting resistance to the law in Ireland. I have the utmost respect for the opinion of the Marquess of Salisbury; but does the hon. Gentleman believe that any remarks of Lord Salisbury on the question would have the slightest effect either in inciting Ulstermen to action or in deterring them from taking what action they think fit? If he does think so, I must assure him that his connection with West Belfast, which has lasted for five years now, but which, I daresay, will not be very much longer prolonged, has not sufficiently educated him as to what Ulstermen are capable of and determined to do. He has used the very curious argument as to this being an inopportune moment to raise this question while that incitement was going on, and to propose to reduce the constitutional representation of that part of Her Majesty's dominion. Well, it appears to me that one of the very strongest arguments that could be used to justify the conduct of hon. Members is that, because that part of the United Kingdom has too great a preponderance in the constitutional representation of the country, those who object might take some other means for modifying it.

MR. SEXTON: What other means?

COLONEL WARING: If the hon. Member for West Belfast will consult Hansard he will find that when called upon to speak after the very magnificent speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition in proposing his Home Rule Bill in 1886, I then designated what means I considered they would be justified themselves in taking, and, if that legislation was passed, what means I thought would be necessary to protect the rights of Ulster. When that time arrives, I will state what those means should be. The hon. Member has said that that representation in this House should be maintained because it was always required by hon. Members opposite to carry out reform measures and was always required by us to carry out coercion measures. No coercion measures whatever would ever be necessary for Ireland, except for the coercion of the hon. Member and his friends. Coercion has only been applied by this House to meet coercion, on the homœopathic principle; and I am glad to say that the homœopathic principle has proved to be thoroughly effective. Why should the hon. Gentleman object to population being taken as the guide for representation? It appears to me that that is a good Radical theory and a good Radical solution of the question which has so long been agitating this country. I confess if the franchise question is raised, I can see no satisfactory solution except by equal representation for every part of the United Kingdom, whether it be in Ulster, Leinster, Munster, Yorkshire, or the Metropolis. The reason why the hon. Member for West Belfast objects to the amendment is, not so much because it would reduce the representation of Ireland as that it would reduce the proportion represented by the party of which he is so distinguished a Member. ("No!") Yes; why should he object to that? The average number of the constituents represented by Unionists in counties in Ireland is 9,056; the average number of the constituents represented by Nationalists in counties in Ireland is 7,178. In boroughs the average number represented by Unionists is 8,779; and the average number represented by Nationalists is 4,413; the average represented by Unionists on the whole of Ireland being 9,004, and the average represented by Nationalists being 6,755. I have no intention of occupying the time of the House. I should not have spoken at all if I had not been directly challenged as an Irish Member to speak on this question affecting Ireland, and I am very glad indeed that I came into the House in time to reply to the challenge.

*(4.18.) MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I must say I think it is a very extraordinary view of the Irish franchise which has been taken by the hon. Member for West Belfast. He has spoken as if it were the absolute possession of the Nationalists; and from what he has said as regards my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone, one would think he had gone to Ireland for a visit and stolen the spoons. I can understand the franchise sixty years ago being considered the possession of a man who had the nomination of a borough in his power, but it seems to me that that notion is wholly and completely opposed to our modern democratic ideas of the franchise. The hon. Member has said that, to seek to equalise the proportion of Members for Ireland to that of this country, is treating Ireland unfairly. It is doing nothing of the kind; it is treating Ireland as an integral part, as it is, of this country. It may be worked out thus—ten thousand men in Ireland should have the same right of representation as ten thousand men in England or Scotland. I do not feel it my business to defend the Leader of my Party, or of any other Party, for what he has been saying in regard to Ulster and its proposed action. This I can only say, that it has not been a matter of endeavour to incite, but only of pointing out what is the probable state of facts to which a certain policy which is before the country is likely to lead, and putting that state of facts before the consideration of the constituencies in this country and elsewhere. You cannot create a rebellion by speaking from the outside. Mr. Burke said long ago, dealing with the American question—"Rebellions are never encouraged; they are provoked." It is not the words of any man on this side of the water that could by any possibility create rebellion in Ireland. It would be the action of the Parliament established in Ireland—that would be the only possible cause of creating such a rebellion. Then the hon. Member spoke of the Irish counties, and said the cases that had been taken were individual particular cases which happened to stand in favour of the Unionists and against the Nationalists. But there is no need to take individual cases, because, according to the figures given by my hon. Friend, and those which were given by the other side, the average in the number of electors all round in each of the Unionist constituencies is startlingly larger than in the Nationalist ones.

MR. SEXTON: The population?

*MR. PARKER SMITH: The population and the electorate come exactly to the same thing. I assert, until the contrary is proved by some hon. Gentleman, that it comes exactly to the same thing whether you go on the footing of population or electorate. It is more convenient to take the electorate, these being the figures given in the last Return. Then the hon. Gentleman spoke of the decrease of the population in Ireland, and he argued that that was the consequence of the Act of Union, as I understand, in the first place, and of the bad government of this country in the second. But from the time of the Union onwards the population of Ireland increased, as it had never increased before. Between the passing of the Act of Union and the famine it had just more than doubled. At the time of the passing of the Act of Union the population of Ireland was four millions; and at the time of the famine it was eight and a half millions. It is perfectly true that at the time of the Union the number of Members that were given to Ireland did not correspond with the numerical proportion of the inhabitants of Ireland to the inhabitants of this country; but at that time the numerical argument had been in no way accepted. What was sought then was not symmetry or numerical equality, but that each country should have a fair share of representation. It was on that footing that we went, not only at the time of the Union, but in 1832, in distributing Members through the country. I cannot, therefore, see that the fact that, according to this modern principle, Ireland did not get full justice in the past is any reason at all that in the future Ireland should get a great deal more than justice. It may be perfectly true that it is only within the last few years that this argument has told against Ireland; but it tells against Ireland now, and if this question is forced upon us now—and it is not with the desire of the hon. Gentleman who has proposed the Amendment, or the other Members who will vote for it, that it should be—Ireland must take its chance. The hon. Member used an argument which was used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian in 1885, and which, of course, has considerable force—that Members representing the extremities of the country ought to be greater in numbers than the Members representing the centre. No doubt there is something in this, but it seems to me to be over-ridden by the larger general principle of equality in our electoral distribution. And you have to remember this: that the power of gentlemen sympathising with the hon. Member for West Belfast is not by any means limited to the number of Members who are returned for Ireland. There is an Irish vote in constituencies on this side of the water, and I think that Irishmen can feel that they have a very large share of influence in the conduct of a great many Members who sit on these Benches, though they may not happen to be returned for Irish constituencies. But to turn to another subject. We had a very eloquent and a very large speech from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan). The arguments were in favour of Universal Suffrage—not for Manhood Suffrage only, but for Womanhood Suffrage also—equal electoral districts, and the residential vote—a complete change in our system, and then, after the mountain has laboured in this way, we have a mouse brought forward in the shape of this Bill for abolishing plural voting. In the course of his speech, while he was bringing forward these arguments, he was objecting to the Amendment of my hon. Friend as not being relevant. It seems to me he stated, in the clearest words as the fundamental basis of his argument, that it is right that a man should have one vote, and one vote only, for the great Council of the nation, and it is surely part of that that these votes should be of equal value. It is quite illusory, if you attempt to give every man a single vote, and in one case he is to have the two-thousandth share in returning a Member of Parliament, while in another case he is only to have the sixteen-thousandth or the eighteen-thousandth share. The one man gets eight times as much as the other does in such a case. The right hon. Gentleman deprecated the larger discussion, and said that this scheme which he was proposing was complete. Out of his own mouth and out of his own speech you can see that it is fundamentally incomplete. I do not mean only because it does not touch these larger questions which were the groundwork of his whole argument, but for this reason. His great attack, through half his speech at least, was upon the non-resident vote. He was arguing that no man was entitled to have a vote unless he resided in the constituency, and this Bill does not touch that question at all. It leaves the non-resident voter in just the same position as at present. It leaves just exactly the same possibility of flooding a constituency—of jerrymandering and of concentrating votes upon a particular constituency—that exists at present. In order to carry out what the right hon. Gentleman desires, you must insist upon a simple residential franchise, which is something totally different to this. Another great point that the right hon. Gentleman made was that you must abolish the freehold franchise in boroughs; that you must put things on the same footing as in Scotland, where a freehold in a burgh does not give a vote in the county. These are two essential parts of the right hon. Gentleman's argument, but they are not in any way touched by the Bill before the House. He criticised the Return giving the number of non-resident votes on account of culpable negligence. That Return does seem to me rather careless, but there are great many points that you have to consider on the other side. For example, in the case of Plymouth the number of occupation voters who are resident is given as 854, and the number of occupation voters who are not resident is given as 9,690. That seems to me a rather startling statement, and probably means a mistake of something like ten thousand votes in favour of the right hon. Gentleman, and which, I think, will go far to cancel a good many of the smaller errors and discrepancies which he found in the matter. Then, to give another instance of the smallness of the question, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford quoted the case of Lancashire, and gave some figures as to the amount of plural voting in Lancashire. In the County Divisions of Lancashire of which he was speaking the number of county votes on the register is a quarter of a million, and the whole number of non-resident voters is 3,344. That is to say, the whole question means just about one-and-a-third per cent. of the whole electorate. The right hon. Gentleman and several Members have said this question is not political. I should like to know very much why hon. Gentlemen are so ardent in the matter if it is not political. For myself, I believe it cuts to a great extent both ways, but I cannot imagine any reason for right hon. Gentlemen pitching upon this particular small point among a whole set of anomalies with which our franchise is beset, unless they consider that it is of some definite political importance to themselves. We have not always found them so ardent in correcting anomalies. We had the other day the question of the illiterate vote. When the question came up we did not find these Gentlemen coming forward and making the case which was so convincingly made from the other side of the House against that anomaly. They did, it is true, not come to defend that anomaly, but were content to leave that Bench empty for the occupation of an hon. Gentleman who usually sits on the opposite Bench. Another point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, as explaining why action was not earlier taken in the matter, was that it was not important in the past. The matter was infinitely more important in the past, in the days when the franchise was more restricted than it is at present, for an obvious reason. The matter was in the minds of everyone on account of the abuses that had taken place in Scotland in this respect in the old unreformed days. Before 1832 the number of voters in Scotland in the counties was most absurdly small. The qualifications were purely nominal. They were absolutely faggot votes for the most part. Writers and advocates from Edinburgh poured down on the counties, and formed a majority which carried the elections and prevented the expression of the true opinion of the people. Before 1832 the opinion of the people of Scotland was not heard at all, on account of the abuse of the plural vote; but reformers have put an end to this state of things, not by cutting off the plural vote, but by preventing faggot votes, and by increasing the number of voters, so as to make plural voting comparatively unimportant. The question has been argued mainly as between England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales, and, of course, it may be said, in reply to that, that the treatment is partial. So it is, but that argument does not seem to me to come with any good grace from hon. Gentlemen who are supporting a Bill that touches so small a part of the fringe of the whole subject. We are prepared to fully accept the principle of equalisation, but the question must be dealt with as a whole. We cannot agree to the suggestion of hon. Gentlemen to only touch a particular anomaly which may be against their interests as a Party, such as plural voting and University representation. These are anomalies in our present system, survivals of a former state of things, when what was sought was not universal equality, but the proper representation of the nation. The ideal of Burke was to make the House of Commons the true and express image of the nation, and there are two entirely distinct ways in which you can do that—either by giving a vote to every man in the nation, or by taking samples and giving only these the vote. The latter was the principle of the old system of representation, but it is gone now, and we do not seek in any way to maintain it. We accept the full principle of democracy, of equality in the country of the power given to every voter; and what we insist upon is that this principle shall be carried through consistently, that it shall not stop short by touching merely one point, and thus we shall produce a Parliament that is the true representation and the express image of the nation.

*(4.45.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I should not have intervened in this Debate but for the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. The main question has been thoroughly thrashed out, and upon it I will only say that the way in which we deal with it depends very much upon whether it is thought that a vote should represent property or manhood. We think that it is very much more important that manhood should be represented than property. From my point of view, the wealthy man requires a vote less than the poor man, the educated man less than the uneducated, for the wealthy and the educated have opportunities of expressing their views and of exercising their influence which the poor and uneducated have not. Therefore perfect fairness, in my opinion, would require that the poor should have more votes than the rich. Then we have the objection that this reform should not be given unless some other reform is added to it. That is always the argument of those who do not desire reform, and who have not the manliness to say so. I know people in Ireland who on the same principle say, "We do not like Home Rule, but we are quite prepared for separation." The hon. Member for Tyrone dwelt very much upon the numbers of voters in Ireland, but I contend that representation should be based upon population rather than upon the number of voters, for the latter varies from time to time, and if representation be based upon that we shall always be altering the Divisions of the country. Now, if we take the counties of Ireland and include the towns in their respective counties, I find that Ulster is not so badly off after all. The county which is worst off is Dublin, with one Representative to every 70,000 of the population. Wexford is also badly off, having one Member to 56,000; Clare has one to every 62,000; whereas Antrim, Down, and Belfast together have a Representative for every 55,000 of the population. As to the proportion of the representation for England and Ireland, I wish to join my voice with that of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) in his surmise that in no other country in the world could we find, as we have found here to-day, Representatives who would desire that her strength should be diminished and her representation decreased; and if anything would impel me to desire reform for Ireland it is the knowledge that such a feeling exists in the heart of any of her Representatives. I think that the House should remember that Catholic Ireland during the early part of this century was altogether under-represented, and that if there has been depopulation it has been from misgovernment as well as from natural causes. I would like to point out that during the early part of the century Ireland was under-represented, and it is extraordinary that a change, should now be desired that has not been asked for before.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The hon. Gentleman and others have spoken as if those who supported the Amendment desired some change. Now, I have distinctly stated that I was content to go on with the machine as it is; but if there is to be a change it should be a perfect and a thorough change.

*MR. WEBB: I leave it to the House to decide between us. I say that we are at present under a disadvantage with regard to the representation of Ireland, and that it would be very unfair indeed to reduce it. If anything we should have a larger proportion of representation than we now have.

*(4.52.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I must say that I think the attack made upon my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone is uncalled for. I have several times heard, in the course of this Debate, that the desire of those who support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman is to diminish the representation of Ireland. I quite understood my hon. Friend in the direction in which he has corrected the hon. Member who has just sat down—namely, that he does not at present propose to reduce the representation of the people of Ireland, but that he says, if a fresh distribution of electoral power is to take place, that change would naturally form a portion of any general scheme of the kind. I have been at a loss to understand the difficulty which some hon. Members opposite feel as to the relevance of the Amendment to the question of the Second Reading of the Bill. One Member after another has practically said that he saw no connection between the two; yet, nevertheless, in their speeches they continue to use the phrase “equal electoral voice.” I cannot see how we can have an equal electoral voice unless we have one vote one value, as well as “One Man One Vote.” We do not raise the question that there should be “One Man One Value,” or that there should be “One Man One Vote,” but we say we are not prepared to accept the one without consideration of the other. There is a clear connection between the two. On what ground does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford propose this Bill? On the ground of the removal of electoral anomalies. We say that if you are going to enter again upon an examination of the machinery of legislation, instead of the question as to how the existing machine is to be used, we must have a thorough examination of the machinery and see whether, in other respects, anomalies require to be corrected beside the particular anomalies to which the right hon. Gentleman has called attention. The right hon.

Mr. Webb

Gentleman does not do what he professes to do. His whole point is that every man should have an equal voice in the election of a Member of Parliament. I would point out that he will leave anomalies even by the Bill he has himself proposed. This Bill says that no person is to vote in one year in more than one constituency, and then the right hon. Gentleman thinks he is applying a complete cure. The House will see that the anomaly will remain that at bye-elections everyone will be entitled to vote according to his different qualifications. A person with several qualifications—one, say, for Cambridge University, one for the City of London, one for the county, and one for some other borough, may, if an election takes place at Cambridge one year, an election in the City the next year, and so on, vote in each case, retaining the same political power as he has now, after the introduction of this Bill. Is it not an increase of political power to give a person the liberty of selecting the borough for which he shall vote? It is said that we are to check jerry-mandering by this Bill, but I submit that jerry-mandering will receive a stimulus under it. An examination will be made where plural votes will be most effective, and in many cases elaborate electoral precautions will be taken to keep the votes of plural voters not where they reside, but where they happen to be most wanted for political purposes. It therefore seems to me that the Bill does not settle the question in the direction even in which the right hon. Gentleman desires to settle it, for if we pass it we should have precisely the same difficulties again; but it simply involves a tinkering with the Constitution in order to remove a particular anomaly. The right hon. Gentleman does not touch the freehold franchise. He endeavours to deprive the freeholders of the power of voting, but he does not strike directly at any franchise. He seeks to undermine them by an indirect process: but his clients will not be content with this—they will attempt to carry the matter further. They will say, "We have not yet got what you told us we were to have—namely, one man one vote." The spirit of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill seems to me to show that he thinks infinitely more of the individual than of the community. What is the meaning of the Amendment in its broadest form? It is that, if anomalies are to be corrected, communities would have equal power. We are departing from the old spirit of the Constitution when we look simply to the individual and not to the community. "One Man One Vote" must mean manhood suffrage; but it should not be put simply on these little anomalies. It would be more honest to tell us that this is a step towards manhood suffrage, and that every man should have an equal vote—not simply that we should abolish this particular form of plural vote. This is really an instalment of manhood suffrage, but we are not called upon to decide that question at the present time. The cheers with which the mention of manhood suffrage was received show that we are wanted to shift the basis of our Constitution from the community, and to rest it upon the representation of the individual alone. Then surely we must come to equal electoral districts, and equality of electoral districts implies equal power to every individual.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): To every male individual.

*MR. GOSCHEN: My right hon. Friend says "every male individual." That is a point I will not now discuss. The Party opposite hold to equal power for every individual. Manhood suffrage leads clearly to this result, which must apply to Irish Members. Did I hear a cheer from an Irish Member as to that statement?

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): The right hon. Gentleman must refer to me; but I will only say that I have been listening to him with attention, and that I did not open my lips.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Am I to understand that the hon. Member approves of my statement?

MR. MAC NEILL: The right hon. Gentleman must not catechise me.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have not the audacity to catechise the hon. Member, but I venture to say that there must be a redistribution of the Irish representation if the "One Man One Vote" principle is adopted. Therefore, let us all be perfectly frank. The democratic idea of equal electoral power means disfranchisement in Ireland. The hon. Member for West Belfast has said that while he thought this was a most inconvenient time for raising the question, it might have less importance in the future. I wondered what that meant. Does it mean that if Home Rule is passed, this subject will have less importance to Irish Members, because they will not sit in subsequent Parliaments; or, if they do sit here, that it will be with a largely reduced representation? If there is any point in his remarks, one of these two alternatives must be present in his mind. Now, before I sit down I should like to say a few words about the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford as it stands, quite irrespective of the Amendment. I am opposed to the Bill because it ignores the representation of the community and deals simply with the individual. The whole attention of hon. Members opposite is always centred upon this question—has a particular man an equal right with another particular man? But is a particular man not to vote in a particular community because he happens to be interested in another community? In this way a prominent political personage might be deprived of his right to vote in a particular community, because his vote might be wanted for political purposes in another part of the country. I say that does not commend itself to my judgment. Hon. Members opposite must not make this a question as between the rich and the poor—an issue they generally attempt to raise when it is most convenient to them to do so. I contend that an individual should not be deprived of the right to vote in a particular community. Then, again, I would point out to the House that this would mean the disfranchisement of the Universities. I am anxious to put the dots on the i's, and to show what it is that we are asked to vote for. It amounts to this—that the representation of the Universities could not survive if this Bill were passed, and that would mean the disfranchisement of a large number of people. You do not think the number is large; but whether it be large or small, it is clear that University representation must go with such a Bill as this. Well, then, I shall vote against the Bill on the ground that it indirectly disfranchises those institutions, whose representation I think valuable to the country. But does not this question open up matters broader than the particular one before us? If we have to deal with the redistribution of seats we shall also have to deal with the broader question before us—the question of general representation. Many instances have been put before the House of grievances in order to show how a particular man—or rather, I should say, how the feelings of particular men—were injured. One hon. Member explained not long ago that you do not get an equal value under the present system; but you say one man is to have one-three-thousandth part, while another is only to have one-ten-thousandth part in the power of election according to the constituency he belongs to. The case of Wandsworth was, I think, quoted, where there is only one Member for the Division, while three Members represent English boroughs whose total electorate is not equal to that of Wandsworth. In Ireland there are six borough Members who together represent a number equal only to that of Wandsworth. That does not at all strike hon. Members opposite as an anomaly, or, if it is an anomaly, they do not propose to correct it. As regards the constitutional qualification for the vote, I do not think that ought to be disturbed in the manner which is suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. He quoted some passages from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) against the dual vote, and he thought the same applied to the plural vote; but the dual vote was to be given on the ground of wealth, on the ground of superior property, and you were to allow one man in one constituency to have a larger political power than another man in the same constituency. I venture to think that is a totally different matter to this—that a man should only be allowed to vote in one constituency, although he may have votes in other parts of the country. I oppose, and the Government oppose, the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman on its merits. I have shown how incomplete, how unfair, is a measure which does not redress other anomalies while redressing one particular anomaly which may interest hon. Members opposite. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) spoke with reference to the diminished population of Ireland, and he asked why we had not proposed to increase the representation of Ireland in proportion to population at an earlier date of her political history. It has already been pointed out by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean) that Lord Castlereagh did not take the test of the population only, but took the test of population and of wealth. I do not think hon. Members would desire—no one would desire—that such a test should now be offered to Ireland. They are far better off with only the test of population than with the test of population and property together.

MR. SEXTON: That was not the test of the Union. If property had been the test of the Union, we should have had 170 Members.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member did not hear the historical part of the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham. The hon. Gentleman said that by population Ireland would have had 200 Members.

MR. SEXTON: By population I think 219.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member is mistaken upon that point. The test was taken at that time when wealth did enter into the consideration, and I think hon. Members from Ireland are better off with population only than under the old system of the Union. Then the hon. Gentleman held this country responsible for the diminution of population. I will frankly admit that this country has, in its dealings with Ireland in the past, not always acted with justice or with magnanimity. I make that confession freely. But to hold that this country is responsible for the diminution of the population of Ireland, as suggested by the hon. Member, is contrary to historical fact, and, more than that, the onus probandi will be entirely upon the hon. Gentleman. Are there not many parts of the agricultural portions of Great Britain where the population has fallen, since the Union, almost in the same proportion as in Ireland? Economic causes have been at work in the agricultural parts of England as they have been at work in the agricultural parts of Ireland; and it is really distorting history to say this country is responsible for the diminution. The hon. Gentleman says, "Let us hold our hand now, because the population in Ireland, after the reforms and beneficial legislation of the last ten years, may again establish the old proportions." I trust the population of Ireland will so increase, and I accept the compliment which the hon. Gentleman has paid to the legislation of the last seven years, which proves that this Parliament has been able to pass measures by which, on his own showing, we may expect the population of Ireland once more to prosper and increase. But even if the sanguine dream of the hon. Gentleman and his friends were realised, and our beneficent legislation were crowned, as they would call it, by the grant of Home Rule to Ireland, they cannot think that the growth of population in Ireland would exceed that constant growth of population in England, Scotland, and Wales, which has characterised the last half of this century. I do not think the hon. Gentleman can argue to this House that on account of the probability of growth of population in Ireland we should, therefore, hold our hand. Before I sit down I should like to tell hon. Members from Ireland that I do not consider this Amendment to be directed against Ireland, or against Wales, or against any portion of the United Kingdom. We do not raise the point from these Benches, but the demand has come that there is to be equal electoral power distributed under a new system, and in new proportions, and that demand comes from hon. Members opposite. As it has been raised, we say that the consideration ought to apply to all parts of the United Kingdom. If you pass "One Man One Vote," you must have a general Redistribution Bill for the whole of the United Kingdom. You cannot deal generally with all these questions at the present time. I hope I have conclusively proved this—that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman necessitates a redistribution of seats. Are we to have a redistribution of seats? Is it part of the Newcastle Programme that there is to be a redistribution of seats as well as the introduction of the principle of "One Man One Vote"? If so, we have not heard of it. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman would seem to be to attempt to pass this one measure and then to leave the necessary redistribution probably to a subsequent Parliament, and meanwhile all these anomalies which exist at present would be intensified and increased by the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. By the Bill great bodies of men would be disfranchised; it would be an act of injustice not alone to individuals, but also to the community, and it would establish a principle from which I hope we are still somewhat removed—namely, that it is not to the general interest of the community, but simply to the individual claimants of the vote, that we ought to look when we consider the reconstitution of the general institutions of the country.

(5.25.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): The five minutes which the right hon. Gentleman has left me are sufficient for me to say all I have to say in reply. I have sat in the House a good many years, and more often than not on the same side as the right hon. Gentleman, and year after year I have heard him make the same speech against every proposal for electoral reform. He is always full of terrors, full of alarmism; always has it been with him a measure which must ultimately end in manhood suffrage; always has it been the disfranchisement of the Universities or some other bogey filling the mind of the right hon. Gentleman which for years has induced him to be the sturdy opponent of household suffrage. It is remarkable that against this proposal for the remedy of a great electoral injustice, the main spokesmen should be the right hon. Gentleman, the enemy of all electoral reform, and the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), the enemy of electoral rights in Ireland. I shall not be prevented by fear of manhood suffrage or fear of what may happen to the Universities from giving a cordial vote in favour of this Bill. There has been an endeavour to mix up with this other questions with which it has nothing whatever to do. I know that, in your opinion, the Irish question has to do with everything. It is that question which poisons every demand for justice to every other part of the United Kingdom. Hon. Gentlemen opposite can regard no other question, except in the light of how it will affect that policy towards Ireland of which the hon. Member for South Tyrone is the principal spokesman. I think it is quite enough that the opposition to this proposal should be led by the right hon. Gentleman on that side and the hon. Member for South Tyrone on this side of the House. Through all the subtleties of the right hon. Gentleman the people of this country will see very clearly. Members for county constituencies know perfectly well, and their constituents know, what is the effect of bringing in a number of outsiders. They will not be deceived by such speeches as that we have just heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and will not be induced to abstain from doing an act of justice to the people of England unless it is accompanied by an act of gross injustice to the people of Ireland.

Mr. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid) rose to speak.

(5.29.) Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Words added.

Resolved, That it would not be just or expedient to carry out the principle of "One Man One Vote" embodied in this Bill, unless the number of representatives allotted to England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland respectively were previously settled in proportion to the population of each of those parts of the United Kingdom, and the principle of equality in voting thus secured.

It being Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Thursday, 19th May, 1892.*PUBLIC AUTHORITIES PROTECTION BILL [H.L.]

Clause 1.

THE EARL OF DUDLEY: My Lords, it has already been pointed out to your Lordships by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, on the occasion of the Second Reading of the Bill now before this House, that this measure by no means aims at altering or reforming the existing law, but is simply put forward to consolidate and to simplify numerous provisions in previous Acts of Parliament. It seems to me that Sub-section (b) of Clause 1 of this Bill would considerably affect the law as to venue of action as it at present stands; for instance, in cases affecting the Inland Revenue Department and the Treasury considerable inconvenience might be caused to their staff of officers in London, by creating difficulty through having actions, which might be brought against those Departments in different parts of the country, tried, as heretofore, in the Queen's Bench. It was therefore for this reason suggested that Sub-section (b) should be left out of the Bill. On further consideration, however, it seems that this Amendment is perhaps of too sweeping a character, and as, after communication with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, I understand that he intends at the next stage of this Bill to introduce words, which will be so framed as to effect the object to which I have referred, without unnecessarily disturbing existing arrangements, I now beg leave to withdraw the Amendment which stands on the Notice Paper in my name.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think I must explain to the noble Earl that the nature of the Amendment which I have proposed is certainly not of the sweeping character of that which he has given notice of. It is quite true that I received from the Inland Revenue Department an intimation that they were rather desirous of standing outside the Bill altogether. To that I was certainly not prepared to agree; but I am not at all certain that the local venues which I had proposed to consolidate are not to some extent an anachronism. The existence of local venues generally has been very seriously invaded by the Judicature Acts and the Rules made under them. The plaintiff, until those Rules were made, had the right to put his action where he pleased. But under the operation of the Judicature Acts that is subject to the right of the Judge to alter the venue on good ground shown. The only thing I think that the Inland Revenue Department are desirous of obtaining would be obtained by making the clause stand subject to the Rules of Court. I believe that if on sufficient ground the Inland Revenue Department can make out a necessity for their being placed on any other footing, a Rule could be made to that effect. I should hesitate to alter the general law in the direction that the noble Earl seems to suggest; it would seem to be an unreasonable thing to alter the practice as it is, without any alteration of the law, leaving the plaintiff to do what he likes in that respect. The defendant never under our system had the right to select his own venue,—the plaintiff always had; and the power is still reserved to the Court to enable the Judge, for sufficient cause shown, to alter the venue, either upon the ground that prejudice exists in the neighbourhood where the venue was to be, or on one of those grounds that are familiar to lawyers, such as that the witnesses would have to come from a certain locality and that great expense would be incurred in trying the matter elsewhere than in the neighbourhood in which the facts occurred and where the witnesses live. Lately the matter has been debated in a somewhat different spirit; but for some reason or other the framers of the Judicature thought it right to give the plaintiff a right to state no venue at all, but that in such cases the venue should be intended to be in the County of Middlesex. I confess I think it was unfortunate, and I hope that that may be altered. I think the venue ought to be expressly stated, and presumably ought to be where the case can be most speedily and cheaply tried. But in regard to the matter we are now discussing, I think if it were placed under the Rules of Court, every protection that the Inland Revenue Department could require would be given, and that it would not be so inconsistent with the whole course of our legislation as it would be if the sub-section were left out. I understand that the noble Earl withdraws his Amendment.

THE EARL OF DUDLEY: Yes.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I have now to propose an Amendment which I brought forward in the Standing Committee where it received the countenance of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Herschell) which I commend to your Lordships: that where a person representing a Public Authority is in the exercise of his duty to the public subjected to an action, and is unjustly and improperly sued and recovers a verdict in consequence, he should be entitled, according to the old practice, to an indemnity against the costs which he is thus improperly put to.

Moved, in Clause 1, page 1, after line 20, insert a new provision—

“Wherever in such action a verdict and judgment shall be obtained by the defendant, he shall be entitled to costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client.”

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported with Amendments; and to be read 2<sup>a</sup> To-morrow.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords it is not necessary for me to make any statement with respect to this Bill, which for two years has been passed by your Lordships; no change is made in it of any importance, and therefore I merely move that it be read a second time.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.”—(The Viscount Cranbrook.)

COMPANIES (CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION) BILL [H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, your Lordships are no doubt aware that under the Companies Act, in order to the constitution of a Company, it is necessary that there should be a Memorandum of Association signed by seven persons, and that certain other requisites of the Act should be complied with. When once a Company has been registered, and so formed, it becomes a corporation, and the rights and liabilities of the members of that corporation are determined by Act of Parliament; and, in case the Company is unable to pay its debts, there are provisions for the winding up of the Company, and of the settlement of the rights of creditors and the members of the Company. In two cases which have occurred in your Lordships' House, learned Lords have pointed out the serious consequences which would follow if a Company, which appeared to have been regularly formed, and in respect of which a certificate of registration had been given by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, should afterwards be held not to have been validly formed: so that those who supposed that they were members of the Company were not really members of a Company, and those who believed that their rights would be regulated under the Companies Act found that this was not the case. My Lords there is a general provision in the Companies Act that the certificate of registration shall be conclusive evidence that the requisites of registration have been complied with. But it has been recently held that that does not cover the determination of the question whether, for example, the seven persons have in fact signed a memorandum; and, if seven persons have not signed the Memorandum, even although the Registrar should have given his certificate that the Company has been duly registered, no Company would exist, the provision of the Companies Act would not apply, and it would scarcely be possible to determine, at all events without much litigation, what would be the rights either of creditors or of members of the Company. That is a very serious matter, which has been called to the attention of the Incorporated Law Society, and also of several Chambers of Commerce; and it is at the instance of the Incorporated Law Society, supported by those Chambers of Commerce, that I bring this Bill to your Lordships' attention, the effect of which is to make the certificate of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies conclusive, when the certificate is given, that a Company has been formed. But, in order that there may be security that the requisites of the Act have been complied with, power is given to the Lord Chancellor, with the concurrence of the Board of Trade, to make rules as to what the Registrar is to be entitled to request in the way of information and otherwise, in order to satisfy him, before he gives his certificate, that these requisites have been complied with. When once he is satisfied, in accordance with those rules and gives the certificate, I think your Lordships will feel that the certificate ought to be conclusive, and if it is not made so, great inconveniences and a good deal of injustice are likely to result. That is the object of the Bill, and I hope your Lordships will see no difficulty in reading it a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."—(The Lord Herschell.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this Bill; but I am bound to say that I think my noble and learned Friend has hardly exhibited to your Lordships the whole importance of the Bill that he proposes. The Bill certainly does not appear to me sufficiently to fortify the provisions which he invites your Lordships to adopt. The hypothesis is (I take one by way of illustration, out of several) that there must be seven persons signing the Memorandum of Association in order to form a company. It has been held in the Courts lately that where there are only six persons, we will say, really signing the Memorandum of Association, no company has ever existed at all. Those six persons may or may not be liable in some form, but there was no company, and some of the evils that my noble and learned Friend alleges might arise. But in the Bill I only find power to make Rules to give security that sufficient evidence should be placed before the Registrar before he gives his certificate. I confess I think that is a very inadequate provision. It seems to me that there ought to be some provision, fortified by the Penal Law, for dealing with the fraud which, by that hypothesis, has been practised upon a public officer. I should make it a felony for persons to pretend to have associated in a body of seven, which the Act of Parliament requires at present, and to induce the public officer to give a certificate which was founded on that mis-statement. It is not a very unusual or extraordinary thing to fortify the provisions of an Act of Parliament by such a penal clause. As your Lordships are aware, certificates of births, marriages, and deaths are given by a person whose duty it is to register them, and, if any individual makes a false statement to induce such a certificate to be given, that person is guilty of felony; and in that way I suppose people have been deterred from making such false statements, except under such temptations as induce persons to run the risk of incurring the penalties of felony. Here there is no such provision. And I regard with some apprehension the fact that for all purposes a certificate given by this public officer should for all time make a company. There is no analogy between this case and the case of a Charter obtained from the Crown by false representation. In that case there is a familiar mode of cancelling the Charter by Scire Facias. I do not find in my noble and learned Friend's Bill any power to put an end to a company, when once created, even if created by fraud. And it seems to me that there are many provisions that ought to be inserted in this Bill, if we are to pass such a provision as the noble and learned Lord suggests, which is of a very drastic character—namely, that a certificate however obtained, on whatever false and fraudulent representations, should for all purposes and all time make a company. I do not say that such difficulties may not be met. I do not propose to move your Lordships not to read the Bill a second time; but there are a great many contingencies which it seems to me it is necessary to provide for before I shall be content with this Bill. I only say that with regard to what may hereafter be said and done in the Standing Committee. At the present time I only intimate that, in my view, there is nothing like sufficient provision against the evils by introducing this mere provision that the Registrar shall be fortified by such evidence as the Lord Chancellor and the Board of Trade may think it right to provide. Having so far delivered my soul, I will only say further that I will in the Standing Committee, if the Bill gets there, and if the noble and learned Lord does not himself propose to do so, propose such Amendments as will, in my view, carry out the objects which I put before your Lordships.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I shall have no objection to any provisions which will prevent the dangers that my noble and learned Friend points to. I would only say that I do not myself think those dangers are very serious. The Companies Act has been in existence a long time now, and I do not think that there is any evidence of a tendency on the part of people to deceive the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies into registering a company when no company has really been formed. That could have been done at any time almost during the period since the Companies Act was passed. I would also point out that certainly, to judge from the language used by a noble and learned Lord in delivering judgment in this House in a company case, he apparently was under the impression that the effect of the Companies Act was to do that which I propose to do now; because, after pointing out the effect that would follow if it were held that there were no company, dealing with this very point of the number of signatories to the Memorandum of Association, he called attention to the provision in the Act to which I have referred, that the registration should be conclusive. It was not necessary in that case to determine the point, and it has been determined the other way in the Court of Appeal. But for a considerable time it has been thought to be the law on account of the dictum by a learned Judge in this House upon the subject. Therefore I do not myself think that the dangers are so great; but I see no sort of objection to making it a penal act—I should approve of it—punishable by law, if any person in these proceedings did anything by way of misstatement to mislead the Registrar.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS ACTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD NORTON: I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they will re-introduce the legislation which they have prepared, and twice passed through Committees during the last three Sessions, for consolidating and amending the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Acts; and whether the Bills might not be introduced, as on the last occasions, in this House. The Bills I know are ready for re-introduction, and are not likely to meet with any opposition. They are extremely important Bills for the consolidation and amendment of the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Acts, which, by the Government's own acknowledgment, are at this moment in a state of great confusion and abuse. The noble Viscount, the Secretary of State for India, introduced these Bills the Session before last, and carried them through the House; and in introducing them he said that they were urgently wanted to meet the very great abuses connected particularly with industrial schools, where hundreds of children are at this moment collected who ought not to be there, and who are placed in a false position by being put in a quasi pauper or criminal institution without any reason for it. My Lords, the reason why they are so collected there is that the schools have been used by philanthropic people, not for the purpose for which they were intended. In the year 1884 I was a member of the Royal Commission upon the subject of these schools, the Chairman of which was Lord Aberdare; and we went round the three Kingdoms for inspection. I recollect in a large town in Ireland we found in the industrial schools such an enormous number of children, who did not at all come under the description in the Industrial Schools Act, that we sent for the Chief Magistrate of the place and asked him how it was. His answer was that he really did not know that they were not within the description of the Act—he said he had never seen the Act—but, if they were not, they ought to be. That is how the Act has been used in Ireland. In Scotland the Act has been used so as to empty the pauper schools in all the large towns of Scotland into the industrial schools, and so to relieve the rates and throw the charge upon the Treasury. In England the abuse is as great, as we see by the Reports of the Inspectors, as to the indiscriminate use of these schools. At this moment there is one out of eight thousand of the whole population in England in industrial schools alone, to say nothing of reformatories and other similar schools; and in Scotland one in three thousand of the whole population is in industrial schools. There is no doubt that people send their children from mere motives of kindness and charity if they are in poor circumstances at home, or they think they will be better educated and cared for in these schools. My Lords, the matter of cost is the last consideration that I would urge upon your Lordships for re-introducing Bills to amend these abuses. The cost at this moment is about half a million a year to the country; but that I consider is of very slight consequence, compared with the disastrous results of so treating these institutions. It is really on a large scale taking away the sense of parental responsibility from the great mass of the population as to the care and education of their children—encouraging bad parents, discouraging good parents, and pauperising a very large portion of the people. The Bills that I want re-introduced to meet these abuses would be effectual. One provision is to lay upon the parents the total cost of their children in these schools, empowering the Local Authority to remit that part of the cost which the parents are evidently unable to meet, and also to take upon themselves altogether the expense of collecting, and of any defalcation of payments. That, of course, would be a very considerable check upon abuse. I think your Lordships will say that it should never be a matter of saving to a parent to get his child into one of these institutions; but that a child should, at least, cost the parent as much there as he would at home. I have had parents asking me how they could qualify their children to get into these schools. The only answer is, by throwing them on the streets. The Bills proposed that there should be an entire separation between what are called School Board duties and police duties in this subject; that the truant schools and industrial schools should take what are called the non-attendance cases, and the School Board should have nothing to do with crime. There are three Bills in one of which there provision is for entirely separating what I call the police action from the educational action in these schools. The Bills provide that in the case of boys corporal punishment should be used more for the sort of crimes that boys fall into, and at all events the punishment should be separate altogether from the education given in these schools. At this moment the confusion is so great that in the last Report to the Department it is clearly stated that the distinction between reformatory schools and industrial schools is also breaking down; that the class of children in the two institutions is exactly the same; and that the two are used indiscriminately by the Magistrates—who either convict in order to send to reformatory schools, or do not convict in order to send to industrial schools, according to the preference in the case for one school over another in that neighbourhood. The Inspectors not only say that these institutions are crowded in the most mischievous way, but that the length of detention in these schools is too long, and they recommend that in all suitable cases the children sent even to industrial schools should be boarded out, and in such cases should be sent to elementary schools; and that, in cases where it is possible they should be sent home again as soon as they are fit to go, if there is a decent home—and in some cases there is a decent home—I do not mean to say that in many cases there is; but, wherever there is a decent home for them to go to, it is a very strong measure, and a very wrong measure on the part of Parliament to take children away from their parents and place them in institutions of this sort to be educated as reprobates at the public expense. If these Bills were carried, it would be made clear that really vicious children should come under the general Criminal Law and be treated in the same way as adults; children of the ordinary kind of juvenile offenders should be punished, and then educated in reformatory schools; while for mere vagrants and neglected children in the streets without any decent home, there are the industrial schools. I would urge Her Majesty's Government to re-introduce these Bills at once into this House. The noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India is not here; but he is perfectly acquainted with these Bills, and he has stated their urgency to the House. He carried them successfully through this House without any opposition. We all acknowledge that he has thoroughly discharged the legislation connected with his own Department in this House, and I would implore Her Majesty's Government to allow him, now he has time, to take charge of these Bills, or, by whatever other arrangement they think best, to get these Bills again before this House, I would say without any further delay whatever. They would certainly pass through this House without opposition, and I think they might be in time to pass through the lower House of Parliament.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, I am glad to hear the noble Lord who asked this question speaking in such confident terms about the probability of little or no opposition to these Bills. It is a matter of great regret that although your Lordships have twice well discussed the principles of these measures, they have not yet passed into law. It is the intention of Her Majesty's Government at an early opportunity to introduce them again; but, as your Lordships have so well discussed and considered them, it is considered convenient that on this occasion they should be introduced in the other House of Parliament, the more especially as in the Bills about to be introduced a very substantial number of your Lordships' Amendments will appear.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS—EMIGRATION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD MONKS WELL: My Lords, in venturing to criticise the action taken by the Home Office with regard to the emigration of children from reformatory and industrial schools, I wish at once to state the exact nature of the objection. I do not suppose for a moment that the Home Secretary is not actuated by the very best intentions; I do not for a moment allege that he has acted illegally, in the strictest sense of the word—no doubt he has acted in accordance with the letter of the law; but what I allege is that the Home Secretary has exercised a statutory discretion in direct contradiction to the plain intention of Acts of Parliament: that he has allowed the view and opinion of the Home Office to prevail over the view and opinion which has been sanctioned by the Legislature in more than one Act of Parliament. There has been a long-standing and serious divergence of opinion between the Home Office and the Managers with regard to the ultimate disposal of children from reformatory and industrial schools, as to whether the wishes of the parents should prevail over the wishes of the children. The Home Office, in upholding the right of the parents to take back their children when the time of their detention has expired, has acted in a way that is the despair of Managers who are condemned to see hundreds of promising children relapse into crime by being exposed to temptations which the children themselves, if they possibly could, would have avoided. Now, this action of the

Lord Norton

Home Office, as I have on several occasions explained to this House, has led to the most deplorable results. The statistics show conclusively that the surest method of destroying all the good that is done for these children at great expense and with great trouble in these schools, is to send them back to their old haunts and to their old associates; and it is hardly a matter of controversy among the Managers of these schools that the best result is obtained by emigration, which takes them entirely away from their old haunts and associations, and gives them an excellent opportunity of starting afresh in life under the best possible conditions. In spite of the accumulation of evidence of the disastrous consequences that have ensued from children being sent back to their parents, the Managers of these schools have never been able to shake the belief of the Home Office in the sacred right of parents to wreck the prospects of children whom they have abandoned to the care of charity or of the State. Up to the present year, I fully admit that the Home Office had the right to its own opinion, just as much as the Managers had the right to theirs; but, my Lords, the question is now put on an entirely different footing. Up to last year the Legislature had taken no part on either side in this contest—it had stood aside and, as it were, kept the ring for the combatants. But last year the situation was entirely changed; the Managers invoked the Legislature to their aid, and the Legislature passed two Acts of Parliament to say that if parents did not undertake the obligations of their position they should no longer have the rights of parents. The Legislature said, in these Acts of Parliament, that parents could not claim the rights of parents while they refused to exercise the duties of parents. Now these Acts, as it seems to me, ought to have done away in the minds of the officials at the Home Office with any idea that they were in any way compelled by the law of England to regard the wishes of the parents rather than the wishes of the children—that they ought to pay an extravagant and, I venture to think, a deplorable deference to the wishes of the parents in the ultimate disposal of these children. Now one of these Acts of Parliament had express reference to reformatory and industrial schools. This Act is a very short one indeed; it was passed last year, and is as follows: It is called—

“An Act to assist the Managers of Reformatory and Industrial Schools in advantageously launching into useful careers the children under their charge.”

Therefore, there is no doubt with what object this Act was passed. The Act says:—

“If any youthful offender or child detained in or placed out on licence from a Certified Reformatory or Industrial School conducts himself well, the Managers of the school may, with his own consent apprentice him to, or dispose of him in, any trade, calling or service, or by emigration, notwithstanding that his period of detention has not expired, and such apprenticing or disposition shall be valid as if the Managers were his parents. Provided that where he is to be disposed of by emigration, and in any case unless he has been detained for twelve months, the consent of the Secretary of State shall also be required for the exercise of any power under this section.”

Your Lordships will see that this Act, though it gives the Home Office a veto as to emigration, still mentions emigration in connection with other modes of disposing of the children, and it puts the Managers in the position of the children's parents, not only as regards other methods of disposing of them, but also as regards emigration; and the Act, as it seems to me, is clearly meant to alter the law as to emigration and to give the Managers of the schools greatly increased powers of emigrating these children. And I may call your Lordships' attention to the fact that, as regards other methods of disposing of the children, it entirely revolutionises the law by doing away with the veto that existed in the Home Office. Now the Managers of industrial schools naturally thought that when that Act was passed, what they conceived to be the spirit of the Act would be given effect to by the Home Office; and they thought that as they themselves, the Managers, had been put in the position of parents, the Home Office would have been as chary for the future in interfering with the discretion of the Managers as it had been in the past in interfering with the discretion of parents. But, my Lords, the Home Office did not take that view, and they determined as to emigration to make this Act a complete dead letter; and not only have they made it a dead letter with regard to emigration, but it would seem, from the terms of a Circular which I hold in my hand, which was issued last August after the passing of this Act, that the Home Office consider it their duty still further to rivet upon the children the chains which they had already empowered their parents to place upon them. This Circular of the 25th of August, 1891, after quoting the Act says, that Mr. Matthews has thought fit to require that in all cases of disposal by emigration the consent of the Secretary of State will depend, among other matters, upon the written consent of the parent being forwarded to him, unless it can be shown that such consent may, through parental neglect or misconduct, be dispensed with; that is to say, the Managers must prove affirmatively neglect and misconduct on the part of parents. The Managers think that they should not be obliged to do this; they consider that the mere fact that the parent has parted with the control of his child, by making over his child to these schools, is prima facie proof that he has not exercised the functions of a parent as they ought to be exercised, and that the boot ought to be on the other leg—that the parent ought to be obliged to show affirmatively that he is a parent who is well capable of looking after the welfare of his child. My Lords, what I want to point out is this: that it is a very strange thing that the first Circular that is issued by the Home Office after this Act has been passed, with a view to giving Managers further control over the disposal of the children, is in much stronger terms than the previous Circular of 1885; for the previous Circular of 1885 did not say that in order that the wishes of the Managers should prevail, in all cases misconduct on the part of the parent must be proved; it merely said:

“It is desirable that in all cases a careful inquiry should be made into the character of the parents and the condition of the home.”

Therefore I say it would seem as if the Home Office had read those Acts of Parliament so as further to fetter the discretion of the Managers and the children rather than to give the Managers and the children greater discretion as to their ultimate disposal. My Lords, I now come to the recent acts of the Home Office under that Circular. There were nine cases in which the parents of children who wanted to emigrate from the two industrial schools, Feltham and Mayford, with which I am connected, refused their consent to such emigration. In eight cases out of the nine the veto of the parents was upheld; the ninth case was a case of illegitimacy. Therefore in every case of a legitimate child the veto of the parent was upheld, and I hope that those eight children who are legitimate may not have cause to regret to the last day of their lives that they had the misfortune to be born in wedlock. It is clear, as I venture to think, that the Home Office has disregarded the intention of the Legislature; but I think that the matter becomes even plainer on referring to the “Custody of Children Act” passed in the same year; for that Act declared in Section 3 that

—“at that person’s expense, or by the Guardians of a Poor Law Union, for such a length of time and under such circumstances as to satisfy the Court that the parent was unmindful of his parental duties; the Court shall not make an order for the delivery of the child to the parent, unless the parent has satisfied the Court that, having regard to the welfare of the child, he is a fit person to have the custody of the child.”

It seems to me that that Circular goes against the plain spirit of the Act of Parliament in compelling the Managers to prove affirmatively that the parent has misconducted himself when, under very similar circumstances, that Act says that it rests on the parent himself to show affirmatively that he is a person who ought to have the control of his child. Now I really think that it is time that this nightmare of parental control should be no longer allowed to paralyse philanthropic effort. My Lords, I hope the House will strengthen the hands of those who wish to induce the Home Office in fit cases to allow their children to emigrate. As to the action of the Home Office, perhaps I ought to say further that I have only been able to get detailed accounts of these children in one case. I have had short notes in the other cases, which I have sent on to the Home Office; I have not kept a copy of them, and, therefore, I cannot quote them to your Lordships; but I may mention, with regard to one of the cases put down in these short notes, that the note made by our inquiry officer is that the child's home was wretched, and that the father was not in a condition to find him any employment. With regard to another of these boys, I have the whole report of our inspector in my hand. The boy's name is Foster, and I may mention to the House that the payment that his father ought to make for his schooling is very greatly in arrears; and with regard to the other cases, where the Home Office have sustained the objection of the parents, I have good reason to believe that in some cases the parents have made no payment at all, in other cases very small payment, and I believe I am right in asserting that only in one case was any substantial payment made by the parent. As to Foster our officer reports:—

"I saw the father at his work, a carman in the employ of the Local Government Board at Sutton, Surrey; he has been there seven or eight years; a widower. The house was locked up—I was told he was seldom at home: He has two children depending on him, living with his mother-in-law, a very respectable person, who said there was not the least prospect for the lad at home only to get into trouble should he return."

Yet this is a boy who is very anxious to emigrate to Canada and the Home Office said he was not to go. I hope I shall have the sympathy of your Lordships' House with me. I hope the Home Office, on further consideration, will act in accordance with the views of the Legislature; I hope that they will cause reasonable facilities to be given for the emigration of these children who want to go, and whom the Managers want to send, abroad; and I hope they will have regard to the wishes of those who take great interest in these children, who have most reason to know in what way the welfare of those children can be best advanced. My Lords, I beg to move that the Papers relating to such refusal be laid upon the Table of this House.

Moved, "That there be laid before this House papers relating to the action of the Home Secretary in refusing permission to certain children in industrial schools at Feltham and Mayford to emigrate to Canada."—(The Lord Monkswell.)

*LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, I venture to second the hope expressed just now that your Lordships will endeavour to induce the Home Office to carry out the spirit of the Legislature. I hope that I shall have no difficulty in a very few words in showing your Lordships that the Home Office have continually done that during three successive Governments. The noble Lord who has brought this matter before you founds his case, so far as I understand it, on the right of School Managers as before the right of parents to emigrate the children, and that there is to be no veto; but that whether it is liked or not by the parents those children are to be emigrated. But that is the very point which your Lordships decided last year, and it was the very object of the power being given to the Secretary of State to use his discretion in cases of parents not agreeing to their children being emigrated, and that the Secretary of State might use his power to veto the verdict of the School Managers. How did this matter arise? It was when the Government of the Party of which the noble Lord is a member was in power, and when two Circulars were issued by the then Home Secretary. The first Circular was in consequence of the Secretary of State discovering that children were then emigrated without their parents' leave. A second Circular was then issued to say that, although the Secretary of State would not allow children to be emigrated without their parents' leave, that was not to affect the case of dissolute or bad parents. The third Circular, and the one which I think the noble Lord seems to complain of most, was issued last year, and was simply calling the attention of the reformatory and industrial schools to the Act, which, as a Bill, was brought in by Colonel Howard Vincent, and really was part of the Bill of the Government, calling the attention of the reformatory and industrial schools to what the Legislature had done. I daresay the noble Lord was not pleased with that Act; but, if Parliament in its wisdom has already decided that a veto as regards these cases is to rest with the Secretary of State, surely it is rather early, a year after, to ask your Lordships to alter your mind. The noble Lord has hardly, I think, fully stated to this House the numbers in this one particular case to which he refers. I presume he has taken the two schools together, Feltham and Mayford.

LORD MONKSWELL: That is so.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: That makes the noble Lord's side of the question better. But, if your Lordships will take Feltham alone, we shall find that, out of 31 names that were forwarded to the Secretary of State for emigration, the Secretary of State only put his veto upon six. Now the procedure in this case is very simple, and I should think nothing could be fairer or better to the parent, to the children, and to the community at large. Upon the Secretary of State receiving the names of these children he sends them to the Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, who again sends his officer to investigate into each case. In these six cases the parents objected to their children being emigrated; in four of those cases the parents were distinctly respectable and of good character; in the other two cases there was nothing whatever against them. Now, my Lords, I ask you are we, some of us parents, to allow the children of poor and respectable parents, with nothing in the world to be said against them, to be emigrated against their parents' wish? Surely there is some justice in the decision that Parliament arrived at last year to give the veto to the Secretary of State on School Managers who would commit such an injustice. I think that the more the noble Lord opposite looks into this matter, the more he will find that the Home Office is distinctly inclined to second him in his well-known good works. He has taken up the view in this case that the Secretary of State is opposed to him. In that I beg to assure him most candidly that he is entirely in the wrong. If he thinks that the powers imposed upon the Secretary of State have been abused, then I am afraid my explanation will not satisfy him; but he may rest confident that it is only in the cause of justice and of freedom to the parents and to the children that the Secretary of State will issue his veto against the emigration of children in these cases.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I cannot help thinking that the noble Lord has rather misunderstood what my noble Friend behind me wished to bring before the House. My noble Friend does not for a moment contend that the Home Secretary ought not to possess the veto, or that the Home Secretary ought not to exercise that veto whenever he is satisfied that it ought to be exercised; what he wished to point out to the House was that, according to the view which he takes of the Circular of the Home Office and their action, they appear to be of opinion that the onus must lie upon the Managers of reformatory schools to show that there is a reason why the consent of the parents should not be conclusive upon the matter. What my noble Friend urged is that it ought rather to lie upon the parents to show that they are respectable people, and that the consent ought to be refused. Surely there is a great deal of force in what my noble Friend said. These children were originally placed in reformatories because they were neglected by their parents; they have been taken care of at the expense of the State; and the question then arises whether they are to be restored to their parents or not. Surely the obvious course to be taken by the Home Secretary, who possesses the veto, is not to restore them to their parents if another career is proposed to them by the reformatory school, and against the wish of the children, unless it is clearly shown that the parents are proper persons to receive them. But I rather gather, even from what the noble Lord has said, that the Secretary of State seems to regard it as part of his duty, unless the consent of the parents has been obtained, to exercise his veto.

Lord De Ramsey

*LORD DE RAMSEY: I am glad that the noble Earl gives me an opportunity to explain that ; it is quite the contrary. The Secretary of State uses his veto in cases where the parents do object, but yet he may insist on their being emigrated. He does not issue his veto in cases where the parents object and he says those children must not be emigrated; but, in cases where it is proved to him by the double inquiry that the parents are dissolute, and are not fit to have the charge and care of children, the Home Secretary says that those children shall be emigrated in contradiction of their parents' desire.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Then I am to understand that, in point of fact, the noble Lord agrees with my noble Friend behind me ; he did not say so. If he agrees with my noble Friend that the proper course for the Home Secretary is only to exercise his veto where the parents are unable to show that they are respectable parents and fit to take care of their children, there is no dispute upon the matter. I apprehend that my noble Friend will be perfectly satisfied. But unfortunately, according to what I heard from my noble Friend behind me, that impression does not appear to have been produced upon the Managers of reformatory schools, and I think it is very unfortunate that it should be so. The last Circular issued by the Home Office is certainly very much more peremptory with regard to the consent of the parents than the former one ; and, if I might venture to make a suggestion in a matter of this kind to the Home Office, it would be that they should issue another Circular, making it quite clear that the view which the noble Lord has explained to the House is the view of the Home Secretary ; and I have no doubt that, when that is done, the Managers of reformatory schools will be thoroughly satisfied.

*LORD MONKSWELL : I should like to say a word or two in reply to the noble Lord opposite, because he seemed to labour in some respects under a misapprehension. He says that I object to the Act of 1891. It was at my suggestion that Colonel Howard Vincent brought that Bill into the House of Commons, and I passed it through this House, because I thought it would give the Managers a great deal more power to emigrate children than they possessed before. Your Lordships may judge of my astonishment when I was confronted by a Circular which tells me that for the future it will lie upon the Managers to prove that the parents are drunken and dissolute, and cannot look after their children ; whereas, what we have always contended for is that we should be placed in the same position as the "Custody of Children Act" places other institutions ; and that it should be for the parent himself to prove fairly and conclusively to the Home Office that he is a proper person to take charge of his children. My Lords, I should like to know how much these parents have paid.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: I am quite prepared to show the noble Lord what those parents have paid. He was quite correct in saying that one of them has paid a considerable sum ; but other parents have also paid considerable sums.

*LORD MONKSWELL: My information is just the contrary.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: I can give the noble Lord authentic information ; I will show him any Papers that he likes to ask for.

*LORD MONKSWELL: I do not press the Motion for Papers if I can get any Papers I want.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: There is no objection to Papers being produced.

*LORD MONKSWELL: I may mention that I sent the Clerk to the Reformatory and Industrial Schools of the London County Council to Delahay Street to ask for Papers, and he was told that he could not have them. My Lords, I move for the Papers.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 19th May, 1892.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

EASTBOURNEIMPROVEMENT ACT(1885), AMENDMENT BILL (by Order.)

CONSIDERATION.

As amended, considered.

*(3.10.) ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I am very sorry to have to intrude on the attention of the House again. I would gladly have ceased all opposition to the Report of the Committee if it had been possible for me to do so, but I am sure the House will allow me its kind indulgence when it learns from me that it is not possible for me to assent to that Report. When I unfold my tale I shall be able to show that Eastbourne has a very strong grievance under the circumstances. The Committee was composed of duly-qualified men, five selected by the House and four by the Committee of Selection—all good men bar one, perhaps—myself; but to the composition of that Committee I must draw the attention of the House. We went into that Committee—that is to say, Eastbourne did—as I now find, doomed to failure. When I was a young man, and used to go round the Assizes and serve on Grand Juries, I used to hear talk among barristers about “hanging juries,” and following up that expression and applying it here I say Eastbourne went before a “hanging Committee.” The House will expect an explanation, and I am prepared to give it. The Committee, I expected, would be fairly balanced. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and myself were in opposition; other Members were nominated by the House from either side. The Committee of Selection nominated good men—the hon. Baronet the Member for the Tewkesbury Division (Sir John Dorington), my hon. Friend the Member for the Harwich Division of Essex (Mr. Round), the noble Lord the Member for the Barnsley Division

(Earl Compton), and the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton). We went into the business; we got into the evidence, or the address of counsel—I forget which; allusion was made to various clauses and bye-laws, and particularly to the repeal of the Torquay clause. I am permitted to say by my hon. Friend (Mr. Round) that then he suddenly realised, when it was too late to withdraw, that he had served on the Committee which recommended the repeal of the Torquay clause, and, therefore, he brought, to his own regret, to the consideration of this subject a biased mind. He would not have served on the Committee if he had remembered the circumstance that he had previously served on the Committee for the Torquay Bill; but it was too late for him to retire. If he had remembered it, it would not have been necessary for me to have objected to his nomination; he would have declined to serve, and the Committee of Selection would have nominated some other Member. I am certain the Committee of Selection would not have nominated him had they been aware of his having served on the Torquay Committee. The House will then understand that I feel fully justified in raising opposition to the Report of the Committee, for I say we have not had fair-play upstairs. It was impossible under the circumstances. If there had been an hon. Member from this side of the House who had not served on that Torquay Committee, I am sure I should have had his support, and then we should have been four in favour of the clause, and possibly there would have been four against me, and then the Chairman would have had to give his casting vote, the very thing I wished to compel him to do. But as the case stood, I had only the support of my hon. Friend on my right (Mr. Bartley) and the hon. Baronet (Sir John Dorington), and so we were three to five. Now, I do not think that is satisfactory. I believe when the Second Reading was carried in this House by a large majority, very many Members meant by their vote that this matter should go before a Committee upstairs, there to be thoroughly threshed out. They did not mean by their votes that the clause was to be repealed—many Members have told me so—but that the question should be thoroughly threshed out by a duly-qualified and well-appointed Committee. Well, now, how do we stand? I have given notice of three new clauses, which will be found on the Notice Paper, and I will deal with them presently; but before I do so, let me say a word about the hearing of the case. I wish to speak in terms of the highest respect of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who occupied the chair (Sir H. James). It was a real treat to serve on the Committee if only to see the way in which he handled his brother Q.C.'s and kept them to the point. We should probably be sitting in the Committee Room now but for our Chairman. He conducted the case with a desire to get it over rapidly, and I am bound to say he accomplished his purpose. I could not but admire the skill he showed in handling his brother sinners in the law. It was refreshing to get upstairs into the healthier legal atmosphere, to get away from political lawyers into the dry atmosphere of law itself. Let me give a short quotation from the learned counsel for the promoters. Said he—

“It is not for me to defend the breaking of the law, and I decline altogether to do it, even to defend those who break what they consider a bad law, and even if they do it by way of honest protest.”

I say it was refreshing and agreeable to get into a healthy legal atmosphere and not hear lawyers justifying open disobedience as a protest to get a law repealed. I will not detain the House longer than I can help; but let me call attention to some of the evidence given before the Committee, and particularly to that of Mr. Booth himself. The right hon. Chairman asked the witness a question, after some reference had been made to Bedford, and the question was—

“Supposing that we repealed this clause, and supposing that the Town Council of Eastbourne should make a bye-law regulating the playing of music at Eastbourne on Sundays, and that the Home Office approves of it, will you obey the bye-law?”

What a question to come from a Committee—whether a bye-law, being certified by authority to be a good bye-law, would be obeyed! Mark the answer—

“We shall, if it does not in effect obtain what the repeal of the clause is intended to abolish.”

In other words, he would, if he approved of the law—not if he did not like it! I will not read all the evidence on the point; it is too long. The counsel, Mr. Pember, interposes and says—

“I give the most solemn pledge on the part of the Salvation Army that that shall be so;” that is that they shall obey the bye-law. Then Mr. Bramwell Booth goes on—

“Allow me to add one item of information. We now carry on our operations in a thousand towns. There are multitudes of bye-laws affecting us, and multitudes of local circumstances that require concessions here, alterations there, and modifications here, from time to time, and we have scarcely any difficulty in any towns. We are always ready to meet them except where we find, as we have done in cases like Croydon, a bad bye-law, and then we cannot stand it.”

See the arrogance of the man—

So Mr. Booth himself is the person to judge if a bye-law is good or bad! When a bye-law is passed by a Local Authority and approved by the Home Office, still, in his opinion, it may be bad, and then he will refuse to obey it! Then the Chairman pushed him further, asking—

“Could you not shortly say that you will obey any valid bye-law?”

Mr. Pember answers for him!—

“We will obey any valid bye-law.”

Then counsel asks—

“Will you put it to Mr. Booth whether he would accept these two bye-laws?”

The Chairman said—

“No. Mr. Booth has said through his counsel that he will accept any valid bye-law. That gives you the full scope under the Municipal Act of making any bye-law that shall be reasonable.

Mr. Richards: The St. Alban's bye-law has been upheld by the Courts.”

So the questioning went on, and then it occurred to me that a concrete case would be better than much argument and I asked—

“A concrete case is better in my judgment. Do you accept the bye-law of St. Alban's which now exists as a valid bye-law?”

The witness replied—

“What is the St. Alban’s bye-law?”

The bye-law was handed to him, and he went on—

“I am not a lawyer; but I should think that the bye-law is good. But I do not know; it is for the lawyers to say.

The Chairman: If it is valid?”

Then I remarked to him—

“You were convicted under it?”

And he answered—

“It does not follow that it was good law.”

But he appealed to the High Court, and the Court upheld the conviction. The fact was established that it was a good bye-law; he could carry the case no further.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): And he obeyed it.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: Yes; I am coming to that presently. Then the learned counsel (Mr. Pember) referred to the bye-law which was rejected by the Home Office, and finally my hon. Friend near me (Mr. Bartley) put this question:—

“Supposing that the bye-law is approved by the Home Office will you and the Salvation Army undertake to abide by it until it is proved not to be valid?”

The witness answered—

“I do not think that is quite a fair question to ask me.”

You see the kind of witness we had. But at last his own counsel would not stand it any longer, and, to use a nautical expression, “jumped on him,” and said—

“It is perfectly fair, and I give that pledge. You must allow me, Mr. Booth, to give that pledge for you.”

He gave a solemn pledge to obey subject to a test case. The learned counsel saw his case slipping away. He wanted to get quit of Mr. Booth. He appreciated the danger of the situation, and he proved equal to it. He said—

“No; you must hear me give a pledge which I consider I am instructed by your solicitors and my clients to give. If you repudiate that pledge it must be done openly, but I do not think you will. I propose to pledge you here that, in the event of the Home Secretary sanctioning a bye-law for Eastbourne, you will obey it until by legal means you have got it proved to be a bad bye-law and upset.”

Admiral Field

Then questions go on until at last it comes out—

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Hear, hear!

*ADMIRAL FIELD: Yes, but the witness had already told us that as in the Croydon case he would not obey what he considered a bad law. Are we to believe this arrogant witness will keep his word? What guarantee have we that he will do so? We prefer to keep our clause, and we consider, after all the evidence given by witnesses, and the arrogance displayed by this man, who will yield no obedience but to a law of his own approval, that Eastbourne should not be deprived of this statutory power. It is because I conceive that the Committee were of opinion that the clause was somewhat too strict that it gave no latitude even to the Corporation, because under it the Corporation had no right to approve of a procession, that I venture to introduce a new clause to the notice of the House. It will be observed that I keep the old clause, but add certain words, and it will read—

“No processions shall take place on a Sunday in any street or public place in the borough, accompanied by any instrumental music, fireworks, discharge of cannon, or firearms, or other disturbing noise, otherwise than with the consent of the Local Authority, and in such manner as they shall direct.”

That gives a latitude to the Local Authority to allow processions under certain circumstances, having regard to the route they shall take and the times when the music shall play. That seems to me to give a reasonable amount of elasticity. Three of us stood for it in Committee, and we should have been four but for my hon. Friend the Member for the Harwich Division having committed himself to the repeal of the Torquay clause, as I have said. Then I come to some of the evidence, that bye-laws were drawn up by the Corporation, acting on hints in speeches delivered in this House during the Debate, that if the clause were repealed the Corporation should frame bye-laws and submit them to the approval of the Home Office. These bye-laws are in existence in St. Alban’s and in Bootle; but the Home Office, having the draft of the bye-laws submitted, declined to sanction them, even though they are approved in St. Alban's and in Bootle! Well, Sir, it seems to me in this business Eastbourne is "between the devil and the deep sea"—not allowed to keep the clause and not allowed to have the bye-laws she wants. Now let me say a word or two on another clause I have suggested. During the inquiry I put a question to different witnesses. I put it to the Chief Constable, and asked his opinion whether such a clause as this would be acceptable—

"If on the conviction of any person for an offence under this Act it shall appear to the convicting justices that such disturbing noise was caused by the playing of instrumental music in a procession on Sunday, it shall be lawful for the convicting justices, if they shall think fit, to make an order for the seizure of such instruments aforesaid with a view to the destruction or sale of the same, in lieu of any other penalty or costs provided by this Act."

The Chief Constable approved of the clause; the Mayor approved of it; the Town Clerk approved of it. The authorities would be glad to have such a power, for it would meet the difficulty they had in enforcing obedience to the law. This forfeiture of the instruments with which the misdeeds are done would follow the parallel of the Weights and Measures Act, which confiscates the false weights and scales used by a tradesman in the sale of his goods. This would meet the difficulty there has been found; there would be no necessity for imposing fines these people will not pay, and giving them the opportunity of going to prison and posing as martyrs. Simply, they would if they wished to continue to break the law, have to send for new instruments. I put this to the Clerk to the Magistrates, and he highly approved of it. Then another clause was suggested by the Clerk to the Magistrates for the recovery of penalties. This clause stands No. 2 in my Amendments, and runs as follows:—

we know these persons act in pursuance of instructions from head-quarters, and so the clause provides—

"It shall be lawful for the convicting justices if they shall think fit to summon such other person or persons to appear before them, or any other justices of the peace for the same county, borough, division, or place, to show cause why any penalty and costs imposed upon the person convicted should not be paid by such other person or persons under whose order, direction, or authority such offence shall appear to have been committed. And in case cause shall not be shown to the contrary to the satisfaction of the said justices they may make an order for payment by such other person or persons of such penalty and costs together with the cost of and incident to the making of such order, and in default of payment the said penalty and costs may be recovered against such other person or persons in the same manner as penalties may be recovered under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts."

The power to summon such parties to fine them, and to recover fines by distraint would, no doubt, be an effectual remedy; and I have adopted the suggestion in my clause. There is one other matter I should like to allude to for a moment. When we had these matters under discussion in the House I made a statement which I know was not credited in full by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. H. Fowler). I said that all Nonconformist Ministers and all clergymen were agreed in objecting to these Sunday bands. I do not think that statement was accepted, but what happened in Committee? We had before us a Nonconformist minister of the old type; his name was Mr. Baxter, and I have no doubt he is a descendant of the pious author of The Saint's Rest. He gave his evidence admirably; and when he made his appearance in the witness chair, I saw the faces of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) radiant with joy at having a witness to whom they could yield implicit credit. Mr. Baxter was asked this pertinent question—

"In your opinion has the Sunday band-playing provoked all the opposition and noise?"

He had already stated that it was the unanimous belief of all the ministers in Eastbourne that it was the sole cause of the disturbance. His answer was—

"Yes; I believe so on two grounds: first, because it has been considered to be an unnecessary thing in itself; and, secondly, because the Salvationists have been considered to be over-riding even their own rules and regulations, because it is laid down there specifically that if the procession or the playing should prove to be provocative to a mob, there should be a cessation of it. That has been distinctly laid down in this Red Book, and has not been abided by."

Another question he was asked, because it had been affirmed that all Nonconformist ministers in charge of congregations were on our side. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had another arrow in his quiver; he had a Nonconformist minister without a chapel, and counsel asked—

"Do you agree at all with the Rev. Mr. Turner in the suggestion that there has been any terrorism exercised over the inhabitants to make them vote in opposition to the Salvation Army?—Decidedly not."

So it goes on. I will not read all the evidence. Mr. Baxter gave it clearly and well on the side of order and the retention of the clause. But further than that, this rev. gentleman, Mr. Baxter, wrote a letter the other day on the subject from which I must quote a sentence or two, because this is à propos to a preposterous argument and a good reply to the right hon Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who called this "religious persecution." This Nonconformist minister wrote to a local paper as follows:—

"Religious persecution we do not desire, though to call the Sunday band a 'religious' affair, when it has not a scrap of warrant from the personal example or precepts of the Great Founder of Christianity, or from the practice of His Apostles, is a farce indeed."

It is a Nonconformist minister saying this—Mr. Baxter, the possible descendant of the famous author of The Saints' Rest—

"All the New Testament has to say of the 'sounding brass or tinkling cymbal' is to put them metaphorically in contrast with true religion (1 Cor. xiii. 1). And it does seem hard that after the town was provided with a clause which has no anti-Scriptural element in it, that clause should be repealed at the will of one man. But we live in an age of lawlessness."

Yes, Sir, it is an age of lawlessness. We are asked to repeal a clause because a certain section of men refuse obedience to it. Let me quote a passage from the speech—a famous speech—delivered the other day by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of our Party in this House (Mr. A. J. Balfour), at Manchester. He said—

"We have not got to wait till the last decade of this nineteenth century to learn that if you refuse to enforce the law, the law will be despised, contemned, and disobeyed."

Yes, I know he was referring to the maintenance of law and order in Ireland; but you may apply the precept to this smaller instance, as we (the Committee) saw when we had that arrogant witness before us, who showed that he was disposed to obey no law but his own will, and who with difficulty was compelled by his counsel to give a guarantee of obedience. What guarantee have we? We have our law, and we want to keep it. We had an illustration the other day in this House. A few days ago we had a Private Bill before us in relation to Glasgow. I was not here, but I just looked in. I had to go to Hastings to do better work. There was before the House a very novel clause—a very novel clause indeed—in regard to disorderly houses. Very well. The Under Secretary representing the Home Office got up and opposed the clause on general grounds, and he quoted Eastbourne in relation to matters which should be regulated by bye-law. But what did the House do? What did this House care about the opinion of the Home Office? It was disregarded; the Home Office had to give way, and the clause was adopted. Very well. But do you call this consistent conduct to put a clause in which the Home Office objected to, and strike out a clause accepting the statement of the Home Secretary that it ought to be done by bye-laws. Oh, I like the consistency of politicians in this House! People are not all of one mind. We were provided on the Committee with the notes of the evidence on the Torquay Bill. Mr. Sclater-Booth, now Lord Basing, was Chairman of the Committee on that Bill, and he certainly was opposed to the view of the Home Office. The talk was upon the Hastings Clause. The Chairman said—

"We all thought the Hastings Clause was quite sufficient."

The Eastbourne Clause is the same—

"It was settled after a great deal of discussion. The Home Office object to the clause altogether."

It seems to be the fortune of the Home Office to object—

"Therefore we are giving you something in allowing you the Hastings Clause."

Now, the remark of the Chairman is worthy of note. He had been President of the Local Government Board, and knew something about upholding the law. He continued—

"I do not agree with the policy of the Home Office in that matter."

I wish he were here to support me in this controversy—

"I know what they want—they want general legislation."

Then why not bring in a Bill making it general and we will support you?—

"But we may have to wait ten years for general legislation, and we must put the clauses into this Bill."

And he put the clause in, and this House struck it out afterwards on the advice of the Home Office. But then this House acted in a totally different manner when it inserted the clause the other day in the Glasgow Bill. I think the Home Secretary and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) are bound, if they wish to be logical and consistent, to bring in a Bill now to repeal all these clauses where they exist in Hastings, Reading, Carlisle, and Eastbourne. Do not punish Eastbourne alone. To be logical and consistent repeal the whole, and then we can understand your policy. Talk of persecution! You are persecuting Eastbourne. Eastbourne is persecuted by the Salvation Army. Eastbourne wants the peace kept; wants her law maintained; and if we cannot get justice here we will go somewhere else. There is a final Court of Appeal still in existence, and to that purer legal atmosphere I propose to take these clauses, away from the unhealthy atmosphere of this House. I will not trouble the House to divide on this matter. No, I am not going to give you the chance of boasting of another victory, for no doubt there would be a majority in support of this Report of the Committee to which I object. We will take our cause to the House of Lords, where the discussion will be unembarrassed by the fear of the lessening of votes, uninfluenced by the prospects of a General Election. They can bring their strong legal minds to the consideration of the question, and Eastbourne will come out of the furnace of her trouble—(An hon. MEMBER: Purified!) No, Sir, Eastbourne has no need of purification; it is in one of the purest constituencies in the country, and it is a most charming town to live in. All she wants is peace and quiet on Sundays. That is what the inhabitants want—they, including the ministers and clergy of all denominations, are in favour of my proposals. ("No!") No? Except one man who is a minister without a chapel, who is what may be called a "returned empty." But I am provoked into these remarks by interruptions. I will not take up more of the time of the House. (Cries of "Go on!") Oh, I am game to go on, if I could see any useful result, for another half-hour, but we have important business before us. But I wanted to show the House that I am justified in drawing its attention to this matter. I have shown it was impossible to get justice from that Committee, constituted as it was. I believe it was the desire of the House that Eastbourne should have a full inquiry and a fair decision. That fair decision we have not had from my point of view, for I have shown that one Member was committed by his previous action in reference to Torquay.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is not entitled to cast reflections on the action of Members on a Committee.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: I apologise, Sir, if I have said anything wrong. One word in conclusion. A good deal has been said against religious persecution and in favour of religious liberty, and I am a strong supporter of liberty, religious and every other kind of liberty, to the utmost possible extent. But, Sir, liberty without law is licence, and I take my definition of liberty from a great thinker, Mr. John Stuart Mill—

"The liberty of each bounded by the equal liberty of all."

That is what we want in Eastbourne. Let every man have liberty to do as he likes, provided that the rights of others are not thereby infringed—that he is not a nuisance to his neighbours. These men, the cause of these complaints, acknowledge no law but the order of their chiefs in London who direct these proceedings, and who are a law to themselves. From my point of view we have failed to get justice in this House, owing to the peculiar conditions under which we were placed. We live in lawless times, said Mr. Baxter, and we live, I must say, in a “flabby” age, when men, knowing the right thing to do, have not the courage of their convictions. But I will not dwell on this. I thank the House for allowing me my protest, which I felt it my duty to make. We have failed to get what we believe to be justice; so we carry our cause to the Court of Appeal where, with no fear of shaking seats, our claims, unmingled with election cries, will have a fair hearing and a wise decision.

(3.40.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I am not disposed to treat too seriously the speech of the hon. and gallant Admiral, nor do I think my Colleagues on the Committee will take to heart anything he has said. But I must point out that the hon. and gallant Gentleman is not justified in saying that Eastbourne has not had fair play, or in making charges against any Member of the Committee. I think he mentioned the hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Round) as being biased in his judgment.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg your pardon. I made no charge against individual Members. I referred to the position of the hon. Member for Harwich, and I said that it was impossible for us to be four on each side.

SIR H. JAMES: The hon. and gallant Admiral seemed to treat us as if we were a portion of his crew and bound to obey his orders. My hon. Friend the Member for Harwich he would reduce to the level of cabin boy. The hon. Member for Harwich had the advantage of having heard the evidence in reference to the Torquay Clause under similar circumstances, and he brought his experience to the investigation of the Eastbourne case. The hon. Member is known for his sound judgment. I can only say in regard to what the hon. and gallant Gentleman has said as to my conduct of the proceedings that I never stopped any counsel without having the full concurrence of the Committee. The hon. and gallant Admiral sat on my right, and I had the advantage of his advice. He acquiesced in the manner in which the counsel were treated, and I think he used the expression “superb” in regard to the conduct of the proceedings. In this respect the Committee acted with perfect unanimity. We had to deal with a very exceptional state of circumstances, and with a Municipality not likely to be impartial in the treatment of those who chose to assemble for the processions—we had it in evidence that the Mayor had said he regarded the Salvation Army as “an atrocious, infamous, and degrading institution”—and that it was desirable to give to that Municipal Body entire discretion in such matters was not the view taken by the Committee. We delegated to them the duty of framing bye-laws, which shall afterwards receive the sanction of the Home Office and be held by an impartial judge to be reasonable before they become valid. That duty will, I hope, be carried out. The Committee, I may say, unanimously deprecated the view that Mr. Booth could break the law if he disapproved of it, and I hope the House does not share the view of the gallant Admiral that the Committee did not act impartially.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Member does not move?

ADMIRAL FIELD: No, Sir.

*(3.48.) MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): The gallant Admiral has objected to my serving on this Committee, because I had served previously on another Committee which dealt with a similar state of things; and I freely confess I may have been bound, to a certain extent, by the decision we came to upon that Committee, but I hope I was not unduly biased. The Home Secretary issued a very full Report of the way in which similar difficulties had been dealt with in various towns; and I can assure the gallant Admiral that it was only when I read this Report, in which the proceedings of the Torquay Committee were referred to, that I remembered I had been a.

Member of that Committee. All the Members of this Committee were then aware of it, and I did not think it incumbent upon me to make any statement in regard to it. The fact that I did not follow in the wake of the gallant Admiral was not simply because I had had a part in the Torquay decision. I came to a conclusion on the evidence before us, and if similar circumstances were to arise I think I should do the same again.

(3.50.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): As one who was outvoted with the gallant Admiral, I must say I regret that my hon. and gallant Friend has criticised the decision of the Committee as unfair. We are not going to try the case again. I only wish to say that though I do not think the decision was a wise one, I do not think it was arrived at unfairly.

Bill to be read the third time.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—

Weights and Measures (Purchase Bill), with an Amendment; Conveyancing and Law of Property Act (1881) Amendment Bill; Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act Amendment Bill; Changed from—Local Authorities (Acquisition of Land) Bill.

QUESTIONS.

INVALID NOMINATIONS FOR GUARDIANS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at the election of Guardians for the Swanlinbar division of Bawnboy Union in March last, Messrs. Veitch and Montgomery were nominated for the office of Poor Law Guardians for the division, and that Mr. Montgomery withdrew before the date of election; and will he inquire whether any voting papers were issued, and, if not, what were the reasons for treating the nominations of Messrs. Veitch and Montgomery as invalid?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The nominations of the Poor Law candidates mentioned were rejected by the Returning Officer as invalid for the reason that their names were jointly included in the nomination papers contrary to Article 10 of the Election Regulations, which provides that the number of candidates to be nominated in any electoral division by any one person entitled to nominate should not exceed the number of Guardians to be elected for such division. The fact that one of the persons irregularly nominated subsequently withdrew his name would not render valid the nomination of the remaining person. The nomination of Mr. Veitch by Mr. Montgomery was rejected as invalid, inasmuch as the latter was not a ratepayer in the electoral division concerned.

OLD DOCKYARD POLICE AND FREE QUARTERS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Joseph Hoar is one of the members of the old Dockyard Police who were transferred to the Metropolitan Police in 1860, and, as such, entitled to free quarters; whether, in 1861, Joseph Hoar was ordered into Government quarters, and for some years had free quarters, but in August and September, 1868, and again from September, 1873, till he was pensioned in September, 1887, a deduction of 2s. 6d. a week was made from his pay; whether, during the period when these deductions were being made, other members of the old Dockyard Police were living in Government quarters free; and whether the amount of such deductions will be returned to Joseph Hoar?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Joseph Hoar was one of the members of the old Dockyard Police who, in common with other members of the Dockyard Force, occupied free quarters up to August, 1868. They were not entitled to free quarters, but as a matter of fact they were not charged any rent for the premises in which they lived. On 22nd August, 1868, Hoar's quarters being required for other purposes, he was removed from them, and had for five years to provide himself with lodgings at his own cost. During that time no deduction was made from his pay. In September, 1873, Hoar was again placed in quarters, and then from the following October a deduction of 2s. 6d. per week, the usual rate according to his rank, was made from his pay in respect of lodging allowance. The regulations fixing this deduction in the case of men who occupied quarters had been made in August, 1868. While these deductions were being made certain members of the old Dockyard Police were for a period still allowed to live in Government quarters free—namely, police who lived on Water Police ships and police engaged in connection with the administration of the Contagious Diseases Acts. This indulgence has now ceased. The amount of the lodging deduction cannot be returned to the ex-constable, and he has been repeatedly told so; and the whole matter has been explained to him in writing, and at a personal interview which he had with the Commissioner himself.

THE CYPRUS TRIBUTE.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can inform the House what is the total amount derived from the taxation of Cyprus which has up to the present date been paid into the British Treasury, and what is the amount which has been paid out of moneys so received on account of the obligations of the French Government under the French guarantee for the payment of the Ottoman Guarantee Loan; what is the amount now standing to the credit of the Cyprus Tribute Fund; and whether the Government have yet matured any plan for the capitalisation of the Cyprus Tribute, or for relieving the island taxpayers of the burden, or for applying the sums now standing to the credit of the Cyprus Tribute?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): It is misleading to say baldly that sums derived from the taxation of Cyprus are paid into the British Treasury. Cyprus as such pays nothing into the British Treasury; but under treaty she is obliged to pay yearly to Turkey about £93,000, representing the average tribute which Turkey drew from the island before it was placed under England. This is an obligation from which Cyprus cannot release herself, and from which England cannot release her. It represents no new charge on the island. It was paid by the island to Turkey under the Turkish rule, and it is paid to Turkey still. It is true that England obtains an incidental benefit from the arrangement. England and France guaranteed the Turkish Loan of 1855. Turkey does not pay from her own resources the interest of that loan. England and France must, therefore, pay the interest themselves, or seize the revenues which Turkey gave as security for the loan, or England must detain the money which Cyprus pays through her to Turkey. The duty of the British Government was clear in the matter. It was to act on the third of these alternatives. The tribute is nearly £93,000 a year. Of this £82,000 is applied to meet the interest of the loan jointly guaranteed by England and France. The surplus amount standing to the credit of the Cyprus Tribute is now £77,000, which we consider due to the Sinking Fund of the Turkish Loan, which Turkey does not provide. No plan such as the hon. Member describes has been matured, and, indeed, could not be matured without the consent of Turkey.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the figures showing the whole amount of the Cyprus Tribute paid into the Treasury?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether Turkey does anything in return for this £93,000 to benefit the people who have to pay the money?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir, nothing at all. It is an arrangement by treaty made when Cyprus was taken over by this country, but I may say that the grants in aid to Cyprus made by this country would form a large set-off against the money which Cyprus has had to pay to Turkey. My hon. Friend will see that if he multiplies the annual amount by the number of years it has been paid, he will easily be able to arrive at the gross amount paid, not to the British Treasury as he said, but to Turkey as interest on the Guaranteed Loan.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Should the grants in aid be deducted from the sum mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The grants in aid have nothing to do with the tribute. It is due to Turkey, not to England. The grants in aid have been for the assistance of the island finances.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: The right hon. Gentleman cannot state the total amount?

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is simply a multiplication of the figures I have given.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: By how many years?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have not it in mind just now. I will give it if my hon. Friend cannot otherwise ascertain.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): Are any negotiations taking place with the Sublime Porte as to the proposed conversion?

*MR. GOSCHEN: There have been none for some years.

THE HON. P. G. NUGENT AND THE IRISH MAGISTRACY.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has been directed to the case of the Hon. Patrick Greville Nugent, who was tried at the Sessions House, Clerkenwell, on Thursday, 12th May, for assaulting a young lady in a railway carriage, and was sentenced by Sir Peter Edlin to six months' imprisonment with hard labour, in view of the fact that Mr. Nugent is a J.P. and D.L. for the County Westmeath?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed he has been removed from those positions by the Lord Chancellor.

BALLYMORE POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain why letters and newspapers posted at Mullingar at 9 p.m. are not delivered at Ballymore, eight miles distant from the former town, until the second day following; whether the letters and papers for Ballymore carried by the limited mail (Irish and English) leaving Broadstone at 7.40 a.m. are not delivered in Ballymore until the following morning, owing to the fact that those letters and papers are detained at Moate, five miles distant from Ballymore, until the next morning; whether the Secretary to the General Post Office, Dublin, has received a memorial from the people of Ballymore complaining of the great inconvenience and annoyance caused by the delay in forwarding their letters brought to Moate by the limited mail, and whether he will inquire into this grievance with the object of having it removed?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Letters and newspapers for Ballymore posted at Mullingar at 9 p.m. would be just too late for the same night's mail. If posted before 8.45 p.m., they would be forwarded at once, and delivered next morning. Letters included in the morning mail from Broadstone are sent on as far as Moate, which is the post town for Ballymore; but they are not despatched to their destination the same day, because there is only one mail a day—in the early morning—to Ballymore. The question of establishing a second mail in the day has been considered; but it is found that the revenue from the letters would not warrant the expenditure involved.

TELEGRAPH FACILITIES AT BALLYMORE.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the inhabitants of Ballymore, County Westmeath, have memorialised the Secretary of the General Post Office, Dublin, to open a postal telegraph station in that town; whether, as the telegraph wires are laid into Moate, five miles from Ballymore, the expense of connecting the two towns by telegraph could be carried out at little cost, as the business done at Ballymore would be considerable; and whether he would recommend that a telegraph station should be opened there?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Inquiry has been made both here and in Ireland, but it cannot be found that any memorial has been received from the inhabitants of Ballymore for an extension of the telegraph to that place. I will call for reports on the question of establishing a telegraph office there, and will let the hon. Member know the result.

THE STATUTES OF 1882.

MR. WILLIAM H. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the official edition of the Statutes, passed in the year 1882, is now out of print; whether this is the case with any, and what, other volumes of the Statutes published within recent years; when may the issue of the new edition be expected; when will the official edition of the Statutory Rules and Orders, made in the year 1891, be published; and whether any provision can be made to secure the publication of these annual volumes early in the year?

MR. MATTHEWS: No official edition of the Statutes of 1882 was published. The first edition of Statutes published officially was of the year 1887. Since that time the only volume out of print is that of the year 1888. A reprint of this was ordered in December last, and will shortly be ready for issue. The final corrected proof of the Statutory Rules and Orders, made in the year 1891, and the type were destroyed in the recent fire on the premises of Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode. In consequence, the editor has been compelled to do much of the work a second time, and the book has to be entirely reset, but the work will be published as soon as possible. The Statute Law Revision Committee have made arrangements which it is hoped will result in the annual volumes appearing as early in the year as is consistent with their comprising all the Rules and Orders issued up to the last day of the preceding year.

MEDICAL OFFICERS IN INDIA.

SIR G. HUNTER (Hackney, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the advantages conferred on the Medical Staff by Royal Warrant, dated 7th August, 1891, as regards rank and title, pay and allowances, have been extended to India; will he explain why, in that country, the pay and allowances of Surgeon-Captains for the first five or six years of their service are only those of subalterns, and why the rank of Brigade Surgeon, created in 1879, has hitherto been financially ignored so far as India is concerned; and what principle has been adopted in fixing the rate of pay of Medical Officers in India with reference to the rates adopted at home?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The advantages of the Royal Warrant have been extended to India; it made no change in the pay and allowances of the Medical Staff. When the relative rank of the medical services was altered and the grade of Brigade Surgeon introduced by the Royal Warrants of 1879-80, the Secretary of State for India explicitly declined to sanction any increased charge on the revenues of India by reason of those Warrants, and the present Secretary of State has no intention of departing from that decision. The rates of pay are based partly on rank and partly on length of service, but have no direct relation to the rates in force at home, nor do they vary with any variation of those rates.

LARNE WORKHOUSE.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) (for Mr. McCARTAN, Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland with reference to the Report of Colonel Spaight on the state of the Larne Workhouse, whether he is aware that nothing has yet been done to provide proper assistance for the infirm nursing; and whether, considering that there is an average number of seventy inmates in the infirmary there, he will advise the appointment of a paid assistant instead of depending on pauper assistants, who leave so often that they cannot be relied on?

MR. JACKSON: The objections of the Local Government Inspector referred to do not appear to have been against the employment of inmates of this Union in assisting the infirm nursing; but against these assistants being taken away from work in the laundry except when they could be conveniently spared. In the week ended the 7th inst., there were fifty-seven patients in the infirmary. It is the usual practice in workhouses in Ireland that the inmates that are capable of doing so should afford assistance to the paid nurses, and there does not appear to be anything in the circumstances of the Larne Workhouse which would render it necessary for the Local Government Board to interfere with the discretion of the Guardians in this matter.

THE KEW BULLETIN.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to continue the publication of the Kew Bulletin, and if so, why it has been temporarily suspended; and what is the net annual cost to the nation of this publication?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): It is the intention of the Government to continue the publication of the Kew Bulletin, which we believe is much valued by many persons both in this country and the colonies. The delay in the issue of this month's number was due to some temporary difficulties, but it will, I hope, be regularly brought out in future. There is at present a small annual loss of about £30 a year on the publication of the Bulletin.

BALLINAMORE POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has taken into consideration a memorial, signed by Mr. Philip M'Gauran on behalf of a committee of traders in Ballinamore, with reference to the postal service to that town; and whether he will state the result of such consideration?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The memorial referred to has been considered, and it has been decided to establish a day mail service to Ballinamore, as desired, by means of the Cavan, Leitrim and Roscommon Light Railway.

INSPECTION OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES IN BELTURBET.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that there has been no inspection of weights and scales in Belturbet for two years; and whether he will consent to the appointment of an ex-officio inspector of weights and measures in that town?

MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary Authorities report that arrangements have been in progress to fill the vacancy for an ex-officio inspector of weights and measures at Belturbet. A properly qualified constable has been already selected, and the appointment will, it is expected, be made in a few days.

PROPOSED PIER AT FAIRNBOY BAY.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken to carry out the presentment of the Grand Jury of the County of Clare, to erect a pier at Fairnboy Bay, for the benefit of the local fishermen; and when will the necessary works be commenced and prosecuted to completion?

MR. JACKSON: The matter referred to is not under the control of the Executive Government; but the Secretary to the Grand Jury reports that the erection of the pier was given to a contractor at last Assizes, who is proceeding with the work, and hopes to have it finished in about two months.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH LOUISBURG.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin County, S.) (for Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN, Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a resolution of the Westport Board of Guardians, impressing upon him the importance of having the town of Louisburg, the nearest town to the best fishing grounds on the Mayo coast, connected by telegraph with the Irish and English markets, and urging him to use his influence with the Congested Districts Board to assist in supplying the necessary local guarantee to the Post Office; and whether, having regard to the extreme over- the Westport Union and its inability to bear any additional local burden, he will make a representation to the Congested Districts Board upon the subject?

MR. JACKSON: The proposed telegraph extension to Louisburg is a matter for the consideration of the Postmaster General, and appears to have been dealt with by him in reply to a question put by the hon. Member on 2nd inst. I am not aware of circumstances having been brought before the Congested Districts Board which would justify them in guaranteeing the proposal which would seem to involve a sum estimated at £62 a year.

PROMOTION OF RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the rule for promotion from a lower to a higher class of Resident Magistrates; why Messrs. Holt Waring, J. C. Gardner, W. J. Paul, F. B. Henn, and N. L. Townshend were promoted over the heads of numerous other officials of greater seniority; and why Mr. J. B. Irwin was promoted from twenty-eighth in the second class to the first class?

*MR. JACKSON: The general rule bearing on promotions has been already stated more than once in this House, and I would refer the hon. Member to a reply given to the hon. Member for East Clare, who put a question on this subject on 26th March, 1888. The promotions referred to in the second paragraph were made by the Lord Lieutenant after a full consideration of the public claims and qualifications of the gentlemen mentioned; and as regards the gentleman referred to in the last paragraph, with but few exceptions—and nearly all of these approaching the age limit when they could retire—those on the list above him had only two years' more service as Resident Magistrates, while he had twenty-two years' previous public service as a Constabulary officer. Successive Governments have laid down the rule, and it has been recognised by almost every Department of the public service, that seniority is only to be taken into account where other claims are equal, and, failing such equality, preference is to be given to merit and capacity.

Sir T. Esmonde

REGISTRATION OF HOLDINGS IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that on purchasers under the Land Purchase Acts applying to the Clerk of the Crown and Peace for the registration of their holdings under the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891, they receive in some cases a notification that they must employ a solicitor to make the application; whether it was the intention of the framers of that Act that any costs should be incurred by owners in connection with first compulsory registration; whether the Rules made under the Act fix a scale of costs by which the solicitor's fee in the simplest cases is to be £2 2s., being more than the annual payment made to the Land Commission by many cottier purchasers; and whether he will consider the possibility of prescribing a simple form of application for those cases where there has been no change of ownership since the vesting orders were made by the Land Commission, and directing the Clerks of the Crown to supply such forms to intending applicants free of charge?

MR. MADDEN: I have not yet received a Report on the subject; but I am making the necessary inquiries.

CORK POOR LAW ELECTIONS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board have yet fixed the date for holding the sworn inquiry into the election of the several members of the Cork Board of Guardians alleged to have been returned by the forgery of proxy votes; whether he is aware that certain candidates who were defeated in the last election are prepared to prove wholesale forgery of votes against persons who were elected, and that delay in holding the inquiry may result in some of the alleged forgers absconding, and thus defeat the ends of justice; and whether, under all the circumstances, he will cause the inquiry to be held at once?

*MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Inspector has been already instructed to hold inquiries in four other cases of disputed Poor Law elections. So soon as these are closed the cases referred to in this question will be investigated.

ERASMUS SMITH'S ENDOWMENTS.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a draft scheme has been submitted to the Lord Lieutenant by the Educational Commissioners which proposes that Erasmus Smith's funds shall be managed by a neutral or mixed Governing Body, and that the benefits of the endowments should be available for all religious denominations; whether, while this draft scheme, altering the founder's basis, has been endorsed by Judge O'Brien Monsignor Molloy, President of the Roman Catholic University, and Professor Dougherty, a majority of the Commissioners, it has been strongly objected to by Lord Justice Fitzgibbon and Dr. Traill, the other Commissioners; and whether, considering that Erasmus Smith, who founded the school in 1682, declared his end to be the propagation of the Protestant faith, he will recommend to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant to withhold his sanction from the scheme?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the draft scheme for the future government and management of the Erasmus Smith Endowments, as published on the 14th inst., proposes that the endowments shall be managed by a neutral or mixed Governing Body, and that the benefits shall be available for all religious denominations. The draft scheme has been prepared by the three Commissioners named in the question. Lord Justice Fitzgibbon has stated that he cannot, as at present advised, accept the scheme as drafted, and Dr. Traill strongly objects to it. For a period of two months after the publication of the draft, objections and amendments may be lodged with the Commissioners. At the expiration of this period it will become the duty of the Judicial Commissioners to hold a public inquiry at which to consider the objections and amendments submitted, and thereupon, if they think fit, they may frame a scheme in such form as they deem expedient, and submit it for the approval of the Lord Lieutenant in Council.

IMPRISONMENT OF CAPTAIN JONES AT HAMBURG.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government are aware of the circumstances under which Captain W. Jones, a British subject, is now kept imprisoned by the authorities of Hamburg; whether he is aware that the ship of which he was master capsized while being towed to the docks at Hamburg for repairs; that at the time of the accident the ship was in the charge of Captain Potter, the representative of the owners; that Captain Potter has since absconded, and Captain Jones, who was not responsible for the accident, has been put into prison in his place; and that the owners have offered a thousand pounds as bail for Captain Jones's appearance, but that the offer has been rejected; and whether, under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government can make any representations which may lead to the immediate release of Captain Jones on bail or otherwise?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The facts referred to in the right hon. Gentleman's question have been communicated to the Foreign Office. It is impossible at present to say whether any ground exists for diplomatic representation, as the case seems to have been dealt with by the competent legal tribunals. The Consul General at Hamburg has been instructed to inquire and report upon the matter.

THE PATENT OFFICE JOURNAL.

MR. JAMES ELLIS (Leicestershire, Bosworth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what number of copies of the Illustrated Journal of the Patent Office was sold in 1891?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The number of copies of the Illustrated Journal of the Patent Office issued to subscribers in 1891 was 25,428, and the number otherwise sold in the same year—as far as can be ascertained without an examination of each daily voucher — was 16,250, making a total of nearly 42,000 copies sold during the year.

THE SHANNON FISHERS AND THE CONSERVATORS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is yet in a position to state how the Government propose to deal with the Limerick Fisheries Conservators' bailiff who shot two fishermen named Cronin and M'Inerney on the River Shannon on the 8th instant; and whether an inquiry will be held into the management of the fisheries and the composition of the Board of Conservators?

*MR. JACKSON: As I have already stated, legal proceedings against the Inspector and Water Bailiffs are pending. The inquiry in regard to the proposed use of enlarged nets on the Shannon will be held by the Fishery Inspectors as soon as practicable. They have no power to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Conservators, which is regulated by Statute.

CAPITATION GRANT TO IRISH SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. BYRNE (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Excise and Customs grant of £78,000 to the national school teachers for the year ended 31st March, 1892, has yet been divided; whether he can state the amount of the capitation grant per head, and, if it has not yet been divided, what is the cause of the delay; and can he state when it will be distributed?

*MR. JACKSON: The grant of £78,000 to the national school teachers of Ireland has been long since distributed, except in a few cases where the circumstances do not render it possible to yet pay the teachers, and except with regard to the payments to the Poor Law Guardians which are proceeding. The amount of the capitation distributed amongst the teachers was at the rate of three shillings and fourpence per child in average daily attendance.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

DESPATCH OF LETTERS FROM KNOCKANANNA.

MR. BYRNE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the exact financial position of the post office at Knockananna, County Wicklow; the amount of income accruing from its working; the weekly wages paid to the messenger; and if it is working at a loss, what guarantee would be required from the residents of Knockananna to save the Department from loss and pay the messenger seven shillings a week for calling every day at 5 p.m. and carrying the mails to meet the 6 p.m. post at Hacketstown?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: There is no post office at Knockananna, but a wall box is provided in which letters can be posted for despatch to Hacketstown in the morning. The messenger who delivers the letters receives 5s. a week, or £13 a year, and the revenue falls short of this expense by £1 11s. a year. Assuming that the messenger would be willing to make a collection of letters at Knockananna at 5 p.m. for wages of seven shillings instead of five shillings a week—which is very doubtful—the payment to be made under a guarantee would be £5 4s. 3d. for the first year.

EARLY OPENING OF KEW GARDENS.

MR. EDWARD HOLDEN (Walsall): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will explain why Kew Gardens are not open to the public until 12 noon, and whether there is any sufficient reason, and, if so, what and why, such places should not be opened some hours earlier; and in view of the fact that the official Guide to the Arboretum and Botanical Gardens at Kew has been for some years out of print, that plans are issued and sold containing reference to this Guide, that daily inquiries are made for it, will he state what steps have been taken either for a reprint or new edition?

*MR. PLUNKET: The reason why Kew Gardens are not open to the public until noon is that the earlier hours are regarded as a time set apart for students, but anyone desiring admission for scientific, artistic, or pro-professional purposes can easily obtain an order from the Director. A new edition of the Guide is now nearly ready, and will be issued, we hope, in the course of the summer. It had become necessary to practically re-write it, for the purpose of making additions to it.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): The right hon. Gentleman gave a precisely similar answer about fourteen months ago.

*MR. PLUNKET: About the Guide?

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Yes.

*MR. PLUNKET: Well, I hope the hon. Member who asks the same question now will be more fortunate.

NEW POSTAL ORDER REGULATIONS.

MR. EDWARD HOLDEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will take the opinion of the commercial community before he finally decides is he aware of the great number of names that are incorrectly written in these postal orders; and how does he propose to get over this difficulty if he enforces this new regulation?

“that postal orders shall not in future be paid even through a bank unless the name of the payee be first inserted in the body of the document”;

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Persons purchasing postal orders are required under the Postal Order Act to insert in the body of the order the name of the payee before parting with the order. And as it has been found that stolen postal orders have been negotiated through bankers, it has become necessary to call the attention of purchasers of postal orders to the rule. It follows that the Post Office cannot pay postal orders presented by bankers unless the rule has been complied with. The rule that postal orders presented for payment by bankers need not be receipted by the payees has not been altered. The correct spelling of the name is not so important as the clue obtained. There is no such difficulty as that anticipated in the last paragraph; and no expression of feeling on the subject could warrant a continued neglect of a statutory requirement.

MR. HOLDEN: Will the new regulations stop these postal orders being passed from hand to hand?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, the new regulations will prevent their being passed from hand to hand. And I am bound to point out that it was objected to the introduction of postal orders by the skilled officers that an increase in the number of stolen letters would be occasioned; but those who advocated the introduction urged that the insertion of the name of the payee, compelling the thief to commit an act of forgery in order to realise the value, would have a deterrent effect. The provision was much discussed in the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) on 22nd July, 1880, said—

“There was one most important condition . . . with regard to the insertion of the name of the payee, and that insertion was most important in two points of view—first of all in providing a security against forgery, because as they knew very well from an enormous experience in the transmission of railway dividends, the forgery of signatures was generally regarded as a most serious matter indeed; and, second, as preventing the instrument from becoming an instrument of currency.”

The practice of sending orders in blank has become so common that a measure to enforce the Act of Parliament is regarded as a grievance; but the cases of forgery and fraudulent negotiation of postal orders have amounted in a single year to 2,326, in many of which not one but many orders have been stolen, and in that year thirty-six persons in the service were convicted of stealing or negotiating such orders, as well as several not in the service. The growth of such cases has been constant and enormous. Moreover, it is well known that in order to get at letters containing postal orders a large number of other letters are stolen and destroyed.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): May I ask what will prevent postal orders being passed from hand to hand if the name is written in?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Well, Sir, postal orders are not to be negotiable, and as long as they are not drawn by the person whose name is inserted there must be a great risk of theft.

PETROLEUM IN THE SUEZ CANAL.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can say whether the Government experts, who advised the British directors when the regulations for transport of petroleum in bulk through the Suez Canal were under the consideration of the Company, acquainted themselves, by personal observation, with the exceptional conditions and circumstances under which this traffic must, if permitted, be conducted?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I am not sure that I understand what the hon. Member means by "personal observation." If the hon. Member means to inquire whether the Inter-departmental Committee visited the Suez Canal as a Committee, the answer is in the negative, although several of the members of it are well acquainted with the locality. The members of the Committee, whose names I gave to the hon. Member on Monday last, are well acquainted with the conditions required for the carriage of petroleum in bulk, and with the circumstances under which it would be carried through the Suez Canal.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) (for Sir R. TEMPLE, Worcester, Evesham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have communicated, or will communicate, to the Egyptian Government, the protest made by a body of British ship-owners in respect to the provisional regulations which propose to permit the transport of petroleum in bulk through the Suez Canal, together with the Reports of Sir Frederick Abel and Mr. Boverton Redwood, in reference to the safeguarding of the Canal against interruption from possible explosions?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The Suez Canal is not under the direction of the Egyptian Government, but of an independent Company, with whose decisions, so long as they are in accordance with their charter, the Egyptian Government have no power of interference. No object would, therefore, be served in approaching the Egyptian Government on the subject. The protest and the Reports referred to have been transmitted to the British directors of the Company.

THE DIFFERENCE IN MAGISTRATES' DECISIONS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (for Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM, Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been drawn to the decision of the Magistrate of the Southwark Police Court, given on 4th November, 1891, by which, under Statute 6 & 7 Vic., c. 86, s. 33, he fined a conductor in the service of the London General Omnibus Company for allowing "a person beside himself to ride on the steps and in the place provided for him," contrary to the Statute; also to the decision of the Magistrate at the Marlborough Street Police Court, on 19th February, 1892, dismissing the summons issued under the same section of the same Statute, 6 & 7 Vic., c. 86, s. 33, against a conductor of the London Omnibus Carriage Company, and characterising the summons as a "vexatious proceeding," and fining the plaintiffs £2 2s.; and also to the refusal of a summons by the Magistrate at Bow Street Police Court for the same offence, under the same section of the same Statute, on Saturday, 27th February, 1892; and is there any authority, other than that of an expensive reference to a Superior Court, such as that of the Secretary of State, or the Law Officers of the Crown, or the Chief Magistrate at Bow Street, to which an appeal might be made in these different interpretations of the law, so as to bring them into uniformity of practice and action?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Chief Magistrate that the different decisions which appear to have been given by Magistrates in the several cases referred to by the hon. Member were not produced by any difference of opinion among the Magistrates as to the law, but depended upon a considerable difference in the facts. The Chief Magistrate also informs me that in practice, when there is a difference of opinion among the Magistrates upon a point of law, the matter is brought before all the Magistrates at the next quarterly meeting, and in almost all cases a uniformity of action is arrived at as a result of the discussion which takes place.

ADMIRALTY CONTRACT FOR SERGE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (for Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he can state the date of the expiry of the contract for serge with Messrs. John Berry and Sons?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham) (who replied): The Admiralty at the present time has no contract with Messrs. John Berry and Sons.

WEXFORD MAIL SERVICE.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (for Mr. THOMAS HEALY, Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if his attention has been drawn to a reply given to a deputation by the late Mr. Raikes, when he admitted that the Wexford commercial community had a substantial grievance in the inefficiency of their mail service, and promised to attach a sorting van to the mid-day mail train, and also to recommend the Treasury to grant a certain sum for the acceleration of said train; and if any steps have since been taken to fulfil the latter part of this promise?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The late Postmaster General, I am informed, did express himself as desirous of accelerating the day mail train to and from Wexford, but the negotiations with the Railway Company were unsuccessful. By sorting the letters on the way, and revised arrangements for the delivery in Wexford, a considerable improvement has been effected; but for an acceleration of the speed of the mail trains, the Railway Company ask a payment far in excess of what the receipts would justify.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN IRELAND.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that representations signed by ratepayers of the following five electoral divisions, Borris in Ossory, Clonmore, Errill, Moneenalassa, Rathsaren, and Templebarry were lodged with the Roscrea Board of Guardians for the erection of twenty-three labourers' cottages; that in March last the said Board by a majority, which was chiefly made up of ex-officio Guardians decided on only building four new cottages, giving as the only reason for rejecting the other nineteen "that the owners of the land from whom the sites were proposed to be taken objected"; and whether, considering that thirteen of these cottages have been condemned by the medical sanitary officers as unfit for human habitation, the Local Government Board will, under the powers conferred on them by Section 4 of the Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1891, instruct their Inspector, when holding an inquiry into the four which have already been passed by the Roscrea Board, to also hold a local inquiry concerning the nineteen cottages which the said Guardians have rejected?

*MR. JACKSON: The facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the question. The Local Government Board have no information as to the names of the Guardians who voted in the majority. But in no case does the ground for rejecting a cottage as recorded on the Minutes correspond with that quoted in the question, and the case of each cottage was considered separately. The Local Government Board are unable to say whether thirteen of the existing cottages have been condemned. No complaints have been received by the Local Government Board from the persons who signed the representations rejected by the Guardians. In the absence of such complaint, they are not in a position to consider the suggestions in the last paragraph.

CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE CLERKS AND WHIT MONDAY.

MR. PINKERTON (for Mr. McCARTAN): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will give instructions that clerks in the Central Telegraph Office due to return from annual leave on Whit Monday, 6th June, shall be allowed to resume duty on Tuesday, 7th June, the Bank Holiday being added to their annual leave?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Central Telegraph Office is not closed on Whit Monday. All, therefore, that can be done is to let as many as possible be off duty on that day, and to give to those who are not off duty a holiday on some other day, or else double pay. The question who shall take Whit Monday as a holiday is determined by ballot, and the balloting takes place before they leave for their holidays. It follows, therefore, that to let those who are due to return on that day absent themselves until the day following would give them an undue advantage over others.

LICENSING OF MILITIA CANTEENS.

Mr. FELL PEASE (York, W.R., Cleveland): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office under what rules or regulations special licences are granted by special permit from the War Office for keeping canteens while the Militia is training; if such canteens are permitted to be open on Sundays; and on whose application one has been granted at Redcar?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): A canteen is licensed by the Local Authorities after the sanction of the Secretary of State has been obtained. A canteen so licensed should only be opened on Sundays during the usual hours; and no application has been made to the War Office as regards Redcar. These remarks do not apply to a canteen formed by a regiment for its own use, which does not require any special authority or licence.

SHOOTING OF HOMING PIGEONS.

Mr. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the systematic shooting of homing pigeons, often very valuable birds, and if he is aware that in many places the police do not render assistance in protecting such pigeons, deeming it no portion of their duty; and if he will give such instructions as will cause the police throughout the country to take the same interest in the protection of homing pigeons as in the preservation of partridges and pheasants?

Mr. MATTHEWS: No, Sir, I have no information to support the statements in the first paragraph of the question, or which calls for any official Circular to be addressed to Local Authorities. It is not for me but for the Local Authorities to give instructions, if any be required, to the police, who are under their control.

FREDERICK HUMPHREYS' VACCINATION CASE.

Mr. LOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that, at the Bye Petty Sessions, held on the 30th December, 1891, Frederick Humphreys was fined 10s. and costs for not having had his child vaccinated, which fine and costs he paid under protest, as he had not been served with a notice since a previous conviction for the same offence; and, as the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court has decided that a second conviction without a second notice is illegal, will he order the convicting justices to return to Frederick Humphreys the fine and costs imposed?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir, I am aware of the circumstances of the case to which the hon. Member refers. I presume that the hon. Member, when he speaks of a notice, means the fresh order which the Queen's Bench Division has decided must be made each time before proceedings are taken. This decision of the High Court was not given until February last; and previous decisions of the High Court supported the view which was generally taken by magistrates, and was followed in Humphreys' case. I do not see any way to re-opening cases decided before the decision in "Reg. v. Pink."

THE CLAREMORRIS AND COLLOONEY RAILWAY.

Mr. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if an arrangement has yet been arrived at between the Government and the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company, in reference to the finishing and working of the Claremorris and Collooney line; and, if not yet, will he say if there be any likelihood or possibility of perfecting the proposed contract with that line?

Mr. JACKSON: I understand the agreement has been signed between the Treasury and the Company.

Sir J. Fergusson

BARRACKS IN IRELAND.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if the Government, in pursuance of their new policy, have yet succeeded in purchasing building ground in Londonderry on which to build the proposed new barracks; if so, will he state the cost of purchase per acre, and the whole amount; and how that price compares with the cost at which ground might have been obtained in Enniskillen?

MR. BRODRICK: The ground required in Londonderry has not been purchased, so I fear I can give no information as to the price.

MR. JORDAN: The Government never intended to purchase this land for the use of barracks.

MR. BRODRICK: This arrangement was made on military grounds, and the intention of the Government was to purchase land in the most desirable position.

MR. JORDAN: Does the hon. Member know what is the upset price in Enniskillen?

MR. BRODRICK: I cannot answer that question at all.

AFFAIRS IN UGANDA.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the two Reports from Captain Lugard to the British East Africa Company, regarding Uganda, which have been promised to the House, will be presented; and whether Her Majesty's Government have any information, subsequent to the date of Captain Lugard's Reports, bearing on the troubles reported to have existed in Uganda, which they can communicate to the House? And I should also like to ask him whether, as I hope he is, he is in a position to contradict a statement which has appeared in the papers this morning, reporting a sanguinary conflict between Protestants and Catholics, in which the Protestants are reported to have used rifles supplied to them by the agent of the Company?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I have not seen the report to which the right hon. Gentleman refers. I presume it comes from the same source as former reports of the same character, a source which I described last week in reply to a question addressed to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). We have had no information through the English sphere of influence from Uganda since the time of the outbreak of the troubles in Uganda, which, I believe, occurred about the end of January. The last reliable information from Uganda is of the 8th January, on which date Mr. Gibson left the place. He has now arrived at the coast with a small number of Egyptian refugees and followers. A week before Mr. Gibson's departure from Uganda Captain Lugard had returned there. He had fallen in with Selim Bey and one thousand of the troops formerly under Emin Pasha. The troubles at Uganda seem to have occurred at the end of January, and with regard to them we have at present no reports. The reports referred to in the first paragraph of the question together with other papers will, it is hoped, be laid on the Table next week.

THE COLOUR VISION REPORT.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E., for Sir H. Roscoe, Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Report of the Colour Vision Committee of the Royal Society has been received; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; I have received the Report, and will at once present it.

THE JURIES ACT.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the circumstances of the repeal of the 22nd section of the Juries Act, 1870, and to the great inconvenience and expense which petit jurors have to incur, he will introduce a Bill to provide for their remuneration?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The matter is receiving the attention of the Government, with every desire to recognise this as a just grievance which requires consideration. As to the amount involved as a charge on the Exchequer I cannot say, and it is impossible to deal with this matter by legislation in the course of the present Session.

DANGERS IN THE RIVER FERGUS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the fact that the Irish Board of Works have issued a notice cautioning mariners when entering or leaving the River Fergus that, a breach through which the tide flows having been made in the Clare slob embankment, vessels coming within the influence of the current are liable to be drawn through the breach or to be stranded on the opposite shore, whether he is aware the Clare Castle Harbour Trustees have repeatedly since 26th January last called the attention of the Board of Works to the dangerous condition of the river, owing to this breach, without any attention having been paid to their representation; and what action is intended to be taken to secure the safe navigation of the river?

SIR J. GORST: The terms of the notice cautioning mariners are given in the question. The Board of Works are advised that they can take no further steps than issue the notices referred to.

MR. COX: Will the Government take any action at all with respect to this matter, or as to the navigation of this river, the obstruction in which is entirely owing to the blundering and incapacity of the Irish Board of Works?

SIR J. GORST: I think the hon. Member takes an unnecessarily strong view of this matter. It is only a current against which mariners are warned.

MR. COX: I do not think I take an exaggerated view of the case. The notice says that vessels are liable to be drawn into the breach or stranded on the opposite shore.

SIR J. GORST: I think the hon. Member does exaggerate the importance of the affair.

SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): On Question 21, Mr. Speaker, I had a supplementary question to the Chief Secretary; but as my hon. Friend has not put the question, I suppose according to your ruling on a previous occasion, the supplementary question is out of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when, in view of the unusual arrear in which Supply now is, he proposes to enable the House to discharge its function of reviewing the conduct of the administrative departments by regular opportunities of considering the Estimates? And I hope he will allow me to remind him of what he said in the discussion on the subject on the 12th March as to the importance of discussions of this kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am conscious of the advantage to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I think it is inconvenient to interpose a discussion on the Estimates in the middle of a continuous debate upon legislation. When we have completed the stage of the more advanced Bills with which this House is now concerned we may proceed with Supply, and the hon. Gentleman will be able to discuss anything he desires.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the House will adjourn for the Whitsuntide Recess before or after Derby Day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is somewhat early to ask that question yet. If the hon. Member will put a question to me next week I shall be able to give him an answer. Perhaps it may be for the convenience of the House if I state that to-morrow the House will meet at a quarter past ten for the purpose of receiving the Royal Assent to various Bills that have been passed. I also give notice that to-morrow I shall move that until the conclusion of the Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, the Standing Committee on Law have leave to sit every day during the Sitting, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House.

MOTION.

NAVAL KNIGHTS OF WINDSOR BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the existing constitution of the Naval Knights of Windsor."—(Lord G. Hamilton.)

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I wish the noble Lord would give us some explanation as to this Bill. It is somewhat unusual to bring in a Bill of this kind at this period of the Session, and I hope there is nothing seriously wrong with the constitution of the Knights of Windsor.

LORD G. HAMILTON: This is not a Bill of the first importance; and if the hon. Gentleman will assent to this Motion, I will have a Memorandum attached to the Bill which will give all the information he desires.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Lord G. Hamilton, Mr. Forwood, and Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 359.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPERANNUATION ACTS AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 275.)
COMMITTEE.

(4.40.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I beg to move—

"That the Order for Committee be read, and discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."

This Motion is intended to give effect to an arrangement which was come to on both sides of the House to refer this Bill to the examination of a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order for the Committee on the Superannuation Acts Amendment (No. 2) Bill be read, and discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(4.41.) GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.): If this Bill is referred to a Select Committee I hope the right hon.

Gentleman will take into consideration the hardship that it inflicts upon a certain class of people by certain words which are included in the Bill. They are—

*MR. SPEAKER: The question is as to what tribunal this Bill shall be referred; whether it shall be considered in Committee of the whole House, or whether it shall go to a Select Committee. The merits of the Bill are not under discussion, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman is therefore out of order in discussing the merits of the Bill.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I do not see why this Bill should not be taken in Committee of the whole House. It has already been two nights in Committee, and it was not discussed on the Second Reading at all. It was slipped through, as many Bills are, and we did not know its purport or effect. The moment it came before Committee its real object was discovered, and it was openly charged against the Government that this was not a genuine Superannuation Bill. We think this matter should be brought to the knowledge of the public and not shut up in a Select Committee. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman has got his majority, and he can force a Division, but I think he ought not to alter the course of business in this way. We want this matter openly thrashed out, and not relegated to a Committee, the majority of whom would be paid Ministers, who would be only too glad to assist the right hon. Gentleman in his schemes. You, Mr. Speaker, have already expressed a strong opinion on this practice which is springing up of taking Bills from the Committee of the whole House and referring them to Select Committees. You have said that the practice was unusual, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow this matter to be discussed in a Committee of the whole House.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Perhaps as I made the suggestion that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee I may be allowed to explain my position. The hon. Member is not quite right in saying that the Bill was in Committee two nights. It was only in Committee one night, and hon. Members who were present will recollect that a number of inquiries were put to the Treasury, and some rather discordant answers were given as to the working of the Bill. We were quite at a loss to understand to what class of officers the Bill would extend, and I submitted that as this subject was inquired into two or three years ago by a Royal Commission which was presided over by the hon. Member for Blackpool (Sir M. White Ridley), but this particular question was not raised, there should be a full inquiry into the facts. The First Lord of the Treasury agreed, and I have no doubt the Select Committee will be now composed, not as the hon. Gentleman thinks, but of independent Members of the House. When the Select Committee has examined the matter, it will have to come before a Committee of the whole House, and we shall then have the whole facts before us and know exactly to whom the Bill refers.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I should like to say a few words why I consider that it is not desirable that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Select Committee would not take anything from the power of the House to deal with this Bill afterwards; but whatever doubt there may be as to what is in the Bill, there is no doubt that it will affect Resident Magistrates, because after much pressure we obtained a distinct assurance to that effect from the Secretary to the Treasury. We know for certain that whoever else is affected by this Bill, it affects Resident Magistrates, and that being so I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether there is really at this stage of the Session, and in the present condition of public business, any chance of passing through the House a Bill that proposes to confer benefits which they are not entitled to at present upon gentlemen with whom a large portion of this House is not in sympathy. It is merely fastening upon Members of this House a useless and laborious service which can have no legislative effect, and I hope hon. Members will assist us in resisting this proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

(4.47.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We put the Bill forward in the House rightly or wrongly as a simple measure of justice to a certain number of officials, some of whom undoubtedly are Resident Magistrates. The Bill does not apply to Resident Magistrates as Resident Magistrates, but there certainly are Resident Magistrates to whom it does apply. Our opinion, as I have said, is that this is simply a measure of justice, and the intention is that when the persons affected under this Bill claim a pension, the Treasury should be honourably bound to give it them. If our view is right, this Bill ought to be passed without delay; if our view is wrong, the wrongness of it can be effectively shown before a Select Committee. I submit that a Select Committee is the proper place for the details of the measure to be thrashed out.

(4.48.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): It is perhaps needless to say that there are different views of justice in different quarters of this House, and it is well known that a majority of the Members from Ireland are not disposed to consent to any increase in the emoluments or pensions of the Resident Magistrates without very serious and minute inquiry into the grounds of that proposed increase. Our feeling in regard to the present Motion is that if the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, on which the Irish Members will be but sparsely represented, facilities for effective discussion after the Bill returns will be greatly restricted, because the House is likely to be guided by the decision of the Committee. If this had been a non-contentious Bill, with regard to which there had been a general assent, I should not have objected to the matter being referred to a Select Committee; but the First Lord of the Treasury must admit that a Bill which deals in any way with Resident Magistrates is necessarily contentious in the highest degree. No doubt, however, the question is affected by the fact that after this Committee has dealt with the Bill it will come before a Committee of the whole House; and considering the view expressed by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), and considering the fact that we shall still have an opportunity of dealing with this Bill in Committee of the whole House, I am disposed to advise my colleagues not to prolong this discussion, on one condition. That condition is, that as the only contentious question involved in this Bill relates to officials in Ireland, the Committee should be so constituted as to give special representation to the Irish Members, and that they should not be represented merely according to strict arithmetical proportion. If the Leader of the House is prepared to accept that understanding, which is, I think, reasonable, it would meet our views; otherwise we shall have no security that our views will be brought forward effectively before the Committee.

(4.53.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no right to speak again except by leave of the House, but the hon. Member has addressed a direct question to me. He says that the only contentious point raised in this Bill is one on which the Irish Members feel strongly, and therefore they ought to have exceptional representation on the Select Committee which is to examine into this Bill. I think, in the first place, that is a proposal of an altogether unusual character, and in the second place the subject can be debated quite well in Committee. But it must not be thought that the only controversial matter in the Bill centres round the Resident Magistrates. I recollect that the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) raised very strong objections to that part of the Bill which relates to Indian Civil Servants, and several Members objected to the Bill because they thought it would increase the pensions of Governors in India and elsewhere. Therefore, the hon. Member is not quite right when he says that the objections came only from one quarter. I think the hon. Member will feel that this understanding would form a serious precedent. I hope he will not press it.

Question put.

(4.55.) The House divided:—Ayes 233; Noes 74.—(Div. List, No. 135.)

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND)
BILL.—(No. 174.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(5.8.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I deeply regret that the illness of my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Derry (Mr. J. McCarthy) prevents him submitting to the House the Motion for the rejection of this Bill, of which he first gave notice. The duty has fallen upon me, and I hope that I shall be able to convince any Member of this House, who is disposed to take an impartial view of the principle declared by the Government themselves to be essential to Local Government, as defined in their Bills for England and Scotland, that this Bill should be rejected. I observe with some surprise that the Leader of the House has contented himself with moving the Second Reading of this phenomenal Bill by gesture. I should have thought that this being the stage when the principle of the Bill is at issue the right hon. Gentleman would have chosen the earliest moment for expounding in detail, and defending with energy, the principles and provisions of the Bill. Sir, we have been warned, and the country has been warned, I may say in lurid rhetoric, that if we do not accept this settlement of the case of Ireland and should prefer another Bill which we shortly expect to have before the House, we may look out for horrid war. Considering that the alternative to the acceptance of this Bill, which is presented to our minds, is that the Prime Minister and his allies, wherever they may be found, will take up arms against the future Government of the Queen, I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman at the earliest moment of making this Motion would have thought no energy too great to expend on the task of showing that this Bill, as a settlement of the case of Ireland, should be preferred to any other. However that may be, there is one charge we often make against the Government in this House to which they are not open on this occasion. We have frequently had to charge this Government with rushing Bills in the House of Commons; no one can charge them with attempting to rush this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman is in no unseemly hurry to make progress with the present measure. I cannot call to mind an instance, and I doubt if the most experienced veteran in British politics, the right hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), whose Parliamentary memory runs back for half a century or more, can instance a case where a Government, having introduced the principal measure of the Session in the middle of February, did not ask the House to give it a Second Reading till nearly the end of May. Moreover, Sir, Members of all Parties are allowed to understand that if the Second Reading of this Bill should pass no further progress will be asked. If that be so, we are at the present moment engaged in a questionable use of the time of the House of Commons. I venture to speculate that if the First Lord of the Treasury had his choice this measure would never have come before us. The right hon. Gentleman is the victim of necessity; he bears in mind, and the country bears in mind, that when the Tory Party six years ago went before the electors of Great Britain it was on two particular pledges that they obtained the mandate which called them into power. One was that they would not enact coercion for Ireland; that promise has been broken. The other pledge was that they would give Local Government; that promise has not been kept. The right hon. Gentleman and his Party will presently have to face the electors of the country; and though they may hope to get rid of the effect of one broken promise, they feel that to come before the country with two violated pledges would break the back of any Party. It is under the stress of this imperative pressure, and in order to make a parade and go through the form of appearing to keep the second of these pledges, that this Motion has been made. I have no doubt that if the right hon. Gentleman were not under such imperative pressure the House of Commons would never have been troubled with this Bill. I say so for two reasons: The heads of the Tory Party have taught their followers by repeated lessons that coercion is the right thing, the only thing for the Hottentots of Ireland. The more stalwart Members of the Tory Party, whose minds do not move so rapidly as those of their leaders, fail to see why Ireland should now have anything else. The pupils persist in remembering the lesson which the teachers would have forgotten. There is another reason which besets the Government with peculiar difficulty in regard to this or any scheme of Local Government in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has made coercion the permanent law of Ireland. Elective government, whether local or general, pre-supposes a foundation of civil liberty, and you can no more found a satisfactory or permanent scheme of elective Local Government upon the statutory régime which you have created in Ireland, than you can build a fortress on a swamp. It may be said that there is a lull in the coercive government of Ireland at present. Why is there a lull? Because the Government are living in fear of the electors, because they wish coercion to be forgotten when making an appeal to the country, because they know they enacted coercion in violation of a public pledge, and they are anxious that that pledge and the breach of it should be forgotten. Is there any other reason for a lull except that the Government are in fear of the electors, and desire their coercion régime to be forgotten? Why was the Coercion Act passed? It was passed because landlords wished to obtain fancy prices for their land, because the people established popular organisations to resist the demand, and because evicted farms could not be let. The state of Ireland at the present moment—in spite of official boasts—is in all fundamental aspects exactly the same as when the Coercion Act was passed. The landlords, by individual action or combination, are pressing for exorbitant prices for the land; the people maintain their popular organisations to resist the demand, and evicted farms are not taken. The state of Ireland is the same, from the point of view of the interest of the Tory Party, as in 1887; and I have no doubt, if the Tory Party by any contrivance should win its way back to power, that after the General Election we should return to the régime of 1887, we should resume the interrupted "twenty years of resolute government," we should have proclamations all over Ireland, both ordinary and special; we should have bayonetting, batôning, and, perhaps, shooting in the streets, the dispersion of meetings by force, and the torturing of men to death in prison, as men were tortured in prison a few years ago under the régime of the right hon. Gentleman. We should have Tullamore and Mitchelstown in Ireland over again, with all that those names portend. I ask any hon. Member whether it is conceivable that such a coercive system—in which the fundamental rights of the citizen which are guarded as sacred in every part of Great Britain, the right of a free Press, of public meeting, of association and combination, are held at the mercy of a single official of the Crown—is it conceivable that such a system should work side by side with any system of local self-government in Ireland? I think it is not conceivable. In England and Scotland the County Councils are the masters of the police; in Ireland the police need not hesitate to snub the County Council. If a County Councillor in Ireland addressing his constituents ventured to use language which offended the ears of the Resident Magistrate the police need not hesitate to shoot. Or if a man said that the Standing Joint Committee had brought the business of the county to a dead-lock, or protested against his removal from office by two Justices, on a matter of opinion rather than of law or principle, he might be indicted for conspiracy to intimidate the Standing Joint Committee, or for inciting to a breach of the law. "Local Government and no coercion" was your cry in 1886, and that was at least an intelligible cry; but "Local Government and coercion" is mere nonsense, because Local Government is inconsistent with the idea of coercion, and incompatible with it in practice. But, Sir, for the purpose of this Debate, I am willing to forget for the moment that there is such a question as Home Rule; to ignore the fact that a free Constitution does not exist in Ireland; to imagine that coercion has not been applied to the Irish people, and to found my case on the proposition—which I shall be able to prove—that from the point of view of the Government themselves, and testing the Bill by the principles they have laid down as essential to Local Government, and which they have adopted in England and Scotland, this Bill must be rejected by the House. Our position on the Irish question is well understood; we demand a Legislature for Ireland, and we say that only an Irish Legislature with its knowledge and sympathy can ever fit even the local administration of Irish counties to the interests and necessities of the Irish people. But I will put that aside for the limited purposes of this Debate. Let me now, by two or three instances taken from the Bill, indicate to the House the audacious partisan bias of the measure. The Government propose, while nominally withdrawing all fiscal functions from the Grand Juries, to leave the absolute power of levying upon the county rate compensation for malicious injuries to every Grand Jury in Ireland. These Grand Juries are saturated with social and political prejudices, and we know, by accumulated experience which stands beyond denial, that an Irish Grand Jury thinks any evidence good enough, and no claim for damages too high when the applicant in the case of malicious injury is able to satisfy it that he has made himself obnoxious to the people. I say that to continue to leave that important and delicate function in the hands of a body of a non-judicial and violently partisan character when a general re-settlement of the question is being made, is against common sense. The second instance I give of the partisan spirit of the Bill relates to the treatment that the Government proposes for the Cities of Belfast and Dublin. A remarkable sentence was quoted yesterday which had been used by Mr. Lowe many years ago. He said—

"He could not accompany any proposal for the extension of popular liberty with shabby expedients for taking it away."

This Bill professes to provide for the extension of popular liberty; but it is from beginning to end, an intricate and ingenious network of shabby expedients for rendering it nugatory. How do you deal with the City of Belfast? The general principle of the Bill is that every person qualified to be a Parliamentary elector, and paying the local rate, shall possess the franchise for the purposes of this Bill. You propose that such should be the franchise in every county and every borough with two exceptions. Let me tell you what these exceptions are. You except the Borough of Belfast. Why do you except the Borough of Belfast? In the Borough of Belfast there are thousands of persons who would be enfranchised by the general principle of the Bill, because, although you have passed a special Act for Belfast which renders the municipal franchise in that city wider than in any other city in Ireland, there are in Belfast 70,000 Roman Catholics—one-fourth of the population—who are not permitted to have one representative on the Municipal Council, but are ousted from the civic life of the city by a system of jerry-mandering the wards, and the Government, remembering that, have the audacity to come forward and enact that the franchise of Belfast should continue as at present. Why? Because the Corporation of Belfast at this moment is exclusively Tory; and if you placed Belfast on a level with every other city in Ireland, the Nationalist minority, excluded and outlawed in the civic sense, might find some voice upon it. But you also exclude the City of Dublin. Now, the City of Dublin at this moment has a very exclusive franchise. In Dublin there are 40,000 Parliamentary electors, but only 6,000 or 7,000 burgesses. Will the House believe that in a Bill which affects to give to every Irishman the franchise for municipal affairs on the Parliamentary basis, the Government proposes that in Dublin out of 40,000 Parliamentary electors the municipal electors shall be limited to 6,000. What is the explanation of it? Can any hon. Member suggest a rational explanation? I can find no other reason than this, that the franchise in Belfast, which is not quite so wide as the franchise of the Bill, shall remain in the future as it is at present, in order that the Corporation of Belfast may continue to be a Tory preserve, and that the exclusive franchise in Dublin, admitting only one out of every five of those who would be affected by the Bill, should remain as it is in order that the Tory minority in the Corporation of Dublin may not be disturbed. I ask the House to judge in these two instances whether the spirit of the Bill is a spirit of impartiality or a spirit of common decency in dealing with the affairs of the localities in Ireland. I notice another peculiar circumstance. There is to be a cumulative vote in the counties, and there is to be none in the boroughs. Why does this difference exist? I imagine simply for this cause, that in twenty-eight out of the thirty-two Irish counties, there is a Tory minority, for the interests of which the Government are concerned; and there is only one borough in which the cumulative vote could have a material effect, and that is the City of Belfast. It might have the consequence of allowing the 70,000 outlawed Roman Catholics of that city some voice in the City Council. I commend to the House, and to all impartial Members in it, the question whether a Bill can be regarded as otherwise than a shamelessly partisan Bill which leaves the compensation for malicious injuries in the hands of the Grand Juries, which leaves Belfast and Dublin in their present condition whereas every other borough in Ireland is to have a franchise under the Bill, and which proposes to establish a cumulative vote in the counties where it may affect the Tory minority, and does not apply it to the boroughs, in one of the principal ones of which the City of Belfast, the Nationalist minority is concerned. Now, when I ask what are the principles which should mould this Bill I do not go so far as the famous speech of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill). He said the local government to be given to Ireland should be equal and similar to the local government to be given to England and Scotland. I do not dwell upon the numerous, I may say the innumerable, pledges in that sense and to that effect which have been given by Members of the Party opposite. I go back no further than the Royal Speech at the opening of the present Session. That speech was dictated by the Ministers of the Crown, and for the policy pronounced in that Speech they are responsible to this House. I fix them with that responsibility, and I say that, limiting myself to the view of that responsibility alone, this Bill cannot be accepted. For what does the Government say in the Royal Speech delivered at the opening of the Session? They told the House that proposals would be laid before us for applying to Ireland the general principles affecting local government which have already been adopted in Great Britain. This Bill is the proposal referred to in the Royal Speech; and the question is whether or not this Bill proposes to apply to Ireland the general principles already adopted in Great Britain. What was the first general principle adopted for Great Britain? It was that the franchise of the Bill was withdrawn from no person upon whom the Bill conferred it. The English and Scottish Acts declare that every person qualified to be a Parliamentary elector who pays a local rate shall have a vote on the question of local government; and from no person to whom the franchise has been given has the franchise been withdrawn. But in the case of Ireland, by one of these shabby expedients, you propose to withdraw it from tens of thousands of persons throughout the country who contribute to the rates. How do you do that? You propose that Rule 26 of the Ballot Act shall not apply to elections under this Act. What practical consequence is shrouded in the legal terms of that phrase? That the public officer in Ireland, the presiding officer at the county election, will refuse to take from any voter a declaration of inability to read, and will refuse to mark the voting paper of any elector who comes before him. It comes to this: that in England and Scotland a man who pays his county rate and who is not able to read will be enabled to vote—as I think he ought to be so enabled, because if a man contributes to the county rate the question is not whether the man can read or not; the question is whether, having contributed to the county rate, he has a right in justice and in common sense to enjoy a voice in the matter of the spending of his money; but whilst in England and in Scotland every man who contributes to the rate and is qualified to vote at a Parliamentary election enjoys the vote whether he can read or not, you propose for Ireland that the presiding officer will refuse to mark the paper. More than that, you have established for Ireland such a cumbersome and perplexing franchise, that whereas in England an elector votes for one candidate, and one candidate only, an elector in Ireland will be obliged not only to read, but be able to write and to exercise some arithmetical knowledge, because he will have to divide the vote between the rival candidates and mark his paper accordingly. The practical effect of the proposal of the Government will be this: whereas in England and Scotland every elector will be absolutely free to vote and will be enabled to vote by the action of the presiding officer, you impose upon Ireland an educational test, a novel and special educational test, which extends not only to reading, but also to writing and arithmetic. I protest against the gross injustice of accepting the illiterate where every possible facility has been given for public education, and excluding by a novel educational test tens of thousands of men, contributors to the rates, in a country where public education has been hampered in the first place by the ill-judged character of your primary system there, and in the second place by the poverty of the people. I contend, then, with confidence that the general principles which have been already applied to England and Scotland with respect to the franchise have been violated in this regard with respect to Ireland. What was the second general principle? The constituencies in England and Scotland were defined by Public Bodies, upon rules inserted in the Statutes. The constituencies in Scotland were defined by the Boundary Commissioners, whose names were inserted in the Bill, and were therefore subject to the scrutiny and approval of the House. The constituencies in England were defined in the boroughs by the Corporation, and in the counties by the Quarter Sessions. All these authorities were strictly bound, by rules inserted in the Statute under which they act, to have regard, when fixing a division, to area, to valuation, to the distribution of the people, to the pursuits of the people, to the existence of urban and rural communities, and to equality of population. What course do you pursue in Ireland? Do you appoint Commissioners by the Bill; do you entrust the defining of the constituencies to any Public Body? No, Sir, the Lord Lieutenant, an official of the Tory Party, is to have absolute power in the matter. What will the Lord Lieutenant do? There is not a syllable of direction given to the Lord Lieutenant by the Bill. He is not asked to have regard to area, nor to valuation, nor to the pursuits of the people, nor to the existence of urban and rural communities, nor to equality of population. He is asked to have regard to nothing but his own mere will and pleasure; and what will the Lord Lieutenant do? Of course the Lord Lieutenant will take his telescope, and spy every county and borough for the minority of his friends, and there fix his view—upon any spot where there is a Tory minority. He has the power to say what number of Councillors there shall be for each division; he has the power even to say whether a county shall be divided at all, and he may leave a county undivided if that shall be his pleasure. The next proceeding of the Lord Lieutenant will be to ascertain the number of the minority, and then to fix the divisions with sole regard to the interests of that minority and to no other public interest, and to fix the number of Councillors of that division so that by the highly artificial mode of cumulative vote the minority, whatever it may be in that county shall be assured of representation. I do not object to any fair or rational scheme of representation of the minority in Ireland or any other country. I should be glad to see them represented everywhere; I should be sorry to see them unrepresented anywhere; but I do object, and object with all my force, to placing not in the hands of a Public Body, but in the hands of a Tory official bound by no instruction, as the Public Bodies are in England and in Scotland, but free to act upon his own caprice or upon his sense of the interests of his Party—I do object to placing in his hands a power which will enable,

which will tempt him, which, I may say, will compel him to define all the divisions, and to parcel out the whole of the country, not having regard to the matters I have mentioned, but for the purpose of procuring representation for a simple minority. I submit that by not naming Commissioners or Public Bodies in the Bill to fix the boundaries and divisions, by not giving any instruction as to how the boundaries are to be fixed, and by leaving the question of the divisions of the counties and the representation of each division to the unchecked discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, without any expression upon any of these points which are required in the case of England and Scotland, the second general principle applied to these countries has been set aside. The next general principle applied to England and Scotland is that every elector shall vote for one candidate and no more. Why has that principle been departed from in the case of Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) eulogised it in his speech on the introduction of the Bill as a stupid thing which had been done before. I submit that this is a stupid thing which has not been done before. The cumulative franchise has been applied to one limited matter in this country. It has been applied with dubious and, I think, unsatisfactory results to the Department of primary education; but I have never heard of any attempt to apply this highly cumbrous and perplexing vote to the local administration of any country whatever. I say it is a cumbrous and perplexing vote, not easily apprehended by the mass of the people, and I protest that you should not make such an experiment in Ireland when you have not made it in England or Scotland, and that you should not make it in pursuit of an illusory idea. I say you are proposing to apply this cumulative franchise in pursuit of an illusory idea, for in three parts of Ireland—and I speak I may say from personal knowledge—the minority of the friends of the Government is so slight that the most ingenious and artificial mode of voting which you may devise will have no material effect; and in the other fourth part of Ireland the relative strength of the two parties is such that you will achieve no other effect by the most complicated system of cumulative voting than you could have achieved with simplicity and ease by any fair division of the counties. The next general principle refers to the management of the police. In England and in Scotland the principle has been applied that an essential part of elective local government is the management of the police. In England and in Scotland by your Acts the County Councils are masters of the police; in Ireland unquestionably the police will be the masters of the County Councils. What was said in the Debate on the introduction of the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means? That the scheme of this Bill is a scheme of transfer of power from one Local Authority to another; and he said the police in England had been subject to the Local Authority, and the police in Ireland are not. Well, the police in England have been subject to the Justices, the Justices are appointed and removable by the Crown, and I should say that the police in that way were subject to the Imperial authority. But, however that may be, there is a proposal in the English Act to transfer to the County Councils under certain conditions all the powers of any Department of State, and even of Her Majesty in Council. I say, therefore, there is nothing that I have seen in the general principle of your legislation to prevent the transfer of the control of the management of the police to the Local Authorities in Ireland. You may say the localities contribute to pay the police in England. They do; but if you exact excessive revenue from Ireland, and if you choose to apply a million and a half of that revenue every year to paying the police, I say that every penny of the money that pays the Irish police is Irish, and that the particular form or mode—whether you levy that money by way of Imperial taxation or by way of local rates—cannot enter into the question. By right the localities in Ireland ought to have, if not a decisive voice, at least a share in the management of that money; and I submit that not even for a moment can a scheme of Local Government for Ireland be considered by Irish Members as an acceptable basis for dealing with that question which ignores the essential and fundamental matter of the management of the police. The next general principle applied to England and Scotland has been this, that the local control shall be genuine, shall be real, shall be effective. I have carefully read the English Act and the Scottish Act, and I conclude that the local control exercised by the County Councils in England and Scotland is of a genuine, real, and effective character.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Standing Joint Committee.

MR. SEXTON: I will come to the Standing Joint Committee in a minute. But I declare after the most careful study of this Bill that the County Council in Ireland will be nothing more than the serf, the drudge, the scullion of the Standing Joint Committee. I cannot imagine that any Nationalist elector in Ireland would care to vote for a man to act as he would have to act under the conditions contemplated in this Bill; and I cannot imagine any man of spirit and sense accepting election under the conditions contemplated by the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman interjected an interruption as to the Standing Joint Committee, the suggestion evidently being that the powers of the County Council are limited as much in England and Scotland by the Standing Joint Committee as they were likely to be in Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My remark was simply in reference to some words used by the hon. Gentleman, which appeared to me to convey that the police in England and Scotland were controlled by the County Councils. I pointed out that they were not controlled by the County Councils but by the Standing Joint Committee.

MR. SEXTON: I am perfectly aware of the arrangement in the English and Scottish Acts as regards the control of the police; but I am saying for the moment that the control of the County Councils in England and Scotland is genuine, real, and effective. Unquestionably in regard to the police I assert this, that the County Council in England and Scotland, apart from the

Justices and the Standing Joint Committee, has a special kind of authority of its own. It may be said that the Standing Joint Committee in England exists entirely for the purposes of the police. True, it has some other functions relating to county officers, but they are of a minor character. They have no financial importance; and the conclusion is this, that the English County Council, except in the one matter of the police, in regard to which its powers are somewhat limited, has, so far as local authority is concerned, uncontrolled administration in every matter of finance—in fact, in the whole sphere of administration confided to it by the statute. What is the case in Scotland? The Standing Joint Committee consists of seven County Councillors, seven Commissioners of Supply, and the Sheriff of the county. The Sheriff in Scotland is a permanent judicial officer. He is not more closely connected with the Commissioners of Supply than with the County Council; his partiality as between the representatives of these bodies is something that cannot be assumed. At any rate, this proposal of a Joint Committee for Scotland was forced upon the acceptance of the Scottish Members by the English vote; and am I to be told that the imposition of the authority of the Standing Joint Committee upon the Scottish County Councils against the wish of the Scottish Members is any reason whatever that the Irish Members should accept such a provision for Ireland? Moreover, in Scotland the landlord pays the bulk of the rates; but the landlord may be said to pay none of the rates in Ireland. The exceptions are insignificant and rare. I should like to ask the Attorney General if he would make a calculation and tell us, out of every pound paid for county cess in any county in Ireland, how much is paid by the man who would elect seven County Councillors, and who would be represented by the seven Grand Jurors and the Sheriff, who would out-vote and over-ride the representatives of the people? In Scotland the owner pays the bulk of the rate, and has a right which he cannot pretend to in Ireland. Yet even in Scotland the Standing Joint Committee has a power of control which is trivial when compared with that which is proposed for Ireland. In Scotland the Joint Committee deals with police, which is excluded from the Irish scheme; it deals also with capital expenditure and with borrowing power; but beyond that it has no power of interference with or control over the action of the County Council. I think I have made plain to the House, both in regard to England and to Scotland, what degree of authority in regard to the County Council is given to the Standing Joint Committee. Now let me endeavour to give the House an idea of the base and contemptible function assigned to the County Council in Ireland, having regard to the powers to be conferred on the Joint Committee. First, how is the Standing Joint Committee to be constituted in Ireland? It is to consist of seven County Councillors, seven Grand Jurors, and the Sheriff of the county. The Sheriff of the county is a person allied by social class with the members of the Grand Jury. He nominates the Grand Jury; and you, who sometimes compliment us by calling us a shrewd and quick-witted race, expect us actually to tolerate a proposal by which, in regard to rating almost wholly paid by the occupier, and only to an infinitesimal extent ever paid by any landlord, we shall submit to have our seven representatives upon the Standing Joint Committee at any time, upon any question, out-voted by the Sheriff of the county and seven men of his own nomination. The proposal is ridiculous and absurd. Now let me recite to the House the matters on which the County Council would be helpless to act unless the Sheriff and his seven wise men of the Grand Jury were willing to give them leave. The County Council could not make any capital expenditure; and we learn from the Scotch Act—which is more precise than the Irish Bill—that this capital expenditure includes—

“The erection or enlargement of any building; the making or widening of any road; the construction or improvement of any bridge; any work of drainage, any water supply, or the acquisition of any land or any right to land, or interest in land, or servitude in regard to land for any purpose of capital work.”

Now, looking to the fact that you propose to found in a country which has hitherto been so grossly neglected a Local Authority representative of the electors, the people who pay the money, I do submit it is fantastically absurd that in regard to the erection or improvement of any building, the making or widening of any road, the construction or improvement of any bridge, and so forth, the people of the county and their representatives should be subjected to the will of eight landlords, in regard to whom I must again emphasise the fact that the landlords do not pay the money. The landlords, broadly speaking, in Ireland only pay the county cess as occupiers, and for the farthing in the pound of the county cess which they pay as occupiers they have the cumulative franchise the same as everybody else, and are at liberty to employ it. So much for capital expenditure, but without the consent of the eight landlords the County Council cannot undertake any capital liability. I do not understand what is the practical distinction between capital expenditure and capital liability, but I suppose there is an important distinction.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Guarantee.

MR. SEXTON: The Chief Secretary suggests that capital liability would probably mean guarantee. No doubt it would if guarantee were not also mentioned. Without the consent of the eight landlords the County Council cannot give any guarantee. Have we heard of anything more frequently in recent years than that Ireland is in need of much development in regard to communication? The First Lord of the Treasury takes pride that he has initiated a system of improved communication in the West of Ireland. That system might need to be further developed. There are other parts of Ireland in need of lines of railway and of tramway; but unless the County Council can secure the assent of the Sheriff and his seven co-landlords they would not be at liberty to give a guarantee for the construction of any line of railway or tramway in their county, though the burden would eventually fall upon them and the people they represent. Nay more, they could not give a guarantee for the cost of the enlargement of any industrial school, and they could not give an undertaking to repair a road not previously repairable as a public road. Now, surely, one would have thought that the representatives of the vast body of the cess-payers of the county, if they chose for any reason to repair a road not previously repairable as a public road, might be allowed that not very startling discretion. Under the head of capital expenditure I have classed the powers of the County Council under the Sanitary Acts. The County Council may by resolution procure the transfer from the Rural Sanitary Authority of their powers under the Sanitary Acts. What are the principal Sanitary Acts? The chief one is the Public Health Act, and the rule which I have read debarring the County Council from making capital expenditure would prevent them without the consent of the Sheriff and his friends from building a drain or providing a water supply for a village. Another of these Acts is the Housing of the Working Classes Act. The County Council could not build in any county in Ireland a house for any artisan unless with the consent of the Standing Joint Committee. The Labourers (Ireland) Acts are other Sanitary Acts. Without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee the representatives of the people in any county could not provide a single labourer in that county with a cottage. So much for capital expenditure. I come now to borrowing powers. The Standing Joint Committee would control the borrowing powers just as much as the capital expenditure. Without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee the County Council could not borrow any money even to consolidate the county debt; even though it were a measure of economy to reduce the rates, the consent of the Standing Joint Committee would be necessary. Without such consent the County Council cannot purchase any land or build any building, even though it were authorised by law so to purchase or to build. It could not borrow for any permanent work or other thing—that is general enough—which the County Council is authorised to exact or do. Although it was authorised, it must not do it except with the consent of the Standing Joint Committee. It cannot borrow for any purpose in relation to any business transferred to the County Council for which business under this Act a loan is authorised to be raised. You transfer a business to the County Council by this Bill; you say it may raise a loan, and then, by one of the devices described by Mr. Lowe as "shabby expedients," you provide that it must not execute that purpose or raise that loan until it has the consent of the eight Gentlemen of the Standing Joint Committee. I have not yet exhausted the catalogue. The County Council may not incur, without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee—which will be as great a standing nuisance as ever came into existence—any expense which is to be defrayed out of the county rate. The meaning of that is that the Sheriff and his nominated colleagues will have to consent to any expenditure for the most necessary and urgent sanitary purpose if the rate is to be thrown on the county for that purpose. The County Council, without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee, may not oppose a Bill in Parliament, even though opposition to that Bill should be necessary in its judgment for the promotion or protection of the interests of the inhabitants of the county. The men elected by the county by a vote as wide as a Parliamentary vote are not to be the men to judge whether or not a measure, proceeding in Parliament should be opposed in the interests and for the protection of the inhabitants of the county. So that even though the measure which the interests of the inhabitants of the county may require should be opposed, is promoted by the friends and confederates on the Grand Jury of the Standing Joint Committee, the County Council will be under the obligation of going to those eight gentlemen and asking their consent to oppose this Bill. There is something more extraordinary still, and it is really something to which I invite the attention of every Member of the House. The County Council, without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee, cannot prosecute or defend any legal proceedings, even if, in its opinion, the prosecution or defence of those legal proceedings should be necessary for the promotion or the protection of the interests of the inhabitants of the county. You propose to transfer to the County Council the powers of the Sanitary Acts. The efficiency of the Sanitary Acts depends upon prosecution. You propose to transfer to the County Council the powers of a variety of local authorities, the efficiency of which depends upon the power of prosecution. The County Council may be harassed by vexatious actions against itself, but the theory of this Bill is that no matter how gross may be the violation of the public right, or the danger to the public, by the action of any individual, it cannot prosecute him without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee. Why, before the consent of the Standing Joint Committee may be obtained to the stoppage of a nuisance the whole county may be swept by an epidemic! And in regard to the defence of legal proceedings, is it to be seriously contended that, no matter who brings a vexatious and harassing action against the County Council, that body must call the Sheriff and his seven colleagues together and ask for their consent? At least, it might be supposed that the County Council would be the master of its own officers. That would trench upon the sacred functions of the Sheriff and his seven colleagues, and so you cannot allow the County Council to have control of its officers. The Government propose that nothing of the kind shall be the case, that it shall not have control of its own officers. I have, as I have already said, read the English and Scotch Acts, under which the English and Scotch Councils, in barring the right of an officer to compensation in case of abolition of his office, or reduction of his income, have practically absolute power over the officers in their employment. The Irish County Councils will be the servants of those officers; and the Standing Joint Committee will be the masters of both the County Council and of the officers nominally in their employ. I say case a most iniquitous proposal, in a case where there is so much need for impartiality in the action of the officers between the landlord and the tenant class as in Ireland, that the emoluments and functions and the appointments of the county officers should not be under the control of a representative body like the County Council, but under the control of eight gentlemen representing the landlords' interests. By the Bill all existing officers are continued in office, even the baronial constables appointed by the Grand Jury before the passing of this Act. They are to be saddled upon the county; and not only that, but without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee the County Council cannot remove, cannot suspend, and cannot reduce the salary of any existing officer; and without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee the County Council cannot dictate to any officer as to the performance of any duty except those directed by a scheme approved by the Standing Joint Committee. Is it to be supposed that a County Council so thwarted and so hampered upon every hand will be able to exact obedience or even common respect from the persons nominally in its employ, or that it will be able to conduct its business in an efficient and orderly manner? In regard to future officers, the appointment of the County Surveyor, his salary, his duties, and the question of his removal are all at the discretion of the Standing Joint Committee. Without their consent the salary of the County Surveyor cannot be reduced, nor can he be removed; and to sum it all up, except in regard to existing officers, from the date of the passing of the Bill, without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee the County Council cannot make any alteration in duty, or in pay, or in the conditions of employment of any other officer. You propose to place these unfortunate gentlemen of the County Councils of Ireland in a position of impotence in regard to the Standing Joint Committee, and in a position of helplessness and contempt with regard to their nominal servants. I have enumerated the powers of the Standing Joint Committee; but let me add this: that "if any question arises"—I quote the words of the Bill—

"Or is about to arise as to whether the consent of the Standing Joint Committee is or is not required in any case,"

—one would have thought the enumeration exhaustive enough, but there is this additional provision—

"That question may, on the application of any Standing Joint Committee, be submitted for decision to the High Court, and the Court, after hearing such parties and taken such evidence (if any) as it thinks expedient, shall decide the question."

And observe this: that as the Standing Joint Committee has no funds of its own, and as the County Council is bound to pay the expenses of the Standing Joint Committee, whether the Court decides for or against the County Council, the county would have to bear the cost. I have carefully examined every word and syllable of the Bill. I have endeavoured to discover what in the world the County Council can do—I mean of its own authority. I have not thought it needful to refer to the provisions relating to the Treasury, or the Local Government Board, or the Board of Works, or the Lord Lieutenant, or the various other officials of high and low degree with whom the County Council is encompassed in the pursuit of its dangerous functions. I have thought it sufficient to refer to the Standing Joint Committee; and the conclusion to which I come, after careful study of the Bill, is this. It would not be just to say that a County Council in Ireland would have no power for which it is solely responsible. A County Council in Ireland would have the power to break stones. It would have the power to break stones in limited quantities, provided that this involved no capital expenditure nor any capital liability. That is not the whole of it, because having broken these stones the Council can spread them upon the roads. Not all roads, but some. It would be very dangerous for the County Council to spread them upon all the roads, because if it ventured to spread them upon any road not previously repaired as a public road, the Standing Joint Committee or the Court might be instantly down upon it. There is only one other power which it can safely exercise. I do not think it can safely use the powers of justices in regard to sudden damage to roads, because the Standing Joint Committee might decide that the cost of the repair of sudden damage to roads was capital expenditure, and the County Council is forbidden to incur that without the consent of that Committee. Nor will it be safe for the Council to exercise the powers under the Rivers Pollution Act, because it might have to construct a drain, which would involve that capital expenditure which is one of the subjects reserved for the Standing Joint Committee. But in addition to the power of breaking stones the Council undoubtedly has the power of dealing with destructive insects, under the Destructive Insects Act, 1877, provided that these destructive insects are not so formidable or do not exist in such numbers as to require capital expenditure for their suppression. But I am disposed to say that while I am fully conscious that these two powers are unquestionably given to the sole care of the County Council by this Bill, we in Ireland consider that even in the sphere of local administration we have a right to aspirations more extensive than the breaking of stones and the destruction of insects; and my disposition is to present these insects with my respectful compliments to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and let him dispose of them according to his own ideas. What reason can be assigned for this elaborate and unparalleled network of interference with the work of the representatives of the people? Why should not the ordinary law be sufficient in Ireland, as in England or in Scotland? Why should Irishmen be supposed to be naturally more corrupt, dishonest, or criminal than the men of any other race? Do hon. Members possess the least idea of the powers and functions of the ordinary law in regard to public bodies in Ireland? May I, just for a moment, ask the House to take specifically into its mind the legal powers which are not considered sufficient? In the first place, the County Council must levy an equal poundage rate upon all property liable to county cess, so that it is not able to discriminate to the prejudice of any ratepayer. In the second place, any cesspayer or any person entitled to the receipt of rent, out of which county cess may be deducted, may appeal to the Sessions against the making of any rate, and may cause that rate to be quashed. In the third place, any person affected may traverse before the High Court any order for payment made by the County Council, and may cause it to be cancelled. In the fourth place, any person affected may present a memorial to a superior authority either against the order for the execution of any works, or against the policy of executing any works; and that authority may direct the County Council either to proceed or not to proceed with the works. Then comes the public auditor at the end of every year with the power to disallow any illegal or improper expenditure, and by surcharge to make the members of the Council personally responsible for the expenditure, and compel them to refund the money. Next, there are the powers of the ordinary law, which are certainly sufficient for corruption, for malversation, or for disobedience to the law. Then, finally, the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, as in England, has by mandamus absolute power to deal with any abuse of power—either the excess or the misuse of function on the part of a Local Body—and by imprisonment or by fine to compel obedience to its orders. Then upon this accumulation of legality, which no one can pretend to be insufficient for the purpose, the powers of the Standing Joint Committee have been superimposed; and it is upon the existing powers and the proposed powers of that Committee that the further proposal has been made—a proposal unparalleled in the history of the civilised world—that the rights and the existence of about two hundred Public Bodies in Ireland, thirty-two County Councils, and about 160 Baronial Councils—should be placed at the absolute mercy of two Judges upon matters not merely of corruption, but of “oppression,” a word not yet defined by any law, a word which raises a matter of prejudice and of opinion and not a matter of crime. You place in the hands of these two Judges the power to disqualify any Council, to turn the whole Council out-of-doors, to terminate its official life, to ruin any man or men on that Body by the imposition of legal costs, and to disfranchise, by their mere dictum, the whole body of electors in a county. I scorn to argue with such a proposal. I say that it is an insult to the Irish people; and that even if your scheme were as perfect as it is absurd in every other particular, this one provision alone would entitle and compel us to throw your Bill back to you. This Bill, so far as it is not openly repressive, is a great, an elaborate, delusion. It professes to give an increase of liberty; what it does provide is a further development of coercion. It professes to extend elective local government; what it does provide is an ingenious and intricate network of elaborate provisions to render that power inoperative. Under the pretence of extending local government, it would give to the judiciary, who occupy in Ireland a position not wholly free from suspicion of partiality, an arbitrary power over the rights of the electors, over the franchise of the electors, and over the powers of their representatives; and it would give to them that power not merely in matters of crime or of offences, but in matters of prejudice and of opinion not cognisable by a Court of Law in this or in any other country. Sir, this Bill, instead of improving the situation in Ireland, will provide for the perpetuation of the ascendancy of class over class, and party over party, in the most offensive and prejudicial form, by setting up in every county in Ireland a nominated majority of irresponsible persons to overrule and set at nought the will of the electorate. The Irish people reject the Bill with contempt; they have received it without surprise, because they expected nothing better from its authors—from the men who, for the last five years, in the interest of the greed and tyranny of a class, have scourged and insulted them throughout. I ask the House to reject the Bill, not only upon the grounds I have laid before them, but also because it is an affront both to Parliament and the country. I say it is an affront to the country, because it violates in all essential principles the pledge given six years ago by the Tory Party to the electors; and to Parliament, because it violates in every essential principle the undertaking given to Parliament itself at the opening of this Session in the Speech from the Throne.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(6.33.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have followed with interest and attention the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down; but I had considerable difficulty in recognising from his descriptions and criticisms the Bill with which I fancied I was familiar, and which is the measure now before the House. Will it be believed that the observations and denunciations of the hon. Member were addressed to a Bill which in all essential particulars, as I shall demonstrate, is as liberal as the legislation passed into law for England and Scotland? Take one of the essential parts of the Bill—that of the franchise. I listened with attention to the only general criticism of the hon. Member with regard to this part of the Bill. It was that in this Bill the Government have adopted what he called a principle of disfranchisement. This is the principle which the House agreed to the other night by a majority of more than two to one as one which ought to be extended to the whole of the United Kingdom. It is not a measure of disfranchisement, but only the removal of an exceptional privilege from the least deserving class of electors. That was the only general criticism of the hon. Member, but there were some minor criticisms in regard to Belfast and Dublin—criticisms which might fairly be made in Committee on the Bill. Are you prepared to reject a Bill for the Local Government of Ireland because Dublin and Belfast differ from other Irish Municipalities as regards the municipal franchise? Surely that is not a question for discussion on the Second Reading of this Bill. I observed that the hon. Member made these criticisms in order to prove the "audacious party bias" of the Bill; but let me say that a Bill with a party bias would produce a different political result in Dublin and Belfast.

MR. SEXTON: No, it will have the same result. In Belfast it will shut out the Nationalists, and in Dublin it will protect the Tories.

*MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member relies upon the cases of Dublin and Belfast to show that the Bill has an "audacious party bias." I contend that there is no case for such a suggestion. So much for the question of the franchise. The question of cumulative voting is closely connected with the franchise. The hon. Member for West Belfast said he was in favour of the representation of minorities, but he criticised the particular manner in which the Bill deals with that question. I will undertake to say on behalf of the Government that if the hon. Member can suggest a better way of obtaining a fair representation of minorities than by means of the cumulative vote, the Government will be only too glad to embody it in the Bill; and I say that with the full assent of my right hon. Friend beside me. There are obvious objections to almost all schemes which have been proposed dealing with this problem. All I will further say with regard to it is that I and the hon. Member are at one in wishing to secure the representation of minorities, and that this and other arguments directed against the Second Reading of the Bill might both have been adduced in Committee. I will now refer to another point—that with reference to the police. Anyone listening to the speech of the hon. Member for Belfast would have imagined that in England and Wales the control of the police had been transferred to the County Councils.

MR. SEXTON: I said that in England and Scotland the County Councils have control which they have not in Ireland.

*MR. MADDEN: To suggest that the control of the police in Ireland should be given to the County Councils is to suggest not the assimilation of the Irish to the English and the Scotch system, but the introduction of a totally new principle. The hon. Member used some strong language in regard to what he called the control over the County Councils. He said the Councils would become the "serfs, drudges, and the scullions" of the Standing Joint Committee. But what about the Standing Joint Committee in Scotland? I do not know whether the most patriotic of Irishmen would get up and assert that his countrymen are more economical or less likely to spend their sixpences or larger sums of money extravagantly than their Scotch friends. I, for my part, am not prepared to take up that position. What has Parliament thought fit to do in regard to the County Councils in Scotland? It has said—"In matters of capital expenditure you shall be under the control of the Standing Joint Committee." The hon. Member, referring to the constitution of this Committee, said that while there would be in Ireland, as in England, seven representatives of the County Council and seven representatives of landowners, the ex officio member would not hold the same position as the Sheriff of a Scotch county. That is true, but I would point out that my right hon. Friend, in introducing this Bill, said—and I am authorised to repeat it—that it is the desire of the Government to appoint an ex officio member who will fulfil and occupy in the Irish Council the position of the Sheriff in Scotland, or to provide some other means whereby a member should be added to the County Council who would be recognised by all parties as an impartial official.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman means the Joint Committee and not the County Council.

*MR. MADDEN: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the correction, and I would say that if hon. Members opposite can suggest some method by which a person who can be trusted by both sides can be added to the Joint Committee the Government will be only too glad to accept it. The hon. Member further argued that there is a reason for having a Joint Committee with a control over the expenditure in Scotland, because the landlord there, at all events, pays a portion of the rates. It was also said that in Ireland the landlord paid none of them—a statement which was cheered by hon. Members opposite. It is true that, speaking generally, county cess is paid by the occupier. But I have heard, over and over again, the argument urged by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that rates fall ultimately on the owner, and that in consequence that relief is, in respect of local rates, given to the owner of the land, not to the occupier. At all events in Ireland this is a reality, for the incidence of rates is taken into account by Sub-Commissioners in fixing judicial rents, which, as the House knows, are subject to revision every fifteen years. The hon. Member asked me a question which I am very happy to answer. What is it, he inquired, that the County Councils are to do? Well, Sir, the language of the Bill and its practical operation are about as wide as any that have been introduced into an Act of Parliament. I would here remind the House in a very few words of a point of difference between the English and the Irish county system, which may not be present in the minds of all English Members, although it may be in the minds of Irish Members. We have had in operation in Ireland for a long time a baronial system under which the necessary expenditure for works, which ultimately come under the cognisance of the Grand Jury, are in the first instance passed by the Baronial Sessions peculiar to Ireland. Those duties we transfer to the Baronial Councils, which are, in effect, the District Councils, which have been promised for England. To the County Council we transfer all the fiscal and administrative duties vested in the Grand Juries, and we do more—we enable the County Councils to take over, if they think fit, the very important duty now vested in the Rural Sanitary Authority under the various Acts. They will have power over all that is now under the control of the Grand Juries, and, in addition, they will take over from the Board of Guardians some of the important duties now discharged by those bodies. So far, therefore, as I can see, the County Councils in Ireland will be placed, as regards the transfer of duties and power, in a more favourable position than the County Councils in England and Scotland. Now I do not think that any fair-minded Member of this House can complain with regard to that. The hon. Member for West Belfast has, however, complained that there has been no transfer to the County Council of the powers of the Grand Jury in Ireland with regard to malicious injuries.

MR. SEXTON: I did not complain that it had not been transferred to the County Council, but that the Grand Jury system had been left untouched.

*MR. MADDEN: When a very experienced statesman was asked how a certain matter should be dealt with he suggested, "Why not leave it alone?" That is what is done under this Bill. But I quite appreciate the force of the suggestion that these powers might with advantage be transferred to some judicial tribunal, and if the hon. Gentleman can suggest a more excellent way of dealing with this part of the question we should be glad to consider it. Now I come to an important part of the Bill—a part about which the hon. Member has declined to argue. The hon. Gentleman has criticised those parts of the Bill which might fairly have been discussed in Committee; but he declines to argue upon the important portion which I am now approaching—that which gives protection to the minority against corruption, malversation, or oppression. I am, therefore, under this disadvantage with regard to it: that I have no argument to meet. The hon. Member said he declined to argue upon it, because he considered it as an insult to Ireland. If I had regarded the provision of the Bill in that light I should not stand up here to defend it. I regard it as no insult to any country to recognise the plain and patent facts of its history. It must be admitted that there has been carried on in Ireland a war of class against class, and that this war has raged around the property of the minority. The circumstances of Ireland as regards the position of the minority differ essentially from the circumstances of England and Scotland. I have no doubt whatever that if such a war had raged in England or Scotland as has existed in Ireland, no responsible Minister would have given Local Government to England or Scotland without safeguards similar in principle to those provided in this Bill. I do not believe that the war in Ireland has been attended by more regrettable circumstances than it would have been under similar conditions in England or Scotland. Nay, I believe that if it had had in England and Scotland, as it has had in Ireland, the support of political leaders and the sanction of ministers of religion, it would have been accompanied by circumstances even more regrettable than any which have accompanied it in Ireland; and I believe that my countrymen are ready enough, when the fight is over, to shake hands and become friends again. But we must look facts fairly in the face. I do not wish the House to take my statements. I will refer to higher authority. I do not accept upon this question the opinions of the representatives of the majority. You must consult all parties, and hear the representatives not only of the majority, but also of the minority, and the opinion of those whose duty it was in former days to hold the balance between both, and to decide what should be done in regard to the protection of minorities in Ireland. I do not think I could better impress the House than by a passage which I shall read from a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) on the 8th April, 1886, in introducing the Bill for the Government of Ireland. He said—

"Next, I introduce a provision which may seem to be exceptional, but which, in the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, whose history unhappily has been one long chain of internal controversies as well as of external difficulties, is necessary in order that there may be reasonable safeguards for the minority. I am asked why there should be a safeguard for a minority. Will not the minority in Ireland, as in other countries, be able to take care of itself? Are not free institutions, with absolute publicity, the best security that can be given to any minority? We have not yet reached that state of things."

I await with considerable interest utterances from the Front Bench on this question. Have we yet reached that state of things in Ireland? And if we have, to what is the difference to be attributed? Will hon. Members contend that the success of the government of Ireland since 1886 has been such as to render safe now what was then unsafe? What other argument can they adduce?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): The proposals of 1886 are not at all analogous to what you are proposing now.

listening to my speech for a few moments he will, I think, shortly see that at all events the point is deserving of the consideration of the House. At present I am merely quoting the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman that there was in 1886 a state of things in Ireland which called for exceptional protection of the minority. He said they had not in Ireland arrived at the stage at which minorities could protect themselves. I have also read with great pleasure the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) upon the First Reading of the Government of Ireland Bill. He presented to the House and to the country a counter-proposal of his own, which he also described in a speech made in the country on 1st July, 1886. He said he was for the fullest measure of local self-government for Ireland that could safely be conceded. That was his idea of local government. On 8th April, 1886, he said:—

"To these bodies should be committed full power of local administration and local taxation, but they should have no executive power over the incidence of local taxation, or over-valuation or assessment, in order that injustice should not be done indirectly between class and class."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton, then, was in favour of the very fullest measure of local self-government for Ireland that could be safely conceded. What did he see as the danger in such a measure? Indirect injustice between class and class; and can there, I ask, be a stronger statement of the necessity for special protective provisions? If those safeguards were necessary in 1886, will the right hon. Gentleman say that they are now unnecessary? If so, to what is the difference attributable? If I may venture to interpret the interruptions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, I may anticipate the response that his utterances in 1886 were relative to a different matter. Yes; the right hon. Gentleman accepts my suggestion that they had reference to the right hon. Gentleman's Bill for the government of Ireland. But will it be argued that the same dangers and the same difficulties do not surround the system of Local Government embodied in this measure. On that point I should like to quote from an instructive speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, who in 1886 was evidently of opinion that danger of oppression of the minority and danger of class indirectly oppressing class were greater in the case of such a measure as that now before the House. In his speech on the Second Reading of the Government of Ireland Bill in 1886 the right hon. Gentleman clearly indicated his opinion that Local Boards and other Local Bodies are more likely to act unfairly towards minorities than Central Legislatures. He quoted with approval a statement of the danger that Local Authorities would constantly turn efficient officers away who were not of their own mode of thought. Is not that a danger to be guarded against by an impartial Standing Committee? He also quoted with approval the statement of Lord Salisbury that a Local Authority was more exposed to the temptation of acting unjustly to the minority than a large Central Authority would be, and he observed that this statement embodied an extremely wise and sensible, sound and statesmanlike view. I know the right hon. Gentleman will probably say that he used those words as an argument for giving wider self-government in Ireland.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I say Lord Salisbury himself used them in that sense, for the purpose of showing the superiority of a large scheme.

*MR. MADDEN: Quite so; but the connection in which the argument was used cannot alter a matter of fact. The right hon. Gentleman adopts the principle that Local Bodies are more likely to act unfairly to minorities, and are more likely to turn away their officers because they do not agree with them in politics, than a central Legislative Assembly would be. That is a question of fact derived from observation of what goes on in the world, and cannot, therefore, be altered by the circumstance that in the year 1892 we happen to be discussing a measure of Local Government. The state of facts and the inferences to be drawn from the facts are the same whether we are discussing a measure of Imperial magnitude, or, as at the present moment, a measure for the local administration of affairs. This cannot possibly affect the conclusion drawn from experience that these Local Bodies, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, are specially liable to commit the injustices against which we are endeavouring to afford some protection. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle does not accept the proposition which I am now going to state, he will be obliged to say so when he takes part in this debate. He cannot escape from it. He cannot dissent from my contention that there is special danger of these Local Bodies misusing their powers for the purpose of injuring individuals from whom they differ without unsaying what he said in 1886. If that danger exists, then it is the bounden duty of the Government to do their best in the direction of protection. If we go as far as that, what remains? There remains the question which the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) declined to argue; and although I have no argument to meet, I deem it my duty to submit some consideration to the House. The law has been suggested as a remedy, but the law only remedies breaches of the law. The law will do no more. Such dangers as those apprehended by the hon. Member for Bridgeton are not breaches of the law; they are abuses of the law, and no legal tribunal will prevent abuses of the law, if the law is in favour of the man who abuses it. Therefore, if the dangers recognised by right hon. Gentlemen opposite exist we must have something more than the ordinary law; and in that case what better tribunal can we have than that embodied in the Bill, one not concerned in county affairs at all, impartial, not subject to the dictates of the Government of the day; a tribunal which will decide not as the Local Government Board do in dissolving Boards of Guardians, or after the manner of the Education Department in dissolving School Boards, ex informata conscientia, but will hear evidence, weigh it, act judicially, and will not inflict the severe penalty of dissolution, except in cases which are proved. To what can you appeal with more confidence than to the impartiality and patriotism of Irish Judges? I see that the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) smiles, and I am sure that smile is prompted by recollection of the passage which I am about to read. It is an admirable passage. The Government with which the right hon. Gentleman was connected were considering the question of how to deal with certain crimes peculiar to the country, and they came to the conclusion that they could safely entrust to the Irish Judges decisions not only on questions of law, but also of fact, in the most delicate of trials, arising out of the peculiar condition of affairs in the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby introduced a Bill in the House. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said that the Irish Judges of late have been subject to some degree of suspicion in regard to impartiality.

MR. SEXTON : Between classes.

*MR. MADDEN : And in relation to another Bill attacks have been made against the Irish Bench and the Irish Bar—attacks founded partly on ignorance, partly on wilful misrepresentation, and partly on the credulity of some who ought to have known better. What is the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman? I am sure he will not say that he has changed it since 1882. I believe that the highest tribute that can be paid to the Irish Judges was paid by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian in 1882, when, as I have said, he proposed to entrust to them questions of fact, as well as of law, in criminal cases of the most important class intimately connected with, and arising out of, the exceptional circumstances of the country. What did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby say on the 11th May, 1882?

"The Government have come to the conclusion that this responsibility could be nowhere cast except upon the highest and most responsible persons—the guardians of the law in Ireland. The Judges of the land as a body are the only persons who have knowledge, who possess the authority which is adequate to bear such a responsibility. . . . We have a right to appeal with confidence to the patriotism of the Judges of Ireland."

Mr. Madden

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby) : In criminal cases.

*MR. MADDEN : Does the right hon. Gentleman imagine that the Judges of Ireland and England spend their whole time in deciding criminal cases? The fact is that the Judges, especially the Judges in the Chancery Division, spend a large portion of their time in giving relief in cases of oppression as between one man and another. Why can they not do the same in the case of public bodies? It is a recognised part of the jurisdiction of the Judges, and the observations which the right hon. Gentleman applied to the exercise of such a jurisdiction in criminal cases equally apply to their discharge of their duties in matters which, like this, are not of a criminal character. Let me remind the House that some years ago it was called upon to confer functions, not very different from those which we proposed to confer, on the Judges of the High Court of Justice. It had to deal with the trial of Election Petitions and the presentation of Reports leading directly to proceedings which appear, to my mind, to be infinitely more important than even the important matter of the dissolution of a County Council. I refer to the Reports upon which this House is asked to disfranchise a borough. The finding on the evidence and the presentation of the Report, which are the foundation for the action of the House, were some years ago entrusted by this House to that tribunal to which we propose in this Bill to entrust this question of the dissolution of a County Council. It is essential in the eyes of the Government to give efficient and adequate protection to minorities in Ireland. That is one of the vital principles of the Bill, and I am unable to see to what tribunal that can be more safely entrusted than to the one entrusted by Parliament with analogous functions, and so eloquently described by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. There was one portion of the speech of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Sexton) to which I must refer. It is this : He stated that the country is asked to prefer this Bill as a settlement of Ireland's case, as an alternative to what is rather loosely described as a

Home Rule Bill ; and that if this Bill is not preferred as a settlement, then we must look out for horrid war. Who ever so described this Bill? Certainly not the First Lord of the Treasury when he introduced it. Is the alternative to Home Rule, the transfer of roads, bridges, and sanitary matters from a competent body which is doing its duty well to an untried body? The two questions cannot be mentioned in the same breath ; they are as different as light and darkness. Which is light and which is darkness is a question which I will not discuss here further than to say that a very considerable cloud of darkness hangs over the alternative scheme, and that the light lies on the Bill before the House. What that light discloses is for the House to say ; but a darkness that may be felt encircles what has been called the alternative of this Bill. It has elsewhere been said that this Bill is an alternative scheme to Home Rule, but that appears to me to be an entire misconception of the case, for what is presented by the Government as the alternative for Home Rule is the entire policy of the Unionist Party, of which this Bill is but a part. What is Home Rule? I do not ask that question with any expectation of getting an answer, but at all events it involves a Parliament sitting in Ireland and legislating for Ireland, and an Executive responsible to that Parliament. I do not know whether that will be considered an adequate definition by the Party opposite, but at all events there underlie any scheme of Home Rule a Legislative Assembly sitting in Dublin and an Executive responsible to that Assembly. How can such a scheme be suggested as an alternative to a measure which transfers local affairs from a competent to an untried body? Let each scheme be considered on its merits, but do not suggest one as the alternative of the other. The alternative of any scheme of Home Rule is the whole policy of the Unionist Party—the government of Ireland, England, and Scotland, under the Imperial Parliament, under equal laws adapted to the special circumstances of each country. And that is the policy which has produced such satisfactory results in Ireland in the past six years during which it has been tried, that I am almost tempted to doubt whether I can adopt the statement of the right hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) that we have not arrived at that particular point in Irish affairs indicated by him. At any rate, we have approached nearer to it than we were six years ago. This Bill is only a part of the Unionist policy to which I have alluded. The effect of that policy so far is that such is the freedom from lawless coercion of the people of Ireland, so that a man is now even free to pay his rent. Why Sir, if I were a farmer in far-off districts of Ireland, I should even prefer a scheme which opened up my county by means of railway communication which the Government has established—and which hon. Members opposite see fit to deride—to the transfer of county administration to an elective body. But though this is not the alternative to Home Rule, it is an important measure, and I will venture to say that there has been no case made out by the hon. Member for West Belfast why this Bill should not be read a second time, unless we are to agree with him and say we will abandon the protection of minorities. If he desires to take issue on that point we shall join it with him. I may remind the House that if circumstances do not arise for putting into force the special clause of this Bill—the existence of which I believe will prevent a great deal of misuse of local powers—then, for all, practical purposes, it will be as though it did not exist. Sir, I commend this Bill to the House as a liberal and generous measure, and upon this I challenge not contradiction, because that will in all probability be forthcoming—but I challenge argument. This Bill will enable the Irish ratepayers to manage their local affairs upon the same lines as ratepayers in England and Scotland at the present time in this country, with those necessary provisions for the special circumstances which have been advocated over and over again by every responsible Minister of every Party which has ever attempted to grapple with this part of the Irish Question. I commend this Bill to the House as a generous measure, but you must be just before you are generous. I commend it to the House also, because it is just to that minority in Ireland who I believe will—neither on this occasion nor on more important occasions—ever appeal to the people of England for justice and protection in vain.

*(7.35.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I do not think that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has in any way adequately answered the very eloquent and incisive remarks of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). Judging by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I should almost conclude that the accusations of the Opposition that this Bill is merely brought forward in fulfilment of pledges, and not with any idea of passing it, is just. I would not have ventured to address the House on this subject, if I had not been one of the four Members who alone remain of the Committee of seventeen who sat on Irish Local Government and Taxation of Towns for three years—1876-77-78—and studied this question with very great care under the Chairmanship of the now President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach), and I must regret that this Bill has not been drawn more on the lines of the Report of that Committee, because it appears from the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast that if it had been so drawn they would have been much more prepared to accept it. That Committee consisted of the President of the Board of Trade as Chairman, seven leading Irish landowners then in the House, seven Irish Home Rulers, one English Conservative Member, and myself, an English Liberal, who was added to the Committee as being considerably interested in Local Government. We went most carefully into the inquiry, and I think all were somewhat surprised to find that in most parts of Ireland far more complete materials for good Local Government existed, and a more general disposition to welcome such improvement, than we were, at the outset of the inquiry, altogether prepared for. Nor had waste or corruption been more extensive than in the English Corporations previous to municipal reform. One thing was very remarkable and encouraging. The witnesses were summoned both by Conservatives and Home Rulers; from whichever side they came, I believe I may say that all of them united in one thing—the wish to see a better class of men taking an interest in Local Government. They all wanted to get the best men into it, and I think the whole Committee were sanguine that if the right hon. Gentleman who was then Secretary (Sir M. H. Beach) had been allowed to remain Secretary for Ireland, he would have been able to produce, and would have produced, a Local Government Bill of which Conservatives and Liberals might have heartily approved. Another point on which I think we were quite unanimous was that bright hopes might be formed for the future of Ireland, if we could only break down the wall of separation and distrust which exists between different classes there, by bringing into this common work, administrative rather than political or theological, the representatives of all classes, sects, and parties. A great step would thus be taken towards promoting the happiness and prospects of Ireland. We ended in recommending that this should be done by the system originally proposed by the right hon. Member for St. George's, Hanover Square (Mr. Goschen), for the United Kingdom, and which was the other day advocated by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) as better than the form of minority representation contained in the Bill. I agree with the hon. Member for Longford in preferring greatly the division of rates and representation founded upon taxation to the form in the Bill. But one thing I think very important in the form of Local Government and absolutely essential in Ireland; that is, to secure some safe representation of the minority—I do not care how moderate it is in numbers. It is not voting power that is necessary or desirable for them—it is the maintenance in all these bodies of a certain number of men who can with safety and independence bring and keep before the local Governing Bodies the arguments in favour of justice, and administrative experience which may be counter to some excited temporary wave of public opinion, often on some side issue, which at times sweeps from local Governing Bodies many of their best members, for advocating measures affecting a single question, in which they may after all prove to be right, and which in any event does not seriously affect their usefulness—I might say their necessity—on such Governing Bodies. I have seen this repeatedly happen in England itself; and in Ireland, where religious and political differences run so high, there would be constant danger of those in whose practical management of local affairs the community would have the most confidence being swept away by some issue of this sort. Now, I was rather surprised to hear the value of the provision for representation of minorities disparaged by Members on both sides of the House, on grounds which I think they will see are not tenable. They said that the minority was so small in many parts of Ireland that they would have no appreciable weight or chance of any representation, whatever provisions were made. But, in so saying, hon. Members forget that the minority in Local Government will not be the same as the minorities in either religion or politics. A substantial Catholic or Protestant landowner or tenant will have just as great an objection to have his property or industry burdened and wasted as if he held the opposite opinions on religious or political matters; and the minority in Local Bodies will, I should expect, very soon be, on administrative questions of management or debt, very different from the minority as decided by religion or politics. This will be especially the case in those very places where one Party is absolutely supreme, and need, therefore, not trouble itself about its political or religious ascendancy, but to whatever political or religious Party men in such a case belong, they will have a very great objection to being either overtaxed or having their local affairs mismanaged. I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will adhere with absolute firmness to his determination to have some form of the representation of the minority which will ensure their voice being heard on the local Governing Bodies. There is another point on which I think we require the most carefully considered provisions—I mean the powers to incur debt. In all Local Governments this should be strictly limited, and the limit never exceeded except by carefully-considered legislation, in order to ensure great prudence. Democracies are very energetic, but they are by no means economical, especially in local expenditure, and the most advanced and experienced ones have found it necessary to make it very difficult to exceed these limits. America has, I think in ten States, put a limitation into their Constitutions so that the amount can only be exceeded by a vote of two-thirds of the constituents and by a majority in two successive Legislatures. Now, Ireland has not the vast resources which have enabled America to surmount difficulties that in Ireland would be ruinous. Twice has the Federal Government been obliged to come to the aid of Local Governments in the different States. At one time there was a considerable repudiation of debt, and these very strict limitations have been passed in consequence of these difficulties. These limitations have stood the test of experience, and of even so severe a test as the fire of Chicago, which destroyed nearly the whole city. The limit in such cases cannot be exceeded on a mere Provisional Order or anything analogous. It is, I repeat, in the Constitution, and cannot be departed from. On the other hand, the way it is enforced is not by calling the local Governing Bodies to account or by suspending their functions, as proposed in the Bill; but by making all action contrary to these limitations illegal, so that he who lends money in contravention of the law has no recourse against the community, and his only hope is of getting the money from the parties who illegally borrowed it; and this is a risk neither lenders nor borrowers are willing to incur. I think it would be most beneficial for Ireland itself and for the United Kingdom, if all parties could now unite in passing a really good Local Government Bill, both for the benefit which such a measure would itself confer on Ireland, and also as preparing the way for that larger measure of self-government which the Liberal Party intend, and, few doubt, will soon have the opportunity of proposing as a Government measure. Unless I am very much mistaken, no one would receive greater assistance and benefit from the passage of a good Local Government Bill than—if Home Rule be decided on—would the Irish Leaders themselves. I have no doubt that they will be most anxious to use carefully and wisely the powers they seek to obtain; but as anyone acquainted with Ireland is aware, in the long and protracted struggle which has been going on, the bulk of the Irish people have come to believe that everything that money can buy or legislation enact would at once be theirs if they only had a Legislature of their own. And as no means at the disposal of the Irish Government could enable them to do all that would be expected from them, it is most important that certain questions, such as local government and land, should be settled for a time, so that the people might have some period during which to accustom themselves to the use of their new powers, and realise the limitations which attach to what any Government can do. If some such protection is not given for a time to the new Government of Ireland, if they cannot point to certain limitations of powers and time as making patience necessary, in the very stipulations of their new Constitution, they will be driven to measures and expenditure which would soon bring about disaster and bankruptcy. If they do not satisfy all those impossible expectations, they will, without such protection, be swept away to make room for others who will promise to do so. The Local Government Bill might well be passed in this view for a definite period of, say, seven years, at the end of which it would come up for reconsideration with increased experience on all sides. In the meantime the Irish Government will have more work to do than they can do carefully and well.

*(7.38.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I regret the tone of the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), because I should have imagined that he would have cordially welcomed a proposal of this kind. But I can conceive one reason why the hon. Member and those who act with him are unwilling to support the Second Reading of this Bill. I think they are a little afraid that if County Councils are established in Ireland there might be such scenes exhibited at those meetings as would deter the people of England from granting them the larger measure which they say they are soon going to obtain. If one member of the County Council were to call another an ass, and this were to be followed by the other saying that he ought to be allowed to stew in his own fat, as we have seen recently Members of this House attacking each other in Dublin, perhaps that would do a great deal to disgust the people of the United Kingdom with the demand for a Parliament in Dublin. The able and exhaustive speech of the Attorney General for Ireland has left little to be said in support of the Bill, but speaking for a large section of people in Ulster who cordially welcome this attempt of the Government to deal with this question, I give the Second Reading of the Bill my most earnest and hearty support. We have heard some remarks about the protection of minorities, and it cannot be doubted by anyone who has studied the history of Ireland that it is absolutely necessary in such a measure as this that some regard should be paid to the protection of minorities. I am just as ready to concede protection to the minority of Roman Catholics in Belfast as to the minority of Protestants in other parts of the country. We are sometimes spoken of as being bigoted and intolerant to those who differ from us, but we are anxious that the greatest possible privileges should be extended to all loyal subjects in Ireland. The only thing we protest against is the attempt to dis sever Ireland from the Crown, and to cut the golden link which connects Ireland to England. This we do resolutely, and shall oppose to the end of the chapter. In supporting the Second Reading we desire to remove some of the grievances which exist in Ireland as compared with England and Scotland, and I cannot conceive why hon. Members opposite who are always calling out for equal laws should oppose this Bill and go in for such wholesale denunciation of the measures that have been introduced by Her Majesty's Government. The present Government have never been famous for broken pledges and for making promises which they never intended to fulfil. This Bill is in fulfilment of one of the pledges that have been from time to time given to the country, and an attempt is now being made to frustrate the measure by those who pose as the champions of Irish liberty. We have seen measure after measure introduced by the present Government for the amelioration of Ireland; we have seen Bills for the improvement of drainage, and Bills for the extension of railways opposed resolutely by hon. Gentlemen opposite; and it is part of the policy which they consistently pursue to make it appear that Parliament is either unwilling or unable to redress the grievances and right the wrongs of Ireland. But I trust that the House will prove by passing this Bill that it is both willing and able to perform this duty. The hon. Member (Mr. Sexton) does not represent the opinion of the great and progressive city of Belfast. The General Election, for which hon. Members opposite profess themselves so anxious, will certainly be welcome to the people of Ulster, and several more members of the loyal party will be sent to support the present Government, and the place of the hon. Member for West Belfast will know him no more. I cordially support this Bill as a measure of justice for Ireland by a Government which has shown itself anxious to promote the moral and material welfare of that country; and I do so not only in the interest of Ireland but also of Great Britain, feeling that the removal of a grievance will strengthen the bond that holds the two countries together.

*(8.37.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): Before proceeding to make a few remarks upon the Bill now before the House, I should like to be allowed to say that I have listened with much attention to the speech of the hon. Member for South Belfast, for whom I have a great respect. Though we differ on some matters, and notably in the estimation in which he holds the character of our fellow-countrymen who are Catholics, we agree entirely upon one subject, and that is—a desire for the maintenance of the Union between these countries. The hon. Gentleman speaks of golden links. I desire likewise that these countries should be united by golden links; I do not desire that they should be united by fetters. I would like to remind the hon. Gentleman of an expression once uttered by the late Mr. John Bright—that the misfortune hitherto in relation to these two countries was this: that the Union was a union between Ulster and Great Britain, but that he would desire that there should be a union between the whole of Ireland and Great Britain. That is the wish I have, and I believe that in desiring that I do not desire anything inimical to the interests of Ulster or those whom the hon. Member for South Belfast represents. This is not merely a Local Government Bill, such as has been already passed for England and Scotland. It is the culmination of a great policy. We have been passing through very bitter and sad times, and we were always promised that the outcome of it would be one great measure which would settle for ever the difficulties in which the two countries find themselves. But this Bill, I believe, will not effect that object, and I intend to vote against it. I do not see how this Bill would relieve the pressure which exists at present upon the time of the House in the endeavour to meet its ever-increasing responsibilities. On the contrary, I rather think it would open up new points of difficulty; and I do not see in any respect how a minute or an hour in the time of this House would be saved by it. It would be a great point in such a Bill as this if the interests of the Protestants in Ireland were properly safeguarded in such a manner as to give no offence to anyone; but I do not think that that has been done by this Bill. What is the position of the Protestants in Ireland? Their position is this: that more than half the Protestants of Ireland—I think about 670,000—are confined to four counties in Ireland; the remaining 600,000 Protestants are scattered all over the rest of Ireland, and are in a hopeless minority in twenty-eight counties. If there was any common assembly in any part of Ireland where representatives from all parts of the country could come together and discuss common interests, I believe it would be impossible for anything to go wrong in the most remote part of Ireland. In that respect I think the Bill is entirely wanting. I think it is also wanting in not abolishing in any respect the scandals of Castle government, which have been fully admitted for the last forty or fifty years. I think the practical retention of the Grand Jury system, the existence of which has been one of the principal grievances of the country, is a serious blot on the Bill, and a disappointment to all of us who hoped that such a Bill would be an effective measure. I think that it is one of the deepest defects of the Bill that it contains no provision for bringing Irishmen together for the common discussion of their grievances. The hon. Member for South Belfast and others have referred to the present condition of things amongst Irishmen as a proof that they were not fit for that wider administration which we hoped to have obtained by this Bill. That is an entire misreading, I think, of the present state of affairs. On all occasions in Ireland in which we are brought together, and where we are allowed to settle our own differences amicably together, we get on as well as they do in any other country. Our public companies are, in proportion to their means, quite as well and purely managed as your public companies. I suppose every week there are at least one hundred Boards of Guardians sitting all over Ireland; in these Boards of Guardians I think there is very fair amity. And you must remember this unfortunate fact: that in Ireland the large end of the telescope is turned towards all our differences and troubles; while here in this country it is the interest of everyone to minimise and hide them away. The great differences that have occurred in Ireland, and that are now going on there, all arose out of the condition of Ireland as compared with this country. Then there is nothing in this Bill to rouse our enthusiasm, or to attract men of high intelligence or patriotic aims in the country. I regard that as a very great defect of this Bill. The cardinal necessity for any measure of Local Government for Ireland should be that real and true responsibility should be thrown upon the people; and I protest that there is not in this Bill real and true responsibility. The effect of the present state of things is that whatever wrongs there are in our social state we try to throw on other people and another Government. I am not one of those who believe that all our ills result from misgovernment; a great many of them result from ourselves. But until we are taught to feel and know that in the last resort in Ireland, as in every other country, good government must spring from ourselves, we cannot change in our manner. Nothing sobers a man like responsibility. We see cases occurring constantly where youngmen without responsibility exhibit little power to effect much; but put responsibilities on their shoulders, and they soon develop qualities that you can hardly imagine them to possess. So I believe with Ireland. When real responsibility is thrown upon us, when the door is shut on our being able to throw our misfortunes on others, then we shall develop new qualities, and bring about a state of things entirely different to that which exists. In Ireland we know permanent officials exercise an influence far beyond what they have ever exercised in England; and that Local Government in Ireland should be effective in face of such a dead weight of official and bureaucratic power, it would appear to me essential that it should be even of a wider character than the Local Government created in England and Scotland. It is impossible that we can accept this Bill as in any degree a settlement of the Local Government Question in Ireland. We all must acknowledge the brilliant abilities of the Leader of this House; but it appears to me that his principal power of mind consists in persuading himself and others that things are not what they are—that coercion is not coercion, that injustice is not injustice, and that inequality is equality. How it is possible to suppose that the democracy of England and Scotland, upon whom our hopes are centred, will accept the statement that this Bill runs on the same lines as the English and Scotch Bills passes my comprehension. The Attorney General for Ireland spoke of the darkness that hangs over our side of the House, and the complete success that has attended the measures passed by the Government. I do not believe, so long as we have any trust in the principles of real justice, that any darkness will hang over the opinions that are now happily held on this side of the House regarding the future government of Ireland. I believe whatever discouragements cross our path they will be overcome. But as for the present system, it is strange how people can persuade themselves that the effect upon us has not been directly contrary to what they suppose. I cannot see in what respect the system which you desire to maintain has been effectual. As I see this policy developing itself as it is finally developed in this Bill, bitter hatred rises in my breast against the present system, and a stronger determination to oppose it. It is because I believe that the policy embodied in this Bill will, instead of knitting us together, raise the worst feelings and passions, and it is because I desire that this House should be able to consider the happiness and peace of the millions depending upon it, and that the destinies of this Empire should be really high and holy, that I shall vote against the Second Reading of this measure, looking forward with the most perfect confidence to the great measure which will shortly be introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian.

(9.0.) MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): We must all recognise the moderation of the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down, but when he speaks of orderly proceedings of companies in Dublin, we can hardly accept that statement with the proceedings of the Freeman's Journal Company fresh in our minds. I share the regret expressed by the hon. Member for West Belfast at the absence of the hon. Member for Derry City, for he would, at all events, have had the advantage of speaking in the name of a united Party. I believe that that Party is extremely small, consisting only of two persons, and even they are sometimes divided. The hon. Member for West Belfast has not profited by the advice given by the hon. Member for Derry, when the Bill was read a first time. He then said that the best thing to be done with the Bill was to burn it; but the hon. Member for West Belfast has devoted a speech of an hour and a half's duration to an elaborate analysis and criticism of the measure. It therefore seems that the Bill is worth more than being put at the back of the fire. I am surprised that any Irish Member should have moved the rejection of this Bill. We all remember that during the last six years Irish Members have been going over England, Scotland, and Wales, telling the electors that all they wanted was the opportunity of managing their own local affairs; and it was because English people felt the Irish had not the same power as themselves of managing their own local business that the Irish had so much sympathy manifested towards them at by-elections. But after the action of the hon. Member for West Belfast to-night, I think the electors of this country are in a position to estimate correctly the value of the grievance complained of, and the sincerity of the speeches with which they have been flooded. I quite accept the statement that the issue at the last Election was whether we were to have the scheme of Home Rule proposed by the right hon. Member for Midlothian or the alternative of Local Government, and I must confess that I have the complaint to make against Her Majesty's Government that this Bill has been unduly delayed. In the years which have passed since the last General Election, the first Session was taken up with the Crimes Act and the Land Purchase Act; the next Session saw the English Local Government Act; the next the Scotch Local Government Act; 1890 was wasted with the unfortunate proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and in 1891 we had the Irish Land Purchase Act. The Irish Local Government Bill has been reserved for this year, although it has been frequently mentioned in the Queen's Speech. I think that in this matter the Government have made a very great mistake. They have introduced three important measures dealing with Land Purchase in Ireland in order to remove discontent; but have they thereby satisfied the Irish people in the slightest degree? For my part, I do not believe that they have. The elections in Ireland show no signs of the discontent having been removed. I am quite aware that the First Lord of the Treasury may reply, "Supposing we had brought in a Bill establishing Local Government earlier, would that have satisfied the Irish, or removed any discontent or ill-feeling in Ireland?" I quite agree that in all probability it would not have satisfied the Irish people or made them more contented, but it would have had this important effect: that it would have cut away the ground from under the people in England and Scotland who sympathise with the Irish Members at the present time. I quite agree with the hon. Member who spoke last that this Bill does not go far enough. But that is a remark which can be applied with the same force, I think, to the English Bill and to the Scotch Bill. None of these Bills go far enough in the direction of devolution of business from this House. It is quite true that the County Council is, comparatively speaking, a recent experiment; but if we want to find a real means for the relief of the congestion of the business of this House, it is to the County Council we must turn. Most Members will agree with me that a great part of the business which is now transacted here might, with far greater benefit to the country, be transacted by the different County Councils. Private Bills can be settled far more expeditiously, far more cheaply, and far more efficiently, by the County Councils than they can before the Committees upstairs at the present time. There are two other matters which I looked to the Government to deal with in connection with this Bill—I mean the system known as Dublin Castle and the system of Viceroyalties. It is greatly to be regretted that the Government have not seen their way definitely to make some statement that the system of government by Viceroy should come to an end. I believe the only other Possession where a Viceroy holds office is that of India, and why should Her Majesty's Government try to identify Ireland with India? Why should they seek to make Ireland a separate entity, as distinct from Scotland and other parts of the United Kingdom? I saw a letter in the paper not very long ago in which the writer pointed out that we have tried all the Viceroys from A (Aberdeen) to Z (Zetland); and I do think, now that we have come to the last letter of the alphabet, it is time that the government by the system of Viceroyalty should come to an end. How can we expect Irish Members to show any amount of loyalty if they are always called upon to pay their allegiance to only a sham Royalty, and to such a farce as the Viceroyalty system of Dublin? With this Bill I think we may say that the Unionist programme of Irish legislation is now complete. The responsibility of rejecting this Bill must rest with Members below the Gangway. A General Election is not very far off, and the electors will have an opportunity of showing whether they want any more Irish legislation, or whether they have had enough during the past six years. The Unionist programme is complete; we shall give no more Irish legislation, and in the future we shall be able to turn our attention, if the Unionist Government is returned, to the reform of the grievances of England, Scotland, and Wales. If, on the other hand, a Gladstonian Government is returned to power, then we shall have to go through the whole weary round of Irish legislation once more, and there will be opened up before us an endless vista of the same sort of legislation as we have been dealing with during the past six years. I should like to point out that this Irish policy of the Gladstonians is not particularly popular in the country at the present time. It is not popular, at all events, in the rural districts of England. I saw the other day that a late Under Secretary went down into the country to make a speech—it is true it was to the agricultural labourers that the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) was speaking—and it will be hardly credible that that hon. Member in the whole of his speech never once alluded to the subject of Home Rule. He knows that it is not a popular question in the agricultural constituencies—that, in fact, it is there extremely distasteful. If, therefore, I might venture to give any advice to the Irish Members, I would strongly recommend them to accept this Bill, and for this reason: that they are a little uncertain as to what will happen at the next General Election. Even if the Gladstonian Party came into power, do they think that they will get all that they are bargaining for? Whilst if the Unionist Party are returned with a majority, they will have lost their chance. They should ascertain clearly what it is they are going to get if the Gladstonians come into power. Speaking at White-chapel in January, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) said—

“I am satisfied that the Nationalist Party in Ireland, as a whole, and the Liberal Party in Great Britain, are willing to entrust this task to the hands of Mr. Gladstone . . . upon the general lines of the policy he has already announced, with such modifications as the circumstances of the case may require.”

Shortly afterwards the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. William O'Brien) said—

“I take it that we are all united in demanding that the Irish Parliament, while it acts within its own province, shall be as free from Imperial meddling as the Parliaments of Australia or Canada—that is to say, practically as free as air.”

Is that the kind of Parliament the Gladstonians are going to give? A Gladstonian speaker at Rossendale referred the other day to the Home Rule Bill as one which would give the Irish people the right to deal with gas, water, railways, electricity, and one or two other subjects. Is that the kind of Home Rule the Irish people will accept? Speaking at Dungarvan in October last, the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) also said—

I think we can all understand that speech. Then, again, on St. Patrick's Day, in 1891, the hon. Member for Derry City said at a banquet in London—

“We stand for ‘Ireland a nation’: that is our purpose in public and political life. We open our meeting to-night with that toast, and we propose to open every such meeting with that toast till Ireland is really and in actual sense a nation.”

Are those the views that are accepted by the hon. Member for West Leeds? If so, we have his authority that Ireland is to be a separate nation. Then, again, Archbishop Croke, the spiritual adviser of the Nationalist Party, speaking at Clerihan in May, 1891, said—

“For two hundred years priests and people have been fighting in the constitutional struggle for freedom and have brought us within strictly measurable distance of what we ultimately aim at—namely, the legislative independence of our country.”

But that is what the right hon. Member for Derby said could not be granted. Archbishop Croke also said in another speech—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should confine himself to the subjects of the Bill. The House is not now discussing the question of Home Rule.

MR. COGHILL: I thought I should be in order in speaking upon the alternative to be offered in place of this Bill, but I will not pursue the question further. I will only say, in conclusion, that if Ireland merely wants Local Government, I am in favour of granting her request as fully and generously as possible, but the creation of a Local Parliament for Ireland is impossible. I think the Government will do well to make this Bill a wide and genuine measure, and, so far as the Second Reading is concerned, I am surprised there is any objection to it. If the Bill is now read a second time it could, if necessary, be enlarged and amplified in Committee, so as to give to Ireland every power associated with Local Government that could safely be given to either England, Scotland, or Wales.

(9.26.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I think that anyone who has read this Bill will have come to the conclusion that it will give to Ireland very little power—not even the same privileges that have been conferred by the English Local Government Bill. The taxing power given to the Irish County Councils will be very limited, being confined to taxation under the Valuation Acts. Under those Acts, the burden of taxation falls upon the occupiers and not upon the landowners. The landowners will, therefore, still remain free from the payments which ought to come out of property. Evicting landlords do not contribute one penny to the support of the wretched people whom they evict, whilst the tenants, when in the workhouse, are supported out of the rates paid by the occupiers, and not by the owners. I contend that power should be given to the Local Assemblies to remedy such injustice as that. Another defect of the Bill is that it will not give the County Councils control over the police. In England the elected authorities have such control. Why should not, then, such a control be given to Ireland? Then, further, we are not allowed under this Bill the power of judicial appointment, although in England you have the power to elect aldermen who, I believe, dispense justice as magistrates. Why do you not give to us equal power? Are we untrustworthy in that respect? For my part, I do not think the Irish sense of justice is less than that of Englishmen. And it ought to be remembered that this refusal to give us powers in our own country is rather an expensive matter to the British taxpayer, for whom, however, I do not care much, whom I like the better, indeed, the more he pays. I am not the guardian of his purse. Ireland and India are the only two sections of the Empire left without central government, and they absorb half your naval and military force. That, then, is the result of your proceeding. Some people scorn the demand that we should have power, and the answer we get is that British influence would be imperilled. But what of Canada, of the Cape, of New South Wales? These are far away, but Ireland is on our coast. The Isle of Man is a little closer, and it even has self-government. If we were equally entrusted with self-government, Ireland would cease to be an expensive portion of the Empire; but it must be self-government in the truest sense of the term. The broader the base, the firmer will be the superstructure. We are sometimes told that if Ireland had a Government of its own we should invite the Germans or perhaps send for the Russians; but the fact is that wherever you have given self-government those portions of the Empire have ceased to be a strain upon your military force. Take the case of Australia.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not discussing the Local Government Bill. He is going into the relations between this country and its colonies.

MR. BLANE: Perhaps I have gone a little beyond the Bill. To return, however. What we demand is control of the police, and the judiciary and of taxation. All these points are absent. Why is something still left to be accomplished? But the Tory Party is always late. I remember they once denounced land legislation, but later they advanced as they were forced by their opponents. Our agitation, which is so often used as an argument against us, has reacted on English life. You would never have had judicial tribunals for the adjustment of rents but for Irish contentions which you scorned, and had later to embody in your legislation. We ask you not to refuse us the rights and privileges which belong to any free people. Of course, you can tax us as you like, because you can do just as you choose with a people disarmed by house-to-house search. Action in that matter was the work of the Government of which the right hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) was the head. But the Party to which I belong do not care for either of the Parties; we are not their serfs in any sense of the term. Those of us who made a successful fight against coming under the control of the Radical Party have made a similar fight against the Tory Party; and from both Parties in this House have we got imprisonment, packed juries, and changed venues. Sometimes it is urged against extensive self-government that the Catholic majority would oppress their Protestant brothers; but I venture to say that no person, either in or out of the House, not even the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), would go further in the defence of the rights and liberties of the minorities than I would. And in this connection I may remind the House that the section to which I belong, although mainly Catholic, resisted the deposition of the late Mr. Parnell from the Leadership.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. Member has gone still wider of the subject.

MR. BLANE: Of course, Sir, I have travelled a little further than I should have done, but I simply intended to emphasise the fact that there is no foundation for the charges made against us. We stood in defence of the Protestant, we carried his coffin to the grave; and I venture to say therefore that it does not lie in the mouth of any hon.

Member to charge us with intent on the liberties and rights of the Protestants.

MR. JOHNSTON: I did not intend to have alluded to the section of the Irish National Party to which the hon. Member belongs.

MR. BLANE: The Party I represent claim the right to think for themselves in matters political, and we only accept the dictation of any man just so far as it coincides with our own views. Sound reasoning is not the prescriptive property of any man. To return to the subject of Local Government and the allegation of oppression, I believe that if we had the proper control of our own affairs, the minority in Ireland—educated, technically skilled, and men of ability—would take the foremost position in the Government. Not until we receive that measure of government will the strife between England and Ireland be ended.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): The hon. Member who has just sat down has reproduced the demands which have been made upon our country—demands that the Irish people shall have the management of their own affairs. Everybody believes that it is right a locality should have the management of its own affairs, always understanding that to mean its own local affairs. There can be no doubt whatever that in many of the bye-elections it has been a most formidable argument that the Irish people should have the management of their own affairs. Take for instance the election at Rossendale. If I am rightly informed that election was determined mainly upon the illustration of electric lighting. It was submitted that the Irish people should have the power of determining questions of that kind. Now, I concede the principle that every locality should have the right to manage its own affairs, but that must be understood rightly to mean its own local affairs. In discussing whether this Bill is what it professes to be it is important to consider what are local questions. This Bill is said to be defective, if I correctly gather the meaning of hon. Members opposite who oppose it, not because it is not a good Local Government Bill, but because it is not more than that—because it does not give to Ireland, or particular parts of Ireland, powers which are altogether beyond those of any ordinary Local Governing Body whatever. Take for instance the question of the police. Is that a local matter? Suppose we were to concede to an Executive Government in Ireland the entire management of the Constabulary—a body of fourteen thousand men. In that case Ireland would be practically independent of England, and the liberties of Englishmen and all sections of Irishmen would be subject to the control of that Executive Body and the police. Take also the question of the Land Laws. That is not a matter of local government at all. And why? Because land in the south may belong to an Irishman in the north, and vice versa, and land in either the north or the south may belong to an Englishman or a Scotchman. Is a Local Government Bill to vest in any Local Governing Body in Ireland power to make laws which may affect the rights of either Englishmen or Scotchmen? Sir, that is not local government at all; it is Imperial government. What would a Lancashire man say if the London County Council attempted to alter laws by which property is transferred or devolves? He would say that was not a power that properly belongs to a local Governing Body. A London man, too, would object to a Lancashire County Council deciding upon any question of property in which his rights would be in the slightest degree affected; and he would say—and say properly—that an alteration of the Land Laws which might affect any of Her Majesty's subjects, whether in England, Ireland, or Scotland, was not a matter to be dealt with by a body established for Local Government purposes. In the English Local Government Bill you find none of these things. The English police are not put into the hands of the County Council, but into the hands of a Joint Committee composed of Magistrates representing the Crown on the one hand, and the County Council on the other, and this subject to considerable restrictions. And then as to the Land Laws—which is the great point in dispute in regard to this Bill—no power to meddle with those laws is transferred to the English County Councils. I have gone through the Bill now before the House, and, as far as I can see, it is distinctly on the lines of the English Local Government Act. For my own part, Sir, I was not in sympathy with that Act. It will be within the recollection of the House that I opposed it, and that I only desisted from doing so when I found I was in an absolute minority, and that continued opposition would have amounted merely to obstruction. In my humble view the magistrates had discharged their duties efficiently, and there was no ground for the transfer of powers from them to elective bodies. I was also of opinion that there was no ground for the abolition of the property vote, because I consider that representation and taxation should go together. To a large extent that Act put into the hands of the people who do not pay rates the power of spending them. Well, Sir, that has been done in reference to England, and I find all that is now proposed for Ireland. The powers which have hitherto been vested in the Grand Juries, equivalent to the magistrates in England, are to be transferred to the County Councils, the constitution of which under this Bill is exactly analogous to that of the County Councils in England. The powers hitherto vested in the nominees of the Crown are now to be vested in an assembly elected by the ratepayers on the principle of "One Man One Vote," so that every man who pays rates—whether a large or a small amount—will have the opportunity of recording his vote. I fail to see in what respect that is not a liberal measure. I own it is not a Bill by which Imperial power is to be transferred to any local assembly in Ireland, and that it will not enable Local Bodies to alter the Land Laws, or make it possible for one section of the community to dispossess another section. Neither will it enable the Land League to transfer its jurisdiction from the secret conclave to the County Council, and so dispossess the landlord in favour of the tenant. But it will place Ireland, with one or two exceptions, in exactly the same position as the English people with regard to Local Government. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) says he will not have this Bill, and throws it back with scorn. I want to know what is the foundation for his scorn? Is it because Ireland is not placed in a better position than England? ("No!") Then why?

MR. SEXTON: Because Ireland is not placed in as good a position as England.

MR. AMBROSE: But the hon. Member has not pointed out a single instance of powers given to local Governing Bodies in England that are not equally given under this Bill to County Councils in Ireland, except in one or two cases with which I will deal presently. The hon. Members' objections seem to be centred in Clause 5, which gives power to any twenty cess-payers of a county to apply for the removal of a County or Baronial Council on the ground of corruption, malversation, or oppression, or persistent disobedience to the law. He says this is an insult to the Irish people. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, if there is no ground for protecting the minority of the Irish people by such laws as these? Does the hon. Member deny that the Boards of Guardians for Limerick and Cork used their powers contrary to the law and for political purposes?

MR. SEXTON: They were half landlords.

MR. AMBROSE: I say it is a matter of history that, instead of administering the Poor Law as they should have done, they passed political resolutions, and misused the powers vested in them for the oppression of particular individuals. Does the hon. Member deny there was a Land League and a Plan of Campaign, and that the Commission found there was a conspiracy to impoverish land-owners and drive them from Ireland? I ask this House, and the country through this House, whether it would be right to constitute a Local Authority in Ireland without providing proper safeguards for the protection of the minority? Would it be right to incorporate the Land League and leave the founders of the Plan of Campaign to work their wicked will on the loyal subjects of the Crown? It would be little less than treason on the part of Her Majesty's Government to confer powers such as are conferred in this Bill without proper checks to prevent those powers being misused and being turned against the poor and loyal subjects of the Crown—to prevent these powers being used by the weak against the strong. But I would call attention to the fact that under the fifth clause, before anything can be done, there must be a fiat of a Judge of Assize. Without that fiat proceedings cannot even be initiated. Does the hon. Member mean to say that there is any Judge on the Irish Bench wicked enough and corrupt enough to sanction a Petition of this kind unless ground is shown for it? Since I have sat in this House I have occasionally heard points made against what are called on the other side the “Removables”; but I have heard no word against any Judge of the Superior Courts, and I believe in their absolute impartiality. Do hon. Members mean to say that the liberties of the Irish people are endangered by this clause, when a Petition cannot even be presented without the sanction of a Judge? After that the Petition has to be tried, and it may be dismissed with costs—a penalty which is surely sufficient to secure that a Petition will not be presented without good grounds. Or is it that hon. Members mean that there is to be no check on corruption, malversation, oppression, and persistent disobedience of the law? If that is what they mean let them say so, and let the people of England understand it. Let them go to the country upon it, and if this Bill is to be rejected let us know the real grounds for its rejection. I am not going to give my adherence to this Bill on this clause. It may or it may not be necessary. I am not sure that it is; but how does it affect the Bill? It is separate from every other part of the Bill, and any objection there may be to it should be brought forward at the Committee stage, and not pressed now on the Second Reading. For my own part, I never believed this Bill to be necessary. I did not believe the Local Government Bill for England to be necessary; but that has been passed, and here is this Bill for us to deal with. If it accomplishes no other purpose, it will stop the cry hereafter that the Irish people ought to have the power of managing their own affairs. But they have no right to manage my affairs, or the affairs of any other English subject. The position is utterly unwarranted, and I have been absolutely disappointed by the want of argument on the other side. I expected to find something to grapple with in the way of opposition; but I have heard nothing, and I think it is idle to occupy the time of the House for a week, or even for two nights, with this Debate.

(10.13.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Since coming back from dinner I have been privileged to hear two valuable speeches. The speech of the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Blane) reminded me of St. Athanasius. It was Athanasius contra mundum. The hon. Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) is so legal and learned in his speeches that I confess I have considerable difficulty in following him; but I gather that he took a certain pride in having opposed the Local Government Bill because it went too far. I am not, therefore, surprised that he approves, in a sort of modified way, of this Bill, for of this Bill he cannot complain that it goes too far. His approval of it is limited, however, because he said that he did not himself deem the Bill to be necessary, and it would only become a perfect Bill after it had gone into Committee, and after he had had the opportunity of proposing a considerable number of Amendments to it. Whether it will go into Committee or not I do not know. I have heard it complained that Home Rule is involved in absolute darkness whereas this measure is in brilliant light. I think that the curiosity exhibited by hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the details of the Home Rule Bill is positively indiscreet. We have stated the principle upon which that Bill will be based, and I think it would be most unconstitutional on the part of the Leaders of the Constitutional Party of which I am a humble Member, were they to go into details at the present moment. We know that the General Election is not very far off, and we know that the question to be submitted to the electors will be whether they are in favour of the principle of Home Rule, or whether they are opposed to that principle. If they are in favour of the principle, it will then be for my Leaders to submit to the House and to the country a full measure of Home Rule, and then will be the time for hon. Gentlemen if they object to those details, while accepting the verdict of the country and assenting to the Second Reading, to criticise the way in which we propose to deal with the matter. Therefore, I am somewhat surprised that the Attorney General for Ireland should have dragged the question of Home Rule into the present discussion. We are now dealing with a Bill which most assuredly is not Home Rule for Ireland. It is not even a Local Government Bill for Ireland, except that the Government, after their manner of putting a Liberal label to palm off their shoddy wares, have put as the title the words "Local Government Bill for Ireland." I think it would be useful to look at the conduct of the Government in the matter of Irish Home Rule. Before the Election the cry on the part of the Government was that there was to be no coercion; there was to be no Home Rule; but there was to be a third course, which was Local Self-Government for Ireland. The present Duke of Devonshire and the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) passed their time stumping the country in support of the Tory Government, and they absolutely said, in relation to this measure of Local Self-Government, that it was to be as generous as that given to England and Scotland. When Parliament met the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) was the Leader of the House, and he made a statement to the House. He said they intended to deal with the question of Local Self-Government, and there was to be similarity and simultaneity in regard to Ireland and England and Scotland. Domestic troubles in the Party opposite led to the retirement of the noble Lord, and so soon as he had withdrawn the Government threw over everything he had said, and had the effrontery to state that what he had said was a mere pious opinion of his own, and did not pledge the Government. I remember the debate, and the noble Lord, in defending himself, pointed out that the words he had used had been written down at the time and submitted to Lord Salisbury and the Cabinet, and absolutely bound Lord Salisbury and the Cabinet. That was, I believe, admitted by the then Leader of the House, the late Mr. Smith. Unquestionably there was a distinct pledge given at the Election that a large measure of Local Self-Government would be given to Ireland and there was further a pledge on the part of the Leader of the Conservative Party in this House that the Conservative Party intended to treat the three countries with similarity and simultaneity. Well, Sir, six years have passed since then, and we have been anxiously waiting for this Local Government Bill for Ireland. The English Bill has been passed, so the Government did not keep their promise of simultaneity. Each year the Bill has been promised, but the promise has not been kept. The Government have had plenty of time, but they have been constantly misusing it, and obstructing themselves by bringing in Bills and withdrawing them. We have been denounced for that obstruction, but it is the old story of the wolf and the lamb. We have hindered bad Bills, and, I trust, shall always continue to do so. There was a certain Wheel and Van Bill, and a Bill to compensate publicans, which we obstructed, and so saved the country a very great deal of money. We—but perhaps I ought to speak for myself—I obstructed the Irish Land Bill of the Government. Why did I do that? Because at the Election the Conservatives and Liberal Unionists distinctly stated that one reason why the right hon. Member for Midlothian ought not to be entrusted with the destinies of this country was that if he were he would possibly bring in an Irish Land Bill, pledging the credit of the English taxpayer; therefore, I considered myself perfectly justified in my obstruction. When the Government bring in a Bill which we can benevolently regard as a good one we help its progress, and endeavour to expand it, and give it a more Liberal character.

The Government has at last made up its mind, and brought in the Local Government Bill for Ireland. But this is the very last Session of this Parliament, and even that is half gone, for the Government have, first on this excuse and then on that, put off the Second Reading of the Bill till a week or so before Whitsuntide. An hon. Gentleman opposite endeavoured to show that this Bill was exactly on the same lines as the English Bill. I shall look to the First Lord of the Treasury, when he addresses the House, to convince him that there is the widest difference between them. There is, however, some excuse for the Government, as the circumstances under which they are obliged to bring in the Bill are very peculiar. The Conservative Party held a great gathering of its followers at Birmingham, and there a resolution in favour of Local Government for Ireland was moved. But somebody moved the previous question and it was carried, so that at that moment the Conservative Party, as represented by that gathering, were entirely opposed to the idea of such a Bill. Then there came the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury which damned the Bill with faint praise, and if I had not been against the Bill before I should have been convinced that it was utterly worthless by the oration made against it by the right hon. Gentleman who brought it in. Why did the Government bring in the Bill? Not to redeem their pledges to the country, which they have perpetually violated; but, I gather, it is because they have given some sort of pledge to the Liberal Unionists, and they are in such terror of the Liberal Unionists turning against them—though I can assure them they will not—that they are ready to do anything or submit to anything when the Liberal Unionists order it. We have a right to know as soon as possible from the First Lord of the Treasury if he intends to go on with the Bill. Is it his deliberate intention that the Session should continue till the Bill is passed? If it is not, it is really a monstrous waste of time that we should be called upon to discuss the Second Reading. The days of the Government are numbered; why are they squandering their last days? This is a death-bed repentance, but they are not sincere even in this. They are in a cleft stick. They have to keep their pledge to the Liberal Unionists, and they have before them the Resolution of the Tory Party at Birmingham; so they have hit upon a device, and hope to get their Party to eat their own words at Birmingham, and to vote for the Second Reading with the clear and distinct understanding that it will be a mere recognition of discipline, and that the measure will really never be turned into an Act. It is playing with the House to ask it to aid in a farce of this nature. I am not going into the merits, or rather the demerits, of the Bill; that is useless. I shall certainly be surprised at the effrontery of anybody who will get up, after the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), and say that the Bill is not as bad a Bill as ever was conceived, and that it is not one of the most gross and impudent of shams when called a Local Government Bill. It is enough for me that the Irish Members do not approve of the Bill. If the Members for Ulster were in a majority in the House I should vote for every proposal they made. As it is I vote with my hon. Friends here, because they represent the majority in Ireland; and what I want to do in this House is, not to pretend that I know better about Ireland than the Irishmen, but to try and find out what the opinion of the majority of Irishmen is and then act upon that opinion. Anyhow, I think it is almost indecent to ask us to go into this Bill now. The election is close at hand, and the country will then be asked if it is in favour of Home Rule or is opposed to it. If it is in favour of Home Rule, evidently we are wasting our time, for it is to an Irish Parliament we shall have to leave the settlement of the Local Government of Ireland. If the country is opposed to Home Rule, so that it is likely to be postponed for some years, no one would force a Bill like this on Ireland, for it would be expanded even by the Tories. The Conservatives were right in their objections to the Bill at Birmingham. You say that the Irish Nationalists are conspiring against the Empire. Do you suppose if the Unionist Party wins at the General Election the efforts to obtain Home Rule for Ireland will cease? No, they will increase, and from the Tory standpoint it is absurd to give them Local Councils which will really be most valuable centres for agitation in favour of Home Rule. The Tories have been called the stupid party, and, in bringing in this Bill, they have amply justified the name. You must either give Ireland Home Rule or rule yourself; trust Ireland or coerce her. I say this because the Prime Minister has just urged a large section of the Irish people to break out into rebellion. I suppose the Prime Minister despairs of victory at the polls, and hesitates to embark the other House in an opposition to the people of England, the result of which would be that they would be swept away from their place; and, therefore, he appeals to the Orangemen to come out and fight for them. I know perfectly well the Prime Minister has denied this, but I think that denial is like that of the person who recommended that a certain man's ears should not be nailed to a post, and then said that he had not advised that anybody's ears should be nailed to the post. We had the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), who said at the last election that "Ulster will fight, and Ulster is right," and that, so far as I can see, in more elaborate and perhaps a little more cautious language, is precisely what the Prime Minister said the other day to the Primrose League ladies. I am always glad to find myself in unison with the Conservative Party, and, assuming their views are those expressed at Birmingham, I am certainly in unison with the Conservative Party, although I arrive at the conclusion on different grounds. The difference between us is that my vote will go with my opinion; their vote will go one way and their opinion the other. The burthen of my remarks is that I want to know from the First Lord of the Treasury whether these proceedings on the Bill are a mere farce, or whether it is intended to press it forward and pass it into law during the present Parliament?

Mr. Labouchere

That is what we want to know; and I think I do not exaggerate when I say that that is what the country, Conservative and Liberal alike, is also anxious to know.

(10.36.) MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): The hon. Member for Northampton has concluded his interesting and amusing speech with a question which I am wholly incapable of answering. Therefore, I pass over his last remarks. Earlier in his speech he appeared before us in a twofold capacity, either of which he is admittedly well entitled to fill. He appeared as a recognised authority upon Constitutional practice, and he posed as the sympathetic friend of the Tory Party. The advice which he offered us in the latter capacity is that of one who has wept over our woes at Birmingham. Upon that I do not propose to follow him. But his advice as a recognised authority on Constitutional practice is very relevant to the subject. The usual practice which is adopted when any measure is put before the country is to accept or reject the principle, and then criticise the details. I ask anybody here who has listened to the Debate on the First Reading of this Bill, or to the eloquent speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast this afternoon, whether that process has been followed? We have had ample criticism of the details of this Bill. The principle has been rejected, I admit; but no reason for rejecting it has been put forward before this House. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton was very anxious to divine our reason for wishing to have the Second Reading of this Bill passed; but it would be far more difficult to discover the reasons that have actuated hon. Gentlemen opposite in wishing to have this Bill read a second time this day six months. Take the eloquent speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast. We had the usual exordium upon the Coercion Act. That was followed by a long prelude, consisting entirely of minute criticism of the various clauses in this Bill. There were some points—many of them good debating points—such as we are accustomed to expect from the hon. Gentleman. In the part about the illiterate vote or the cumulative vote, he seemed to me to mislead the House, though, perhaps, unintentionally. He suggested that the town of Belfast had been excluded from the franchise under this Bill, so that 70,000 Catholics could not obtain power in the Corporation of that town. But it must have occurred to him, on reflection, that that argument would equally apply to Dublin; that Dublin was also excluded from the cumulative vote provision of this Bill, and undoubtedly this provision would have the effect of placing a large number of Unionists upon the Corporation of Dublin. But I pass by these minor points in the major portion of the hon. Gentleman's speech, which would have been more suited to the Committee stage of the Bill. In the only part of it, so far as I could see, in which he gave any prima facie reason to the House for declining to read the Bill a second time, he advanced two such reasons; one only to dismiss it; but he said that, in his opinion, a Home Rule Parliament sitting in Dublin, and such a Parliament alone, could properly frame a system of Local Government for Ireland. But he did not dwell upon that argument, and I think he was well-advised in passing swiftly away from it. If I might be allowed, I should be disposed to remind the House of the attitude taken up by his colleagues when the Local Government Bill for England was introduced into this House. Why, then we heard the amazing statement from the hon. Member for Longford that any man acquainted with Ireland could easily make the English Local Government Bill applicable to that country in the course of two or three hours. We had an equally interesting speech at that time from the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who demanded that the Bill should then and there be made applicable to Ireland, in order to remove county administration from the hands of the Grand Jury. Now, what a light that casts upon the attitude taken by the Nationalist Members in this House! In 1888 they thought that a Bill giving over the administration of county affairs to popularly-elected bodies was one which should be accepted without any consideration for the judicial function of the Grand Jury in Ireland, and that its production to this House should not be delayed for a single moment. The reason adduced by the hon. Gentleman against the reading of this Bill a second time—if it can be called a reason—was the resentment which he felt in his breast against one single clause out of the 72 clauses in this Bill. He came to the clause which grants a petition by appeal. He declined to argue upon that clause, although we were entitled to infer, from the course of the Debate upon the First Reading, from the line of argument, and the gestures of anger which greeted the speech of my right hon. Friend, that if anywhere a reason for refusing to read the Bill a second time was to be found, it was to be found in the clause granting to those who consider themselves aggrieved in Ireland the right to appeal by a petition. Then we have his arguments for proving that this Bill is worthless. In the attempt to prove that it is of little worth the hon. Gentleman employed the rhetorical device of stating that this Bill is the Tory alternative to the policy of Home Rule. I do not think that any Member of the Government or any person of any weight or authority in the Conservative Party has ever upon any platform given the slightest colour of support to any such contention. It is not our alternative scheme to the policy of Home Rule; it is part of the alternative scheme and policy of governing Ireland from Westminster upon the lines which direct the Government of the Imperial Parliament of Westminster in England and Scotland, of extending to Ireland whatever laws are passed for the benefit of England and Scotland, and never allowing to lapse our responsibility for the safety of every class of the community, whether in England, in Ireland, or in Scotland. It is of no avail for hon. Gentlemen opposite to say that some of the safeguards proposed are odious and unnecessary. That is no argument against the proposition we lay down and maintain that the Imperial Parliament at Westminster is responsible and accountable for any wrong that might accrue from our delegating our responsible power to other and subsidiary bodies. That is a fundamental article in the Unionist creed; and it would be as sensible to argue with a family lawyer that in all probability the son about to marry would not neglect to make provision for his children, and to argue that, therefore, such a provision ought not to be incorporated in the marriage settlements. Any one who has listened either to the speeches this afternoon or to the Debate on the Motion for leave to introduce the Bill, would have supposed from the minute criticisms and from the tone of resentment against all precautions and safeguards that Ireland had for years—nay, for generations—enjoyed a system of local government upon the same broad basis of popular representation which exists in England and Scotland at present, and that the wicked Tory Government was bent on introducing precautions which were never heard of hitherto. It is all very well to seek to minimise the importance of this Bill by saying it is not an alternative for Home Rule; but as a matter of fact, the scope and magnitude of this Bill have never been appreciated or touched upon by the hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite. This is the first Bill introduced by any Government in this country granting to Ireland Local Government upon the Parliamentary Franchise. During the Debate on the First Reading I was astonished to hear an interruption from the Benches opposite that this Bill was less liberal in its character than the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Thanet Division in 1879, when he held the office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that sentiment is cheered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, although the Bill introduced in the year 1879 provided only that County Councils and Baronial Councils should be set up in Ireland. And upon what franchise? One-half of all the

Mr. Wyndham

Baronial Councillors were to be elected and one-half of them were to be nominated. And how were the elected members to be elected—upon the Parliamentary Franchise? It did not at that time exist even on this side of the Channel. It was proposed that they were to be elected by the Poor Law Guardians—that is to say, by persons who were themselves elected upon a franchise which has been constantly denounced in this House, and which, in the eyes of hon. Gentlemen opposite, is vitiated by the principle of plural voting. Yesterday there was a Debate in this House on a Bill for introducing the principle of "One Man One Vote." That principle, as well as every other principle of representation which has been extended to England during the last ten years, is embodied in the Bill now before the House. Not one of these principles was embodied in the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Thanet. But I shall take the Bill introduced into this House only four years ago by hon. Gentlemen themselves sitting below the Gangway, and I would point out that the measure which has now been submitted to the consideration of the House is more liberal in its character than the Bill which bore upon its back the names of Mr. Carew, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Harrington, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, and Mr. Maurice Healy. Any one who looks at that Bill and at the tenth clause of it will find that whereas the County Councillors were to be elected upon the Parliamentary Franchise, in every County Council in Ireland there were to be five other members of another class and another category altogether. What was the property qualification that these members should possess? Every one of them was to be one of those Irish Justices of the Peace whose misdeeds hon. Gentlemen opposite never tire of denouncing. They were to be elected by Irish Justices of the Peace, and by Irish Justices of the Peace alone. Now for those who believe in manhood suffrage, and in every sort of electoral reform, and who hold that plurality of voting and the property qualification are accursed things, it seems to me a difficult attitude to defend that in the year

1888, when the English Local Government Bill was before the House with no such provisions, they should have entertained those proposals, and that in the year 1892 they should reject a Bill upon its Second Reading which grants a franchise as liberal as that which now obtains in Great Britain. Why was that provision introduced into the Bill of 1888? It is a question very difficult to answer. I think it admits of only one answer. I think it is plain that the provision implies in the minds of the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway an implicit recognition, at all events that Irish society is not in the same state as English society at the present moment. Why did they introduce that provision unless they thought it wise and prudent in Ireland to give some voice to minorities; unless they thought that in Ireland some check on extravagance should be devised; unless they thought that in Ireland, during times of popular excitement, public bodies might be expected to indulge in acts which afterwards they might be the first persons to regret? If these dangers exist in Ireland—if these apprehensions lurk secretly even in the minds of Irish Nationalist Members—surely we must all know that they exist in an intensified degree in the minds of those gentlemen who speak for the loyal minority in Ireland. Those apprehensions have to be met; those dangers have to be guarded against; and I ask the House candidly to consider which of the two possible kinds of safeguards are really the best and the most liberal in their nature. You may have a safeguard of the kind introduced into the Nationalist Bill of 1888; you may pack your Council; you may have a system of nomination of Aldermen, or of special members elected upon a special franchise, and that will give you a certain degree of safety. But that provision will at all times mar and vitiate the popular character of your Bill, whereas the kind of safeguards introduced into the Bill of the Government need never act at all. During ordinary times they are in abeyance. They are placed there to meet special contingencies which will rarely—some of them perhaps never—arise; and unless these contingencies arise, the Bill introduced by the Government is as liberal and popular in its character as the Bill which now is law in England and in Scotland. In saying that the provisions for safety introduced into our Bill would only come into operation to meet special contingencies and rare emergencies, I may of course contemplate the two clauses around which the most acrimonious discussion has centred. I will not do hon. Gentlemen opposite the injustice to suppose for one moment that they would vote against the Second Reading of this Bill because we withdraw special privileges from illiterate voters or because the system of minority representation has been introduced by the Government into their measure. These are clearly minor matters, which I am sure the hon. Member for West Belfast would be willing to relegate to the Committee stage, and we are left face to face with the Joint Committee and with the clause which hon. Gentlemen like to call the put-them-in-the-dock clause, but which—as hon. Members will agree that there is nothing in a name—they will allow me to call the clause giving the right to petition by appeals. Take the Joint Committee. The Attorney General for Ireland has destroyed a great deal of the criticism brought to bear against this clause by the hon. Member for West Belfast. That hon. Member made a very bold attack upon this clause—ironical, sarcastic, and amusing; but the whole of his attack depended for any force which was in it to the assumption that the Sheriff who will preside over this Joint Committee would be a landlord. He spoke of the Sheriff as the eighth landlord, and then he ingeniously, by putting several parts of the Bill together, brought forward a long catalogue of duties over which this body would have a certain amount of control. But when the Attorney General for Ireland says that the Government have an open mind as to the personality of the Chairman of this Board—and it should have been remembered that this was said by the First Lord of the Treasury in his opening speech—the whole of that criticism falls to pieces and remains of no avail whatever.

It is not possible, upon the ground that the Chairman of that Committee shall be a neutral authority, to pretend that the clause instituting a Joint Committee in Ireland differs materially from the clause instituting a Joint Committee in Scotland. Arguments have been adduced on one side and on the other. It is said that in Scotland the rates are paid by the owner, and that in Ireland they are not. That is against the clause. But for the clause it is said that since the year 1870 the rates are divided in Ireland.

An hon. MEMBER: No, optional.

MR. WYNDHAM: Well, optional. It may also be said that in Ireland every fifteen years rents are revised, and that therefore the burden of the rates is thrown in Ireland every fifteen years on the owner. It may be said further, that since according to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) all grants in aid of rates go into the pockets of landlords, all increase of rates must come out of them. I would also like to put another point, which I hope may commend itself to the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast. That hon. Gentleman is generally very careful in his logic, but this evening he wound up his attack upon the clause by saying that at any rate the Scotch Members had refused it in their Bill, and that it had been imposed upon Scotland by a Tory Government. Yes, but that strengthens our argument for reading this Bill a second time. If Scotland objected to that Bill, if it was imposed upon Scotland by a Tory Government, and Scotland none the less accepted her Local Government Bill, then if anything follows from Irishmen objecting to this clause, and from their being overruled by a Tory Government, and also if they base their objection to the Second Reading of this Bill upon so slight a ground, it is that this Bill should be read a second time. I have given the arguments for this Joint Committee, not in the hope of convincing hon. Gentlemen opposite, but in order to show that a great deal may be urged on both sides, and that therefore this clause constitutes a legitimate ground for discussion in Committee. It does not constitute any ground which would justify them in refusing to read this Bill a second time. There is another clause which has given rise to a great deal of adverse criticism. Here I have no argument to meet, but only the repudiation of the hon. Member for West Belfast. I refer to the clause which he rejected with scorn, and which, in his opinion, as I have proved by a process of exhaustion, constitutes the sole ground for the action which he now proposes to take. It is incredible that Parliament should forgo on such a ground this opportunity of fixing its imprimatur upon the unanimous belief that Ireland is now not only entitled, but ready to receive, Local Government upon the same popular basis as obtains in Great Britain. Surely we should all welcome such an opportunity of testifying such a fact. It will inflict no practical disadvantage upon either Party. Hon. Gentlemen opposite will be at liberty to argue from it that Home Rule is all the more likely to succeed in the future; hon. Gentlemen on this side will be able to argue from it that Unionism has proved a success in the past. Let me now for one moment consider the scorn, the ridicule, and the repudiation which have been directed against this clause, to grant to these persons who in Ireland think themselves oppressed the right to an appeal, which will be tried, on a prima facie case being made out, by two Judges on the rota of appeal. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are sometimes very frank about the condition of Ireland. One of the most distinguished among them wrote an article a few days ago in the Fortnightly Review, in which he foresaw that some proceedings of elected bodies in the past might be adduced in defence of the clause, and he discounted them by saying that they were mere incidents in a social and political war, incidents in a revolution which was then on foot. It is the business of the Imperial Parliament at Westminster, if social war arises in any part of the Queen's dominions, to see that the fighting shall not be all on one side, and that those who suffer from such incidents shall have an adequate means of redress. Whether many persons are likely so to suffer can be judged by an incident which has occurred recently in Ireland. A very distinguished Member of the Irish Nationalist Party, though not a Member of this House, has during the last few weeks had occasion to seek redress at the hands of the law for what he deemed, and probably rightly, a gross libel upon his reputation for commercial honesty. In this no Party or political question was involved. He went before a jury to ask them to vindicate him and to clear him of a charge of commercial dishonesty. He was unwilling to accept a jury in the Town or County of Dublin, or in the Town of Belfast. ("No, no!") Then the other side was unwilling to accept a jury in the County of Louth.

MR. J. MORLEY: He accepted the County of Dublin.

MR. WYNDHAM: He was unwilling to accept a jury of the County of Dublin.

MR. J. MORLEY: No, I beg pardon. He did accept it.

MR. WYNDHAM: He was obliged to accept it. I have the facts very clearly in my memory. An appeal was lodged against the decision of the Court that the venue should be changed from the Town to the County of Dublin. That appeal was lost, and he was obliged to accept the county. These facts show the distrust in the minds of both sections of the Nationalist Party of juries of their fellow countrymen on a question involving private honour and the commercial honesty of a gentleman, and no question of politics. What should we say if in England it was possible when someone say, in the position of Mr. Schnadhorst or Mr. Middleton, were assailed in his private character and said he feared he would not receive justice from a jury, not because they belonged to the opposite Political Party, but because he had reason to believe that a majority on that jury differed from him as to the priority of Home rule in the Newcastle programme? This case shows very strongly the distrust in the minds of both sections of the Irish Party of juries of their fellow-countrymen, even on questions altogether divorced from politics.

MR. SEXTON: Special juries.

MR. WYNDHAM: Very well, special juries. What then, I ask, must be the legitimate apprehension of an Irishman who is not a Nationalist at all, but who belongs to the far smaller minority, who in the past have received only too little consideration from either half of the majority who outnumber them by thousands? Such a man must view with apprehension any Bill for granting Local Government to Ireland; and having regard to the legitimate fears of such men, no Government would be wise to introduce a measure deficient of any safeguards for their protection. I am not prepared to deny that there is, to some extent, a humorous side to the matter. It came out in the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast. But, outside an opera by Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan, I have never heard of an indignant repudiation of a safeguard by a gentleman whom it was never intended to protect by it. Such a protest should come from those who consider themselves aggrieved rather than from the aggressors. The mingled mirth and indignation, partly hysterical and partly histrionic, with which the clause has been received has induced many persons, myself among the number, who were at first disposed to question the necessity for the clause, to believe now that possibly there may be another side to the question altogether. I am still of the opinion that the clause is likely to be only rarely used, if at all; but it does not follow, therefore, that it will be useless. It will act as a deterrent, and it may be of some use to the hon. Member for West Belfast. The hon. Member and his colleagues are constantly arrogating to themselves the right to speak in the name of all

Ireland. Well, in this clause they will have something to which they can point in order to allay the fears of the million and a half of their countrymen who still tremble at the thought of being brought under their rule. If there is justification for the Bill, hon. Members opposite ought to be the first to welcome it; and if there is no justification they ought to despise it. But can they afford to despise a Bill which will grant Local Government to Ireland upon the same Parliamentary franchise as exists in England? What other argument has been urged against the Bill? It has been said that it leaves the Grand Jury system untouched, as well as the Grand Jury's power to grant compensation in case of malicious injury. Hon. Members opposite are fond of quoting cases of alleged injustice arising from this power possessed by the Grand Jury; but I will claim every such instance as an additional ground for passing this Bill. Every such miscarriage of justice can only be quoted in support of one of two Motions—in support of a Motion for withdrawing that duty from the Grand Jury, or in support of a Motion for withdrawing County Government from the hands of the Grand Jury in order that it may be carried out by a body more fully enjoying the confidence of the people. The first Motion is not before the House, but the second is, and therefore every case of injustice quoted can only be an additional ground for reading the Bill a second time. Hon. Gentlemen opposite who represent English constituencies are fond of insisting that the voice of Ireland ought to be listened to, and they point to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, saying:—"Whether your Bill is good or bad, it is not a Bill which the voice of Ireland is prepared to accept." Now, I should be the last to assert that the voice of Ireland ought not to be listened to with respect in the House of Commons; but when that voice is utterly condemnatory of Unionist measures, it is wise to listen to it with a little sceptical reserve. Not unfrequently during the last few years have Irish Members been heard denouncing a Bill at one time, acclaiming it a year afterwards, and still later assisting to perfect and amend its provisions. That was the story of the Irish Famine Fund. In 1890 the Irish Party, with the regular Opposition, voted for the rejection of the Bill. Eight months later both Parties voted in favour of reading it a second time. On this occasion the first of those scenes is being reproduced, and the second will also be reproduced in due time. Whatever changes and chances the General Election may have in store, the Irish Members will soon be heard explaining away their ingenious objections to the Bill, and marching into the Lobby with the occupants of the Front Bench. That may suit the purposes of Irish Members, but it is a painful spectacle, nevertheless. It is all very well to admire flexibility and adaptability in public life; but it is not an elevating spectacle to see, as on the occasion of the introduction of the present Bill, ex-Cabinet Ministers straining in the leash, or sitting in blind complacency, till they learn from the gestures and inarticulate cries of their Leaders below the Gangway what course they must take. I had hoped that they would have thrown off the yoke for once, and have anticipated one of the evolutions which hon. Members from Ireland think necessary in the face of Unionist legislation. If it were only in commiseration of the less supple Members of the opposite Party, hon. Members from Ireland might forgo this farce of alternate repudiation and acclamation. I shall count confidently on the support of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who, with a few sturdy Radicals, refused to vote for the Second Reading of the Land Purchase Bill. If they are consistent in their hatred of State purchase, they ought also to be consistent in their belief in the wonder-working power of representative institutions. But should none of those who are opposed to the Government vote for the Bill it will not matter very much, except as regards their reputations for political foresight and candour. The Bill is certain to be read a second time, for the Unionist Party have a majority in the House.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Till the next Election.

MR. WYNDHAM: I believe they have also a majority in the country.

MR. MAC NEILL: Not so certain.

MR. WYNDHAM: At all events, all Unionists, whether inside or outside the House, will acclaim this opportunity of at once vindicating the success of their policy in Ireland and of discharging a debt of honour.

*MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE (Leeds, W.): My hon. Friend has spoken with his usual eloquence and ability, and I am surprised that his eloquence and ability on behalf of this Bill, great as it was, did not seem to receive that enthusiastic applause on his own side which might have been expected. I do not doubt that the speech, as an intellectual effort, was fully appreciated; but I think my hon. Friend will agree with me that when he was arguing the details of the Bill, hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House were ominously silent. The hon. Gentleman was rather in doubt as to the motives which induced hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House to oppose the Bill, but I am bound to say that he gave no particular reason why the Bill should be supported. In attempting to make a parallel between this Bill and the Irish Land Purchase Bill of last year, he told us that we were always quoting the Irish voice and offering to abide by it. There is no parallel, however, in the case brought forward by my hon. Friend. In the case of the Land Purchase Bill, a large sum of money was affected, and about which English Members had every bit as much right to speak and vote as Irish Members. And we all voted according to our convictions in regard to that Bill. But we assert that this Bill deals with purely Irish questions, and it is essential that the views of Ireland should be considered in the case of such a measure. I will tell the hon. Member why I intend to oppose this Bill. I intend to oppose the Bill not only because I consider it a bad Bill, but also because I consider it an insufficient Bill; and I further think it does not fulfil the solemn promise made by gentlemen opposite in regard to Ireland. It was laid down by a distinguished predecessor of the First Lord of the Treasury, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord R. Churchill), not alone on the occasion when he used the words "similarity and simultaneity," but also on the 14th September, 1887, that the problem of Local Government in Ireland

"called for the most careful consideration of the Government with a view to its development as far as might be in accordance with Irish ideas and Irish desires."

I want to know where in this Bill can you find "Irish ideas and Irish desires"? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wyndham) has said that by a process of exhaustion he has brought down the opposition of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) to resentment against a single clause of the Bill. I do not agree with him, and I will show the reason why. It is true that the hon. Member for West Belfast attacked this Bill very considerably in detail, and it is absolutely essential that we should attack this Bill in that manner, because throughout its many clauses you find almost every clause pervaded, and limited by the system of checks introduced by the First Lord of the Treasury. These checks in themselves constitute a most important element in the Bill, and compel us to look to individual clauses. And I would remind the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham), when he says these are only details, to carry his mind back to 1886, when the Government of Ireland Bill was before the House—a Bill attacked in every detail, and a Bill which was opposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and many gentlemen on this side of the House not because of the principle of the Bill, but on account of the details in the clauses. I pass on to the speech of the Attorney General for Ireland. We have had a formal attack upon this Bill by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast, and we have had its official defence from the Attorney General. And I maintain that my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast has proved the proposition he put forward—proved, as he said, that the Government were applying different principles to Ireland to the principles they applied to the question of Local Government in England and in Scotland. I say that in his powerful speech he fully proved that proposition. But let me run through a few of the points which the hon. Gentleman brought forward, and let me notice, too, the speech with regard to these points, of the Attorney General for Ireland. I say that the Attorney General's speech confirms in a great measure the attack made upon the Bill by the hon. Member for West Belfast. First of all, there was the attack on account of the disfranchisement entailed by the exclusion of the twenty-sixth section of the Ballot Act. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that that was so, and attempted to justify it, and apparently did justify it, by the result of the Division taken last week. It was a curious way of anticipating a verdict of the House; but where is the equality? There is the check, there is the difference which you do not find in the English Act; and there is difference No. 1, inequality No. 1. Then we come to the cumulative vote. The right hon. Gentleman did not argue in respect of that. There was very little difference between the Member for Dublin University and the Member for West Belfast, because they both seemed to desire the same end. Thirdly, there is the question of the size of the constituencies. On the one side; you have a determination as far as practicable by Statute; on the other, the size is left to the option of the Lord Lieutenant. Fourthly, there is the question of the Belfast franchise. These two points the right hon. Gentleman dismissed as details. He said "these are details," and the Chief Secretary (Mr. Jackson) cheers that! But when shall we get an opportunity of going into these details? When shall we come to the Committee stage? I should very much like information on that point from my right hon. Friend, because we do not believe we shall get an opportunity of going into these questions. And as we want to make out our case against this Bill before the country, believing we shall get no further opportunity, we intend to make good use of our time now, and to examine the Bill in detail. Fifthly, we come to the question of compensation for malicious injuries. The only defence the Attorney General offered to this was, "We just leave the matter where it stands." He admitted that it would be unfortunate to transfer that power to the County Council, but he did not defend the action of the Government in leaving the matter where it was. Sixthly, there is the question of the Standing Joint Committee. The Attorney General did not deny the allegations of the hon. Member for West Belfast in regard to the powers of interference of that Committee. Then, seventhly, as to the question of the Sheriff—which is all-important in this connection—what did the right hon. Gentleman say? He said the Sheriff would be a very bad officer to preside over the Standing Joint Committee, but that the Government did not know a better official to put there, and that he would be very glad of a suggestion on the subject from any part of the House. This is one of the numerous checks in the Bill, and the Attorney General said Irishmen had very short memories, that they easily made friends, and that the checks would be soon forgotten. But I say that these checks in themselves constitute an inequality. The Attorney General may argue as he likes; but, as he himself said, argument is not fact, and the fact remains that these checks do constitute a gross inequality between the measure you are giving to Ireland and those you have given to England and Scotland. Eighthly, the County Councils are to be restricted from entering into legal proceedings. Is not that a difference? And I will ask the Chief Secretary whether that does not constitute an inequality as compared with England and Scotland?

MR. JACKSON: The County Councils cannot enter into legal proceedings without the consent of the Joint Committee.

*MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: Is the consent of the Joint Committee necessary in the case of the Local Government Acts for England and Scotland? Is not that an inequality? Ninthly, I come to the question which the right hon. Member euphoniously calls petition by appeal, and one of the most extraordinary points in connection with that proposal is this—that, supposing County Councils are suppressed by the Judges power is given to the Lord Lieutenant to re-nominate fresh County Councillors. The Attorney General quoted in his speech the case of Election Petitions in England. I will ask the Attorney General whether in the case of Judges who try an Election Petition in England and find corruption, and that it is necessary to disfranchise a borough, power is given to the Judges to nominate fresh Members. The power is left to the constituencies themselves, and hence I say that there is no force in the argument of the Attorney General. Tenthly, there is the question of the police, and what is the argument of the Attorney General? He maintains that Ireland in respect to the police is treated in identically the same way as England and Scotland under the Local Government Act. But there is the greatest difference in the world. One has to distinguish between the police in London, the police in the boroughs, and the police in the county districts. With regard to the police in London, we hold that it is a very unsatisfactory arrangement, and hope it will very soon be altered; but the Home Secretary, who is practically the head of the police in London, is sitting here in his place in London and can answer to us at once with regard to them. There is no analogy between the management of the police in London and the management of the police in Ireland. Then there is the question of the borough police, and these we know are under the control of the Local Authorities. Do you propose to give the control of the police in Ireland to the boroughs? No; and there is a gross inequality at once. Let us come to the counties. In Scotland the county police are under the control of Commissioners of Supply, and in England under that of the Quarter Sessions. Both these authorities are local, knowing the wants of the localities, being in touch with the people, and, to a great extent, under their influence. Under recent legislation the County Councils have been associated with those Public Bodies in the management of the police. Is there any analogy between that case and the case of Ireland? We see that while in a large part of England the management of the police is entirely in the hands of the Local Authorities, and while in the counties it is only partly in the hands of non-elected authorities, in Ireland you absolutely place the control of the police of the country under the strict control of Dublin Castle. This question of the police is something more than a detail. There is a gross inequality proved to exist, and the arguments of the Attorney General for Ireland in this respect are perfectly futile. Thus having regard to these ten points the Attorney General for Ireland in his speech practically confirmed the attack of the Member for West Belfast, and where he did argue, as on the question of the police, his arguments were not founded upon facts. We have two charges against the Government, first of all with regard to the delay in bringing in this Bill; and, secondly, with regard to its inadequacy and badness. With regard to delay; the First Lord of the Treasury admitted not long ago that Gentlemen on that side of the House were pledged to a scheme of local self-government for Ireland, that this Bill was brought in in fulfilment of their pledges. It was because hon. Members were so pledged that the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) made his famous speech in 1886, and it was because of that fact that the question of Irish Local Government was mentioned in the Queen's Speech of 1887. But let us follow this out a little, for it seems to me that the Attorney General for Ireland, who did not, I think, enter this House till two or three years after the last General Election, did not quite grasp the situation with regard to the history of this question. Well, the noble Lord the Member for Paddington retired from the Government. We all know that the noble Lord was a keen supporter of a scheme for the self-government for Ireland. But when he retired from the Government the question of Irish Local Government retired from the Queen's Speech for the next two years. During these years precedence was given to every kind of measure of which no mention had been made at the General Election. Precedence was given to the Wheel and Van Tax, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal for the Compensation of Publicans, for absurd Bills like the Sugar Bill, and the Bill seeking to constitute an Under Secretary for Ireland, which occupied a great deal of time, and were then abandoned as hopeless by the Government itself. In 1890 the question of Irish Local Government again appears in the Queen's Speech; but again precedence is given to such matters as the Light Railway Bill for Ireland—a good Bill, I admit—but I ask any hon. Member on the other side to tell me what mention was made of it before the General Election of 1886. Then there was the Western Australia Bill. The Government were ready to give a Constitution to Western Australia, but were very quick to deny it to Ireland. There was also the question of the Suck Drainage. All these measures, never heard of before, took precedence of that measure to which every Gentleman on the other side was bound by his pledges at the Election of 1886. Again, in 1891 mention is made of this question, and precedence that year was given to Land Purchase—a subject which was mentioned in 1886, only to be denounced by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite; and though they were pledged to oppose such a Bill, they brought it forward, and gave the go-by to the measure to which they were pledged. Then we come to 1892, the last Session, and at last we have the Bill specifically mentioned, and specifically brought forward. Why in the last Session of this Parliament? If instead of the Septennial Act you had an Act keeping Parliaments alive for fourteen years, we should have had this Bill brought forward in the thirteenth Session, because the sixth or the thirteenth give the best opportunity for shelving the Bill altogether; and the Bill has been deliberately kept by Her Majesty's Government for the last Session, because they knew that in this Session they would have the best chance of not passing it. In the second place, we say that this Bill is inadequate, and that its provisions are bad. It is bad in itself; it is bad relatively to the promises made in 1886 with regard to it, and judged by these it is a fraud on the constituencies. The Tories deliberately led the country to believe, when they were seeking to be returned to Parliament in 1886, that they had in contemplation for Ireland a large measure which was to be the alternative to the scheme of Home Rule; but now the Attorney General for Ireland holds up his hands in horror at this idea, and he suggests that Home Rule and this Bill areas light to darkness. Then it is also said by the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham) that this is not an alternative scheme, but only part of an alternative scheme which I understand would be applicable to both England and Scotland. What is this alternative scheme? A small measure of Local Government, and a very large measure of coercion! I should like to see you apply that alternative to either England or Scotland. The Attorney General for Ireland took care to say that this is a very small and unimportant measure. I would ask him whether it has dwindled in its proportions since 1887? If it was unimportant, why was it mentioned in the very first Queen's Speech of this Parliament?

Mr. MADDEN: I did not say that. I said it was comparatively unimportant.

Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE: Comparatively to what?

Mr. MADDEN: To Home Rule.

Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE: I am glad the right hon. and learned Gentleman attaches so much importance to Home Rule. But we were told by the Chief Secretary only a short time ago that this measure was a cardinal part of the Conservative policy. If so,

Mr. Herbert Gladstone

I do not see that it can be even a relatively unimportant measure. The Attorney General for Ireland, I am persuaded, would not say anything that he did not believe to be strictly true, but has he a clear idea of the speeches that were made in 1886 to the constituencies? What was the action of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? Either in 1885 he gave to the country a gross misstatement with regard to what was the system of government in Ireland, or else for six years he has acquiesced in the maintenance in Ireland of a system of government which is tyrannical and unconstitutional. The right hon. Gentleman, even after the Home Rule crisis of 1886, was in favour of a Statutory Parliament in Dublin. He led his friends to believe that a large measure would be brought in. Then there was the noble Lord who was at that time Member for Rossendale. Lord Hartington spoke of—"A great and bold re-construction of the Government of Ireland from which he would not shrink."

This Bill is a specimen of great and bold re-construction of the Government of Ireland. He was "Ready to give equally, and, if a case could be made out for it, in a greater, further, and more generous degree to Ireland, what was given to England and to Scotland."

Then there was the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who will, no doubt, remember his speeches in Edinburgh. He set up the alternative the existence of which the Attorney General for Ireland now denies, and he said—

"To the assertion that there is no other choice than to accept the Government plan or to fall back upon simple oppression, the opponents of the Bill give a point-blank denial. I am an advocate of a large measure of decentralisation."

Is this a large measure of decentralisation? Then there was one other speech to which I will refer—that of the Prime Minister—and his speech is to this effect, as reported in June, 1886—

"For a good system of Local Government for England, Scotland, and Ireland he was always an advocate, and he believed that the extension of Local Government to Ireland would be a great advantage."

He went on to admit that the withholding of a good scheme of local self-government constituted a special grievance to Ireland. Well, in all these speeches the Irish question is dwelt upon as a matter of the first importance. There is no mention in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or of the Prime Minister of such questions as Land Purchase, or Allotments, or Small Holdings, or the numerous measures which have been offered us by the present Government. The Irish question was to have priority. An alternative settlement was to be offered which would not involve coercion but which would involve the granting to Irishmen such powers of local self-government as they might reasonably expect. I say then without hesitation, that if the right hon. Gentlemen opposite in 1886 had said to the electors, "We are opposed to Home Rule; our policy is to bring in a measure of perpetual coercion, and we shall postpone any measure for local self-government to the indefinite future"—then I say the constituencies even then, six years ago, would have preferred the policy of the Liberal Party to their policy thus honestly put forward. But the right hon. Gentlemen misled the electors in 1886. They promised one thing to catch one set of votes, and now they break that promise to catch another set. Since 1886 you have constantly asserted that you were going to deal with Ireland on terms of precise equality with England and Scotland, but we have proved there are grave inequalities on many points. Then in speeches made at bye-elections, while hon. Gentlemen have been saying one thing to electors the Government were determined to do another thing in this House. Now we are told the Bill will be of advantage to Ireland, because it will train the Irish people in habits of local self-government. Well, if this is so, why was not the Bill brought forward six years ago, so that Irishmen might have been trained in self-government under the wisdom and experience of the First Lord of the Treasury? The Government have never been in earnest in this matter. This is proved by constant leading articles in the journals supporting the Government. The Times and Standard refused to believe that any Bill would be brought forward that would not be mischievous; they hoped for the best, but they urged the Government to drop the measure and to bring forward measures for England. What habits of local self-government will this Bill form for Irishmen? You do not put any responsibility upon them in the Bill; the Bill carries with it no sense of responsibility. Who has asked for the Bill—what section of Irishmen has asked for it? We believe that no section in Ireland requires it. Hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House are opposed to it. Hon. Gentlemen from the North of Ireland sitting on the other side of the House speak in a half-hearted way about the Bill. Who discussed the Bill in preparation? Who settled it? It was drawn, drafted, and prepared in Dublin Castle according to the lights of Dublin Castle, that birthplace of so many ill-fated measures for the government of Ireland. There is no mandate for this Bill. We heard a great deal in 1886 about there being no mandate for the legislation then proposed, and that was one of the arguments used against the Bill at that time. If that argument had weight in 1886, why has it not now? There is no mandate for the provisions in this Bill; they are wholly different to what we were led to expect or what was promised. Under what conditions will this Bill work? See what the Prime Minister says of the condition of Ireland, and have this in mind in relation to this settlement under the Bill. He says—

“The British colony which went to the North of Ireland 200 years ago is still unchanged, and what the Ulster people dread is being put under the despotism of their hereditary enemies.”

That is the spirit the Prime Minister believes exists in Ireland, and he goes on to say—

“There exists the bitterest feeling of hostility between the two communities.”

This is the language of the Prime Minister, and imagine a Joint Committee at work if such is really the position in Ireland! Seven elected representatives from the County Council and seven non-elected representatives of the dominant minority, the two hostile communities. I pity the Sheriff who has to preside, if the descriptions of the Prime Minister and the First Lord are correct as to the state of Ireland. These gentlemen will not meet as colleagues, as representatives of people seeking the common good. The one section will represent the people, coming from the people with all the force and authority of representatives, and the other section will simply be the check to impede, retard, and pull back the representatives of the people. Seven representatives on either side of what the Prime Minister calls hostile communities, animated by feelings of the bitterest hostility. And this is the solution of the great Irish problem according to the proposal before us. This Bill will produce a system which will not be a bond of union, but a certain cause of difference. Your scheme is preposterous from beginning to end. It will produce no good in Ireland, and what good effect will it have here in Westminster? Irish business for many years has occupied at least two-fifths of the available debating time of the House with matters relating to the land question, to law and order, and so on. Does the Bill remove any of the grievances which have led to endless discussions in this House? It does not remove a single one of these questions, and it sets up other points of friction in the action of Local Bodies, and provides for Irish Members and their friends an almost endless series of points for discussion and an almost unlimited occupation of Parliamentary time. One of the great arguments for Local Government is the relief of the Imperial Parliament. This Bill will add to the burden on the House. It is idle, it is useless, to pass a measure like this against the opposition of the Irish Members. I say the whole of this Debate is unreal from beginning to end. The Government do not want this Bill, their supporters do not want it, and, we believe, the Government do not mean to pass it. If they had such an intention, why did they summon Parliament a week later than usual; why did they give us an abnormally long Easter vacation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not abnormally long.

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: But still, a long Easter vacation—longer than the Government would have given had they been in earnest about this Bill. Why, too, did they give precedence to measures never heard of before this Session? What mandate was there for the Small Holdings Bill? The Home Secretary laughs—perhaps he can enlighten us? We know that he and his friends denounced such a measure when they sought the votes of their constituents. We remember, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does, the speeches of the President of the Board of Agriculture, and we remember the feeling displayed on that side of the House in regard to the question. Why then has precedence been given to a measure the Government denounced a few years ago? I shall vote against this Bill, because it is a bad Bill; because it is opposed to Irish ideas; because it is a sham, a pretended fulfilment of promises; because it is the outcome of a whole course of unprecedented political deception.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Debate be now adjourned.”
—(Mr. Macartney.)

(11.57.) SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I object to the adjournment. The hon. Member who has just sat down says there is no reality about the Debate, and I perfectly agree with him. It is a scandalous waste of time, and the sooner it is over the better.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 20th May, 1892.

SAT FIRST.

The Earl of Berkeley, after the death of his father

POWERS) BILL [H.L.]
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee according to Order.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, there are some Amendments which stand in my name on the Paper, and I wish in a few words to explain why they are there. I have no interest personally in Water Companies—my interests are as a consumer; but the Water Companies came to me and said that there were several provisions in the Bill which they thought would materially affect their interests, and which are unnecessary in the interests of consumers, and they have asked me, therefore, to propose certain Amendments.

Clause 3.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, the first Amendment that I have to propose is on page 1, line 12, after "Company" insert "and Local Authority"; to leave out the words, "which is a trading Company"; and in line 13 to leave out "for profit." My Lords, I do not propose to press that Amendment on this occasion; I shall reserve it for a later stage of the Bill. It is an important point in principle, for this Bill, as it at present stands, applies to Water Companies, and does not apply to Municipal Authorities or Local Authorities who deal in water. It appears to me a very important principle; but I merely wish to call your Lordships' attention to it, as I shall feel it my duty, at a later stage of the Bill, to move this Amendment.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Why should not the noble Lord move his Amendment at this stage of the Bill? He has given notice of it.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Because he prefers to do it at a later stage.

VOL. IV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Question put, "That this Clause stand part of the Bill."

LORD HERSCHELL: The noble Earl has certainly raised a very important question, namely, why these provisions, which are intended for the protection of consumers, should apply only to Companies, and should not apply to Corporations who have taken over the power of supplying water. I should like to hear the views of the noble Lord (Earl of Camperdown) as to the reason for his having so limited the clause.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: It is difficult for me to make a speech, because after the noble Earl has given notice of the Amendment and I have come down to answer it he does not move it.

LORD HERSCHELL: But I have asked the noble Earl for an explanation, on the question that the clause stand part of the Bill.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, as the noble Earl does not move his Amendment at the stage for which he has given notice, I must give him notice that if he moves it in the Grand Committee, I shall object to it at that stage; because the House placed the Grand Committee stage of the Bill after the Committee of the whole House in order that Amendments of substance should be moved in this House; and therefore, if an Amendment of substance is deliberately postponed in this House after notice has been given that it was going to be moved, I certainly shall object to its being moved in an irregular manner outside the House. With regard to the answer to my noble Friend who was lately Lord Chancellor, and who wishes to know whether I should object to the provision, yes, my Lords, I should object, and for these reasons: In the first place, Corporations never have been comprehended within the limits of the Bill, and if they were to be comprehended it would be necessary that notice should be given to them, and that they should be heard like all the other parties have been heard who are comprehended. In the second place, Corporations differ from Water Companies, because they are public bodies who are elected, and whose consumers are the ratepayers by whom they are elected; so that, in the event of their doing anything improper in the way of cutting off water without due reason, they would be responsible to their constituents, and there would be a public means of obtaining a remedy against them which private consumers have not against private Water Companies. In the next place, Corporations have no personal object to serve; they do not derive any profit from the supply of water; and they have not the same inducements therefore to cut off improperly, or to make improper charges, that private companies have; and further, no complaints have been made against them—they were not made to us in the Select Committee; and if hereafter any Corporation shall behave improperly in these respects then, on complaint being made, it will be competent to pass a Bill to place them under the same restrictions as I now propose to place private Water Companies under.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not wish to anticipate discussion hereafter on some Motion by the noble Earl; but, with regard to what your Lordships have heard from the noble Earl who has just spoken, I would say that some of those interested in the Bill have brought to my notice what occurred in the Borough of Cardiff. It appears there that the Corporation were in the habit of cutting off the supply in a manner objected to by those who bring forward the Bill; subsequently they determined that they would not cut off the supply, and they went upon the lines that this Bill provides, that Water Companies should be compelled to proceed upon a notice. They did not, however, find that satisfactory, and they have again determined to cut off the supply hereafter. Now it would be an awkward thing that that abuse, if it be an abuse, should be put an end to in the minority of large towns that are supplied by Water Companies, and left in those other large towns which are supplied by Corporations.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Can the noble Earl tell me for what purpose the supply was cut off, because that determines the whole point?

The Earl of Camperdown

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The object was to secure the payment of the water rate.

On Question put:

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I move as an Amendment on page 2, line 5 after "note" to insert "except when furnished in respect of water supplied solely under agreement or by meter." As the clause stands, it might be argued that persons supplied by agreement have the right to object under Clause 6. The purpose of this Bill is only to affect cases of supply under agreement to this amount: that persons supplied by agreement must receive a demand note. Further than that this Bill does not interfere between the Water Company and the consumer in that case; and to make it quite clear that persons are not to have that right of objection I propose to insert those words.

Moved, in Clause 4, page 2, line 5, after "note" insert "except when furnished in respect of water supplied solely under agreement or by meter."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

On Question, agreed to.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I fully admit that it is right and reasonable that the details of this demand note should be given, but, after the note has been given, as the Bill stands, a person liable for water rate to whom the note is sent has twenty-one days to consider the items of that note; and then, supposing he is dissatisfied, fourteen days must elapse before the water can be cut off, which makes a total of thirty-five days. The Water Companies say that there are many persons who hold on to the very last in their houses, and often bolt when they are obliged to pay. At present the custom is to send a demand for the water rate every half year; but this clause will entail their doing that, to the inconvenience of many, every quarter, and the Companies think the time given for consideration should be reduced. My Motion is to reduce it to seven days. I believe my noble Friend is willing to accept fourteen as a compromise between seven and twenty-one.

I have also an Amendment afterwards, that instead of fourteen there should be only seven days allowed during which the Company cannot cut off.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, in considering any matter connected with this Bill your Lordships must always remember the present state of the law. The law does not require that the article shall be furnished beforehand. On the contrary, the law says that the debt shall arise before the article is furnished. Therefore even supposing thirty-five days were to elapse before the supply could be cut off, that lapse of time would only mean that an article might be cut off which should have been paid for for three months, but which had been supplied up to thirty-five days only. That is the utmost to which the complaint of my noble Friend could extend. With regard to the substance of his Amendment, namely, as to the duration of time of appeal, I have been considering whether I could shorten the period which was fixed by the Select Committee. Every line and word of the Bill was very carefully considered, and we arrived at these various times of twenty-one days and fourteen days; but still I do not see why a man who wishes to raise an objection might not be able to do it in fourteen days. I think seven days would be far too short a period—he might be away from home, or he probably would wish to consult his solicitor. On the whole I am content to go below the recommendation of the Select Committee, and accept fourteen days instead of twenty-one, provided that my noble Friend will also agree to leave the duration of fourteen days for the cutting off notice.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Say ten days, for cutting off.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: No.

Moved in page 2, line 8, leave out "twenty-one" and insert "fourteen."
—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

On Question, agreed to.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: As regards Sub-section 2, where the amount is defined as £20, I wish to ask the noble Earl whether a rather serious inconvenience will not arise in this case. It is often the fact that there may be a house where the water rate chargeable upon it is more than £20, but there are stables which are practically attached to the house, but are charged as separate premises. Will there not in that case be two demand notes, one half-yearly and one quarterly, for what is part of the same payment? At the present time in such cases the demand note is sent in including both sets of premises.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I am afraid in that case the inconvenience exists in the present arrangement.

LORD HERSCHELL: No, I think not.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: If the premises are not separate—if, for instance, one is said to be in a certain street, and the other in a certain mews—I am afraid the difficulty must arise owing to the arrangements that the Rating Authorities, whoever they are, have made.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I can assure my noble Friend that I have personal experience that no such inconvenience does arise, because the Water Company, being under no stress to make a difference, invariably include the whole thing in one demand note, specifying that one part is for one set of premises and the other part for the other.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: That is a point that I should be perfectly ready to meet from a practical point of view. I rather doubt whether the question would arise. I imagine that the Company would follow its present practice—namely, to send in its claim in regard to your premises, and as those premises would be rated above £20, so there would be no claim in the same way as at present; but I will inquire into the point.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think the practice must differ in regard to different parishes wherein the house is situated. My experience is not the same as the noble Earl's (the Earl of Kimberley). I receive separate rates for my house and for my stables, both in respect of gas, water, and rates.

LORD HERSCHELL: My experience is the same as that of my noble Friend. I never get but one note, specifying one single sum.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I have to move to leave out lines 22 to 32 inclusive. The clause with those lines in draws a distinction that appears to be needless between houses under £20 and houses above £20. The protection which is given at present in the case of houses below £20 appears to be quite sufficient in the case of houses above £20. The Amendment would simply save needless trouble and expense to the Water Companies in the matter of demand notes. I hope my noble Friend will assent to the Amendment.

Moved, to leave out lines 22 to 32 inclusive.—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: This point was very carefully considered in the Select Committee. It was stated by the Water Companies that if they were required always to send in a statement of particulars to small houses it would throw upon them a very undue amount of labour; therefore after consideration we agreed to make a limit below which they should only be obliged to issue a statement of particulars at certain definite times. But I do not see that that is any reason why large houses should not receive their demand note with the particulars upon it regularly; and I think my noble Friend, instead of saying what reason is there for not accepting the Amendment, ought to show us some positive reason for accepting it.

Amendment negatived.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I move in line 37 after "the" to insert "amount charged as stated in the," simply to make the clause more intelligible. As it at present reads there would be no alteration made in the last statement,—it would be in the amount. I do not think my noble Friend can object to that. It is a mere verbal alteration, to make the object of my noble Friend more clear.

Moved, in line 37 after "the" to insert "amount charged as stated in the."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I think my noble Friend has not fully appreciated what the object is. It is to obtain a statement of the particulars of charge. If you say that an alteration shall be made in the amount, that will not meet the object of the Bill. What I wish should be made clear in the case of these small houses is that when any alteration is made in any particular a statement should be sent in to show to the person that change and what it is.

Amendment negatived.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, the next Amendment I have is on page 3, at the end of the Clause to strike out lines 8, 9 and 10. If this Bill becomes an Act, it will apply mostly to trade, and all these matters are in the agreement, and I do not think it is desirable to interfere with agreements in matters of trade more than is necessary. I am told it is not really necessary, and will be more or less an unnecessary interference with trade.

Moved, on page 3, to leave out lines 8, 9 and 10.—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, this Sub-section (3) was deliberately added to the Bill for this purpose: that the water which is supplied under agreement or by meter is to come within this clause for the purposes of Clause 4, and in order that it should be comprehended it is necessary to state that the time at which the demand note in respect of water so supplied is to be delivered is "at any time after the Company is to be entitled to require payment thereof." It is absolutely necessary to put in that statement. I think those who have informed the noble Earl have not been able to understand the Bill.

LORD HERSCHELL: I confess I have some sympathy with the noble Earl as regards this particular clause. I have been studying it for a considerable time, and I do not understand it.

On Question.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 4 agreed to as amended.

Clause 6.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: In this clause I propose to leave out "twenty-one" and insert "fourteen."

Moved: page 3, line 18, leave out "twenty-one" and insert "fourteen."

—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF CORK AND ORRERY: My Lords, I withdraw for the present the Amendment that stands in my name.

Clause 6 agreed to with Amendment.

Clause 8.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, understanding that the noble Lord (the Earl of Wemyss) withdraws the Amendment of which he had given notice, on page 4, line 4, to leave out "fourteen" and insert "seven," I propose in line 12 to omit "twenty-one" and insert "fourteen."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to as amended.

Clause 10.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I have an Amendment here, on page 5, line 1, after "off" insert—

"After service of notice in writing on the Water Company by the person aggrieved of the cutting off of such water supply."

As the Bill stands, if the water is cut off, for every day there is a penalty of £5 attaching to the Company. There might be collusion and fraud, and notice not given to the Company; and I think it is fair that notice should be given to the Company, and that the penalty should only attach after such notice has been given. That is the only object of the Amendment.

Moved, in page 5, line 1, after "off," insert "after service of notice in writing on the Water Company by the person aggrieved of the cutting off of such water supply."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I am afraid it is my case now not to understand. The noble Earl will observe that the persons who cut off are the Company themselves, so that in the event of their cutting off the supply in contravention of this Act they are to be liable to a penalty. How can the consumer, or why should the consumer give notice to them in writing of the fact that they have cut off his supply?

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: It might be done by collusion or fraud. It is to guard against such a possibility. I understand that there have been such cases.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Fraud by whom?

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Collusion between a person who would get the penalty, and some other person who cuts it off for him—and not the Water Company. My Lords, I am told there have been such cases.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Surely, if some other person had cut off the supply, the Water Company would appear in Court and say they had not done so!

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: The Water Companies wish to have this security, and I do not think it would at all interfere with the working of my noble Friend's Bill.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Surely it is an absurdity that, when the Water Company has cut off the water, the consumer should write to the Water Company and inform them that they have cut off his water.

On Question.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 10 agreed to.

Clause 11.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Here it is proposed, my Lords, that the time instead of being twenty-four hours should be forty-eight hours, within which notice is to be given to the Sanitary Authority that the water is cut off. Supposing the water is cut off on Saturday, with Sunday and perhaps a public holiday intervening, there might be a difficulty.

Moved, Clause 11, page 5, line 8, leave out "twenty-four" and insert "forty-eight."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: If this were a new proposal I should be rather inclined to consent; but the clause is a reproduction of a clause now in operation in the Metropolis in the Act passed last year.

On Question.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clause 13.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I propose, my Lords, here to strike out from the first line of this clause "except as regards clauses four, seven and nine." If those words remain in, the demand note for particulars will apply to all cases where water is supplied, and I think it is the intention of my noble Friend, according to the wording of the explanation on the back of his Bill, that it should only apply to trade purposes.

Moved: Page 5, lines 21 and 22 leave out "except as regards clauses four, seven and nine."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I will take the three clauses separately. With regard to Clause 4 it certainly is my intention that that clause should apply, in the interests of the consumers. As I stated when we were discussing the clause, it is desirable that the person who is supplied, whether under agreement or by meter, should have a statement of what he has to pay. With regard to Clauses 7 and 9 I cannot understand why my noble Friend proposes to omit them. Those are clauses inserted to protect the Water Companies. I do not know whether my noble Friend is representing their interests; but if so, all I can say is that they are proposing to do the most foolish thing that could be done. They are proposing to make these clauses not apply to them. At all events I do not think my noble Friend would wish to strike out Clauses 7 and 9. They are certainly not in the interests of the consumer, but in the interests of the Water Companies.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I will not press it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 13 agreed to.

Bill with Amendments re-committed to the Standing Committee.

JURY SERVICE OF VOLUNTEERS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUD-LEIGH: My Lords, I beg to ask the Lord Chancellor whether, having regard to the facts submitted to him showing that only twenty-five per cent. of the Volunteer non-commissioned officers, and eight per cent. of the privates are liable for jury service, and that consequently the duties of those remaining subject to jury service would not be materially increased by their exemption, he can see his way to extend to them the concession he has already announced his intention to propose in the case of Volunteer officers; and when the proposed measure dealing with the jury laws will be introduced? The facts of the case are briefly these. On the 14th March, in another place, the Minister for War was asked as to what exemption could be given from jury service to officers and men serving in the Volunteers; and he replied, I believe, that the Lord Chancellor was willing to see whether any alteration could be made in the Jury Laws, so as to exempt the officers, but could not see his way to extending the same privilege to non-commissioned officers and privates of the Force. On a subsequent date, the 4th April I think, a deputation of officers and men of Volunteer battalions waited upon the Lord Chancellor to ask him if he could extend the privilege as desired, and they based their claim partly on the fact that of the non-commissioned officers and privates liable to serve on juries, there were only twenty-five per cent. of non-commissioned officers, and about eight per cent. of privates. I was present at the deputation, and to the best of my recollection the Lord Chancellor replied to us very kindly that he would take the matter into consideration, but that the numbers of those who were exempted from jury service was already very large, and he hesitated to make an increase in the number. Now, my Lords, it seems to me that the number is comparatively small, only 25 per cent. of non-commissioned officers, and 8 per cent. of the privates out of a Force of about 200,000 men; and, even if the number was considerably larger, it still has to be considered that the number of those who are liable to serve on juries is still extremely large, and that the reduction comparatively is not a very great one. The whole principle, I take it, that underlies the exemption from service upon a jury, is that jury service is a public duty which those who are capable of performing are expected to perform, and that those who are exempted perform some other public function, which is considered to exonerate them from a duty which would otherwise fall upon them. My Lords, there is perhaps no more important public duty than that of defending the country in which we live; and while, all through the history of England, there has been a very strong prejudice against a standing Army, and an insuperable one against anything like Conscription, it has always been recognised that there is a duty, which might on occasion be enforced, of serving in the more Civil Force of the country; and, while the duty of serving upon a jury has always been very strictly enforced, it has, fortunately, not been necessary to enforce with equal strictness the duty of serving in the ranks in defence of the country. But, still, it is an equally important duty, and I think that those who come forward, and voluntarily take upon themselves that duty in a patriotic spirit, are entitled to some consideration in respect of the services which they perform; and I trust that the Lord Chancellor will be able to see his way to exempt them from serving upon juries in consideration of the time, which is infinitely greater than that which they would be liable to spend in performing duties as jurymen, which they devote to performing an important and onerous public duty, and that he will be able to afford to them the boon of being exempted from a public service, from which I say they have earned an exemption, and also on the ground that the boon so extended to them will encourage others to take up a very important duty for the welfare and safety of the country.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Before my noble Friend, the Lord Chancellor, answers this question, which I venture to think is one of very great public importance, I should like to say a few words. I think there will be a general agreement in your Lordships' House that it is desirable, wherever possible, to do what can be done to give permanence and efficiency to the Volunteer Force. It would be too much to say that our Army is in a bad state, but your Lordships must have observed during the winter, and during the Recess, how much public attention was directed towards the state of the Army—directed by letters, directed by speeches ending in an inquiry into recruiting under my noble Friend Lord Wantage. I think the feeling is that the Army is deficient, mainly in the supply of able-bodied recruits, both in number, and in quality. My Lords, that results from one of two causes; either that you have not compulsion to make men enter the Army, or that the inducements you hold out are insufficient; and if any man wants to see what sufficient inducements will do in the way of producing a good article, let him go to the Wellington Barracks and see the police recruits drilled there, and he will see what full, good pay, and pension, with no deductions, will bring about. Let him go to the barracks at the back of St. George's, where the recruits that are brought into the Army in this district are passed by the medical officer, and there he will see what sort of article you get for a shilling a day with deductions. It was only the other day that a noble relative of mine had to defend in the House of Commons the enlistment of a boy of 14. You have recruits, according to the best military opinion, who are really much too young for the work. You cannot, my Lords, get an effective five-year-old fit for work for the price that you would pay for a three-year-old,—and that is equally the case with men. The result is that the Home Army, certainly, is not in the state of efficiency that it ought to be. My own belief is that it is only by applying the principle of compulsion to the Militia, and keeping the Militia full, that you can hope to keep your Army full. And that was the opinion of your Lordships in 1883 when you passed this Resolution which I moved, and in which I was supported by your Lordships by a majority—

“That, having regard to the present defective military organisation, it is essential that the Militia be forthwith recruited to their established strength, and that the Militia Reserve should, as intended by its originator, the late General Peel, and as recommended by the Militia Committee of 1877, be borne in excess of the Militia establishment."

That Resolution, I believe, goes to the root of the whole matter as regards the manning of the Army; it was opposed by Army officials then in office, and by Army officials who had been in office; but your Lordships thought it a reasonable proposition, and carried it. My Lords, if you have your Army in its present state, if your conditions do not admit of compulsion for home defence—that is the enforcing of the Ballot for the Militia, and if, on the other hand, sufficient pay is not given to induce recruits, you are left in the present unsatisfactory state, that for home defence in the main, you rely upon the Volunteer Force. I am always filled with astonishment that you should find 200,000 men who patriotically give up their time and service to the country without any compulsion, and who submit yearly almost to more and more stringent regulations, and more severe tests, and drill. But if that is so, and if this has gone on for thirty years, I think when an occasional opportunity arises, such as that brought forward by my noble Friend, it is only right and proper that those who have the care of the State should give whatever they legitimately can in the way of favour and privileges to a Force thus served. Unquestionably what the Force is most deficient in is officers, and if, by any possibility, it may be that you can by this little bribe induce men to come into the Force, and become officers, so much the better; you will have done a really good service. If it throws a very infinitesimal amount more duty upon those who do not join the Force, I say serve them right for not serving in the Volunteer Corps. I, therefore, hope that my noble Friend, the Lord Chancellor, will readily assent to bringing in a Bill for this purpose, and not wait to deal with the whole jury system. A Bill of one clause, I think, would be sufficient to exempt, at any rate, Volunteer officers from service on juries.

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY: My Lords, I should like to add my entreaties to those that have already been made, and I hope that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack will see his way to granting this request. I look upon this proposal as of great value, not merely for the privilege itself, but because it would be a recognition of the public service which is done by the Volunteers, and for the effect that that recognition would have upon the minds of the public. In a great many cases employers now look upon volunteering as only an amusement, and recreation, in which men join for their own pleasure; and, therefore, they naturally are somewhat unwilling to afford their men time. I think that a measure of this kind, which recognises the public nature of the service performed by the volunteer, would have a very good effect in altering public opinion upon that point.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY): My Lords, I am afraid my answer will not satisfy any of my noble Friends who have addressed your Lordships. I am afraid I must first of all ask a question before I give a final answer on the subject. I want to know what is exactly meant by exemption from jury service? Does it mean exemption during any period when the particular volunteer is being employed in exercise or drill, or does it mean that the volunteer by that hypothesis is to be struck off the jury list every year so that he will be entirely exempt from jury service altogether?

LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUDLEIGH: The latter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I thought that was what was in the noble Lord's mind. Just let us observe what we are going to do! It is not quite so simple a matter as would appear to the noble Lords. Is it to be the fact that he is to be an efficient volunteer?

LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUDLEIGH: Yes.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I hear the noble Lord say "yes." Will he allow me to ask him in what way the Magistrates who settle the jury lists are to settle the question, if the volunteer is not to be a person who nominally belongs to the Volunteers, but is to be an efficient volunteer? If the period of exemption had reference to the period when he was actually engaged as a volunteer, he would be able to prove that exemption; but if he is to be struck off the list altogether, I can imagine a very large accession to the Volunteer Force at the period when the Jury Lists are made out; I am afraid they would not all be ready to adopt the practice of Volunteers afterwards. That is one great difficulty that I have in the matter. Then my Lords, what are you to do about the Militia; are they to be included in the same exemption?

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: No.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I do not see why not. The Militia are called out at certain periods of the year, and I have no doubt they have a fair claim during those periods in which they are performing their public duty.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: They are a paid Force.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Again the noble Lord must remember that in proportion as you diminish the number of persons on the Jury List you are throwing an increased burden on those who remain. That is a very serious question to consider; and I, for one, protest against the sort of notion that the exemptions which are to be found in the Jury List at present have any relation to what one noble Lord called a little bribe, another called an inducement, and a third called a recognition. The reason why persons are exempted from performing their duties as jurymen is that the duties they have to perform elsewhere are supposed to be inconsistent with the duties of a jurymen, and that therefore they cannot perform both duties. If therefore the claim is limited to any reasonable amount, either of exercises, or drill, or calling out of the Volunteers in any way, I shall be able to regard the matter in a different spirit, because then it would be inconsistent with the duty that a jurymen is supposed to discharge. But where the demand is that the name should absolutely be struck off at the time the Jury Lists are being settled, that seems to me to raise so many difficult questions of detail that I could not do it certainly in a Bill of a single clause. I can only say that any reluctance that I have is not at all that I do not share to the full, as much as any noble Lord, in admiration of the Volunteer Force who have so readily come forward to perform a public duty, and perform it gratuitously; but the difficulty is in dealing with the questions of detail so that such privileges as are asked for might not be abused and made use of, not for the purposes for which they are asked, but for evading a great, serious and solemn duty that a great number of persons in the State are compelled to perform at great sacrifice to themselves. For my part, I would gladly see the Jury List fortified and aided by such men as form the Volunteer Force, and I should be very sorry that such men should not aid in the administration of justice in the country. My Lords, I have been endeavouring to solve this problem, but I assure the noble Lord that, with every desire to exempt the Volunteer Force, I have not yet found any mode by which I could reconcile the conflicting claims, and I cannot promise any immediate solution of the question.

*LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUDLEIGH: I do not know whether I may be allowed briefly to reply to the question that the Lord Chancellor has put to me on one point. It is desired of course that the exemption should be restricted entirely to an efficient Volunteer. There is no possible difficulty in discovering who is, and who is not, an efficient Volunteer. A man would have to serve one year before he could have any right to claim exemption, and at the end of that time he would have to prove that he had been an efficient Volunteer; his name is returned year by year as an efficient Volunteer, and the capitation grant is given by the Government in consideration of his services as an efficient Volunteer; and it is perfectly easy for a man to prove whether he is or is not an efficient Volunteer.

EARL SPENCER: I should like to say, in consequence of what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, that I have considerable sympathy with my noble Friend who has brought forward this Motion; but I quite admit that there is great force in what the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack said as to the necessity of keeping men off this sort on the Jury List. Supposing a Volunteer was in camp during the Assizes, at the present moment, if he were summoned, he would be bound, I suppose, to attend or would be fined; but the noble and learned Lord I understand would make that concession at all events, and say that if he were actually doing duty with the Volunteers he should be exempt from serving on a Jury.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: My Lords, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government the question that stands in my name, I wish to say that my attention was called to the subject by the sickness of a relative of my own; but my personal interest in the matter may be said to have ceased as soon as the transfer of the Royal Horse Guards from the barracks they lately occupied to Knightsbridge. And I should also wish it to be understood that I in no way reflect upon the Administration of the War Office; for I think your Lordships will agree with me in saying that Her Majesty's Government have done everything they could reasonably be expected to do during their term of Office to ameliorate the unfortunate condition of things which existed in most of the barracks in the United Kingdom. At the same time there have been so many rumours as to the amount of sickness which existed amongst the officers of the Royal Horse Guards, and of the insanitary state of the different barracks and quarters, which they have temporarily occupied during the rebuilding of the Albany Barracks, that I trust Her Majesty's Government will not object to lay the real state of the case before your Lordships, and to give the House any further information which they may have received on the point, subsequent to the answer which the Secretary of State gave some time ago in another place; and also that they may be able, perhaps, to inform the House what steps have been taken to remedy any insanitary defects which may have been found in the various barracks which have been occupied by the Royal Horse Guards. I should like to include the building of the Horse Guards in my question, although I believe that technically that building is under the Board of Works, and not under the War Office. My Lords, I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government how many cases of typhoid fever have occurred amongst the officers of the Royal Horse Guards (the Blues) since August last; whether any examination has been made by the Military, or other Medical, or Sanitary Authorities during the past year of the barracks and quarters occupied by the Royal Horse Guards up to 5th April, 1892; and whether there is any objection to lay these Reports, if any have been made, on the Table?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWLOW): My Lords, in reply to my noble Friend, I have to state that only one case of enteric fever has been officially reported, but I regret extremely to think that that one case should have been the case which must have caused very grave anxiety to my noble Friend. On Lord Sudley's illness being reported, a Board assembled on the 17th March. At that time the Adjutant informed some of the members of the Board that other officers had been previously ill; I think, probably, those were the cases which the noble Earl indicated in his question. These two officers who were ill were Lieutenant Fitzgerald and Lieutenant Forrester; both of them were attended by their own physicians, and it is very difficult to find out the particulars of their illness. On inquiry, I am given to understand that Lieutenant Fitzgerald was suffering when he was in barracks from passive congestion of the right lung; but I understand that after he left barracks he had an undoubted slight attack of enteric fever. Lieutenant Forrester's case does not seem to be very clear. I am informed that he was attended by two private physicians; one of them appears to have attended him for influenza, and afterwards another physician who attended him says that he had an attack of enteric fever. In his case, however, it appears that it is very doubtful where that attack may have been contracted. The fact remains, however, that the attack of Lord Sudley was certainly contracted in barracks. A Board was assembled on the 17th March to inquire into the sanitary condition of the barracks, and reported that One and Two, Officers' Quarters, which are the quarters where Lord Sudley was, are in a good sanitary condition, but that in the servants' quarters underneath (and this is the important point; this is, no doubt, what was wrong) there was a foul-smelling sink near the window, the trap of which, at the time of their visit, had been removed. I think there can be no doubt at all that it was that sink that caused the illness, and that sink has since been removed. The Board then proceeded to inspect all the drainage arrangements of the barracks, and reported favourably; they then examined the water and milk supply, and reported favourably of both. I think, therefore, that everything has been done that can possibly be done. Quarters were found for the officers while the work was going on, at a distance from this particular part of the barracks, and since that time there have been no complaints of any sort. My noble Friend asks in his question whether there is any objection to lay these Reports, if any have been made, on the Table. If my noble Friend presses his Motion, of course I shall not refuse to do so; at the same time, as they are very simple Departmental Reports with very little detail, with nothing in them except what I have already laid before your Lordships, I daresay he will not press for them.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: No.

EARL BROWNLOW: I shall be only too glad to show my noble Friend the Reports, or to let him have a copy of them if he wishes it.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

PROMOTION IN THE CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the average service of clerks employed at the Central Telegraph Office who were promoted to the Senior Class prior to the issue of the Raikes scheme in 1890 was eighteen years; whether he is aware that there are now clerks with over twenty years' service whose prospects of promotion are remote, and whose annual leave is ten days less than the Senior Class; and whether he will make some arrangement whereby the amount of annual leave may in future depend on the number of years' service?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): At the time of the last revision of the Central Telegraph Office, which took place in 1890, the average service of those who were promoted from the First to the Senior Class was between eighteen and nineteen years. Out of six hundred persons now standing on the First Class, only twenty are of more than twenty years' service, and of these some have been passed over as ineligible for promotion. Not one of the six hundred has yet reached the maximum of the First Class. The period of annual leave of absence is, in the case of the Senior Class, one month; and, in the case of the First Class, three weeks. It is not considered advisable to regulate the annual leave by length of service.

GLASGOW POSTMEN'S WAGES.

EARL COMPTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General for what reason have the wages of twenty-one appointed postmen in Glasgow been reduced from 18s. to 17s. per week; and whether established postmen in Glasgow received 20s. a week fifteen years ago for the same class of work performed by those who now receive 17s. a week?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The men in question were not "appointed," that is as permanent postmen, but temporarily employed at the minimum of the old scale—namely, 18s. a week. The scale of wages for postmen was altered from 18s. rising to 28s. to 17s. rising to 30s., and these men receiving established appointments before they had been employed for a full year were required by the Rules of the Service to commence at the minimum or else to defer their appointment to the end of the year. They were allowed the choice, and preferred the former arrangement. While the minimum of the new scale is lower than that of the old, the postmen receive with it certain new benefits—namely, extra payment for all Sunday duty, an allowance for boots, payment in proportion to their wages for extra duty, and a higher maximum. The minimum of the postmen's scale at Glasgow has never been permanently raised above 18s. a week, although about the period mentioned it was necessary for a time to pay 20s. a week to new entrants on account of the then state of the labour market. The maximum, however, at that time was only 26s. a week.

WEXFORD POST OFFICE.

MR. THOMAS HEALY (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if there was any increase in the percentage of letters which passed through the Wexford Post Office last year as compared with seven years ago; and if there has been any acceleration of the mails during that period?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: There has been an increase of about forty-six per cent. in the correspondence passing through the Wexford Post Office during the last seven years. The increase arose mainly from the inclusion in the Wexford Postal District of a number of country post offices which were formerly in other districts, though served by the same line of railway. During the period mentioned there has been no acceleration of the mail trains, but in the autumn of 1884, just before the beginning of that period, a considerable acceleration was effected.

MR. THOMAS HEALY: Since this forty-six per cent. increase there has been no acceleration?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: No.

CADASTRAL SURVEY OF BEHAR.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether one result of the commencement of a cadastral survey of Behar will be the creation of a large number of new appointments, at a heavy cost to the cultivators of the districts affected; whether his attention has been drawn to the representations of the Board of Revenue and other responsible officials to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal that the appointment of these strange officials will probably be productive of much extortion and litigation; whether an English officer has already been appointed, on a large salary, to direct survey operations, which, it is now stated, will not commence till October or until after the present distress has abated; and whether further appointments will be delayed until it is known whether the monsoon that is expected in June will mitigate or intensify the famine?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): (1) The Secretary of State has heard nothing of the creation of a large number of new appointments. The survey work will be undertaken for the most part by Behar village officials. The total cost, it is expected, will be within the estimated limit of eight annas per acre. (2) It is considered that the employment of the agency of village officials under a system of careful inspection will prevent extortion and oppression. Landholders and cultivators have been publicly invited to bring any complaints to notice. (3) Lieutenant Colonel Sandeman, a first grade Deputy Superintendent of Survey, has been appointed to direct the operations, with an allowance of Rs.400 a month in addition to his former salary, and is now engaged in making the preliminary arrangements. (4) It is not expected that any additional staff will be employed till the commencement of operations in October.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: May I ask the hon. Gentleman if the Secretary of State is aware that appointments have been made of officers from the North-West Provinces and other parts of India who are entirely strange to the country, and further, whether the Secretary of State will telegraph for full information on this and other points connected with the survey?

*MR. CURZON: I shall be much obliged if the hon. Gentleman will place before me the information on which he bases his first question, and upon that must depend my ability to give an answer to the second.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN PERTH.

SIR J. KINLOCH (Perth, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether information has reached him that the Local Authority of the County of Perth, at their recent meeting, resolved, with only one dissentient, to express their dissatisfaction with the way in which they were ignored by him in reference to the formation of the recent foot-and-mouth disease zone, he having stated that he acted on the representation of two gentlemen connected with the county, while the Executive Committee considered they should have been consulted; whether it has been brought to his knowledge that the scheduling of so large a county as Perth as an infected zone caused inconvenience and loss to many farmers and breeders in localities far remote from that really infected; and whether, if occasion should again arise, he will consult the Local Authority, established by law in the county, and constituted by the representatives of the ratepayers?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The assumption contained in the question of the hon. Baronet, that the recent foot-and-mouth zone in Perthshire was formed upon the representations of two gentlemen connected with the county, while the Local Authority was not consulted, is incorrect. The boundaries of that zone were defined upon the information at the disposal of the Board, and upon their own responsibility. What was determined, partly by the representations of the two gentlemen referred to, was the date of the application of the Order, and its substitution for the severer restrictions which embraced the whole of the county. The hon. Member will recollect pressing on me, in company with the hon. Member for Perth, that, whatever relaxations I might be able to make with respect to the restrictions existing in Perthshire, they should be made with the least possible delay, and I admit that I gave effect to that suggestion without waiting to consult the Local Authority, which would have entailed a delay of some days. In answer to the second paragraph of the question, I am quite aware of the losses necessarily entailed by the foot-and-mouth restrictions where they are in force, and that Perthshire was no exception to the rule; but they have been small as compared with the losses which would have resulted from the spread of the disease through the whole county, and they were inseparable from any effective measures for checking it. In reply to the third paragraph, I am always willing and anxious to avail myself of local knowledge and to consult with Local Authorities whenever it seems to me to be expedient, but I have never regarded it, and I do not and I cannot regard it, as an obligation incumbent upon me to do so, and for these reasons. In the first place, in dealing with foot-and-mouth disease the utmost promptitude is frequently essential to success; and, in the second place, the interests of the locality and of the community may frequently be in conflict; and where that is the case it is my duty to protect the community from the spread of disease, quite irrespective of the views of any particular locality. For these reasons, I must respectfully decline to give the undertaking for the future which the hon. Baronet desires.

EXTRA POLICE IN ROSCOMMON.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the refusal last Friday by the Roscommon County at Large Presentment Sessions, chiefly constituted of Magistrates, to pass a presentment for extra police; after such an expression of opinion, do the Government intend to continue this taxation for extra police; what is the number of constabulary, including extra men stationed in the county; what is the number of the free quota; and how many of the free quota are stationed in the county and how many in the depôt?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): It is the case that at the recent Roscommon County at Large Presentment Sessions disapproval of the claim for extra police was expressed, on the ground of the present condition of the county. Since the period, however, covered by that claim, a considerable reduction appears to have been made in the extra force serving in the county, it having been reduced within the past year by one-half—namely, from twenty to ten; and this number will be further reduced as soon as the responsible authorities are of opinion that this can be done with safety to the peace of the county. The police establishment of Roscommon consists at present of 323 free quota and ten extra force; in all, 333 sergeants and constables, of whom, on April 30th, 1892, 322 were stationed in the county and eleven were in training at the depôt.

MR. HAYDEN: Who is the responsible authority to decide as to the necessary force?

MR. MADDEN: Those who are responsible for the peace of the district.

BOARD OF INLAND REVENUE SUPERVISORS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that expectant supervisors have proved that for some time past they have been working Excise districts with expense to themselves owing to the inadequate allowances granted, he will authorise the Board of Inland Revenue to make the general order of the 11th ult. retrospective for twelve months?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I do not admit that expectant supervisors have proved that for some time past they have been working Excise districts with expense to themselves, or that reason has been shown for taking the most unusual course of making the recent concession retrospective.

RIGHT OF MEMBERS TO VISIT PRISONS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Members of Parliament are entitled, as such, to visit and inspect prisons in Ireland, and to visit and question prisoners as to their treatment, on satisfying the Governors that they are Members of Parliament?

MR. MADDEN: The General Prisons Board for Ireland report that no such privilege as that suggested in the question is accorded to Members of Parliament either by Statute or under the Prison Rules.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Members of Parliament are entitled, as such, to visit and inspect prisons in Great Britain, and to visit and question prisoners as to their treatment, on satisfying the Governors that they are Members of Parliament?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): No, Sir, this exceptional right suggested in the question is not possessed by Members of this House.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I am informed that a Member of this House was informed not long since by the Governor of a prison that Members were allowed such visits.

TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH LEGISLATION.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when he expects to be able to bring in the general Bill relating to telephones and telegraphs; and whether he is aware that progress in many important mercantile directions is being retarded by the want of legislation in the matter?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not able to name the precise date for the introduction of this Bill, but I hope it will be introduced almost immediately.

THE PRIVILEGES OF AFRICAN COMPANIES.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he could see his way to appoint a resident Inspector in each of the territories of the great Chartered Companies in Africa; if an Annual Report to Parliament from the Crown official could be furnished; if an assigned date for the termination of their privileges could be made, in order to open Parliamentary inspection and consideration; if he contemplates imposing any tribute to the Imperial Exchequer on these companies, and if there is any reason for delegating the Imperial authority in Africa to these companies, entirely composed of unofficial persons?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): I am afraid I am not able to give the hon. Member a reply to his question. It only appeared this morning, and it raises a great many new points that require very full consideration before any useful answer could be given.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: When will it be convenient to the hon. Gentleman for me to repeat the question?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: If the hon. Member will put it down for Monday, I hope then to be able to give him an answer. At the same time, though, I ought to warn the hon. Member that it seems to me that the question raises points of a very debatable character difficult to be dealt with within the limits of a reply to a question; but I will do my best to give the hon. Gentleman an answer that will satisfy him.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I will put down the question for Monday. Upon one point, perhaps, the hon. Gentleman may be able to give me an answer now. I think it is a fact that the Charter of the Niger Company provides that the Secretary of State shall examine the accounts of the Company. Has this been done, and could the Secretary of State lay these accounts or any information on the Table of the House?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I think the question is one I have already answered in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. W. H. Cross). I do not carry in my memory the date of the answer, but if the hon. Gentleman will kindly refer to Hansard, I think he will find a reply to the question he has just put.

FINES UNDER THE MEDICINE STAMP ACTS.

MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the case of a conviction under the Medicine Stamp Acts, what proportion of the fine is paid to the person giving information of the breach of the Act which leads to such conviction?

MR. MATTHEWS: By the 44 George III., c. 98, fines and penalties under the Medicine Stamp Acts go wholly to Her Majesty. The Commissioners of Stamps are, however, allowed at their discretion to pay to informers any proportion of the fine or penalty which was given to the informer under earlier Statutes; and it is the practice of the Commissioners to be governed by the circumstances of each case in deciding whether they shall give any and what part of the fine to informers.

CLERKS IN THE OFFICE OF WOODS AND FORESTS.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with regard to the decision of the Treasury some time ago that the junior clerks in the Office of Woods and Forests should be abolished and the staff recruited from the Second Division clerks, will he explain why on a vacancy occurring in the junior class last year the Treasury very reluctantly allowed the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to procure a junior clerk, but only on the distinct understanding that no further appointments would be made to that class; and whether he will state the reason for the declaration of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, authorised by the Treasury, that the Second Division clerks are to be redundant, notwithstanding the fact that they have served for many years in such office, and not only are well acquainted with the work, but have, indeed, in many cases been entrusted in the absence of responsible officials with the discharge of the duties of the latter?

SIR J. GORST: The Treasury permitted a competitive examination for a junior clerkship in the Office of Woods to take place because they were satisfied that there was sufficient reason for filling up the vacancy. The subject of the establishment of the Woods Office has been discussed in connection with the adoption of seven hours. Some Second Division clerks will be transferred as opportunity offers, and some will be replaced, also as opportunity offers, by employees of a lower class.

WATERFORD AND LIMERICK RAILWAY.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can give any assurance that the agreement said to have been signed between the Government and the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company is likely to be carried out by the said Company and the Government; if so, will he say when the work will commence;

and will he lay upon the Table of the House the terms of the arrangement?

MR. MADDEN (who replied): It will be necessary to have any agreement with the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company confirmed by an Order in Council, and when that is done the Order in Council will, according to practice, be laid on the Table of the House. There is no reason to suppose there will be any delay in the proceedings as soon as the Order in Council is obtained.

MR. JORDAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say how long it will be before the Order in Council is obtained?

MR. MADDEN: That is not a matter upon which I have any knowledge. It is not a rapid proceeding, but it will not take any great length of time.

MR. JORDAN: The right hon. Gentleman observed the last clause of my question?

MR. MADDEN: The Order in Council will be laid on the Table as a matter of course.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of his statement in January of this year—

"I am well aware that all classes in Ireland with but few exceptions share with me the desire that the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill should become law," would he say what facilities or assistance he is now prepared to give for the passing of this Bill?

MR. JORDAN: Before the right hon. Gentleman replies to the question may I ask him if he did not say last year that the present state of this question is "disgraceful in the highest degree;" and will he allow the present Session to close without making some effort to remedy the anomalous state of affairs in relation to this matter?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E): I have not present to my mind the quotation, if it be a quotation, to which the hon. Member refers, though I believe I have commented more than once upon the unsatisfactory position in which this matter stands. In regard to the question of the hon. Member for Londonderry, he has very correctly quoted words I have used in regard to this Bill, but I would point out to him that although I believe it to be true generally speaking that all classes in Ireland share in the desire that the Bill should become law, there is an important section, I will not say of Irish opinion, but of Irish representatives, who not only take a different view, but are prepared to back that view with all those powers of debate with which they are largely endowed. Under the circumstances I am afraid it would not be possible for the Government to find time for the discussion of the Bill, though if we could do so I should be extremely glad.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): If as the right hon. Gentleman says the Bill cannot go forward on account of the opposition of a section of Irish Members, why will the same course not be pursued towards the Irish Local Government Bill, to which all the Irish Members are opposed?

[No answer was given.]

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF PRISON WARDERS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is intended to grant the improvement in pay and allowances to prison warders who joined the service previous to the passing of the Prisons Act, 1877, which have been granted to those who joined after 1877; whether he is aware that in some prisons warders and other officers are on duty for over one hundred hours per week, this being, it is asserted, due to the system of sleeping in the prisons, under which men who have been on active duty for sixteen hours are confined to the prison all night, and during the night have to get up and attend to active duties; and whether he will inquire into this matter with a view to its remedy?

MR. MATTHEWS: The question of leveling up the pay and allowances of warders who joined the service before 1877 is now before the Treasury, and a decision will shortly be arrived at. The average hours of active duty for warders is sixty-three hours a week.

VOL. IV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

About once a week they are required to sleep in the prison, and they remain there from 8.30 p.m. till 6 a.m. the next morning, but during these hours they are not called upon to do active duty except in cases of emergency, which rarely occur. The grievance suggested in the hon. Member's question does not therefore exist.

THE POST OFFICE ELECTRICAL ENGINEER.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that Mr. W. H. Preece, the chief electrical engineer at the Post Office, is in the habit of taking private practice in electrical work; and whether, in view of the fact that he is a Civil servant in receipt of an annual salary, this is in accordance with the Rules of the Civil Service?

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): Before the right hon. Gentleman replies to the question of my genial but misinformed friend, I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that Mr. Preece has a high European reputation as an electrical specialist, that he could command double the salary he now receives from the Government if he would devote himself exclusively to private practice, and that in the work he now does in his spare moments for the furtherance of electrical science he is rendering substantial service to the community?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The case of Mr. Preece is exceptional. Before he entered Her Majesty's Service twenty-two years ago he held certain paid employments besides his appointment as Engineer of the Electric Telegraph Company. Those employments he relinquished as being incompatible with his appointment at the Post Office; but, with the knowledge of the Department, he has continued to advise on great electrical questions outside of his regular duty, he being an expert of the highest standing. Such advice has been generally afforded to Public Bodies. For instance, in the lighting of the House of Commons, of the British Museum, the Dublin Museum, and the principal cities. His action in this respect has been quite public, and his Reports have been published. As an Electrician of European eminence he takes part in the development of electrical science. I am informed that he never turns to any work, other than Departmental, during office hours, without special permission. But his official work is by no means confined to those hours. It is performed unsparingly early and late, and even on Sundays. As I have said, his case is altogether exceptional and cannot form a precedent.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I should like to ask if Mr. Preece received separate fees for the assistance he rendered in connection with the electric lighting of the House of Commons?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I think it is highly probable that he did, and that he has also received separate fees for the assistance he has given to various Public Bodies.

BRITISH EMIGRANTS TO BRAZIL.

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the Report of Mr. Walter T. Lyall, Her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Santos, in reference to the misfortunes of British emigrants to Brazil; whether, in his opinion, there is just ground for the conclusions at which Mr. Lyall has arrived, amongst which is the statement that—

“The Brazilian Agents, though instructed to recruit agricultural labour only, and receiving a commission for each emigrant engaged, eventually registered any individual who said he was an agriculturist”;

and whether Her Majesty's Government is prepared to take, or to recommend, any steps for bringing to book the Agents who have been the means of causing misery, disaster, and death to the unfortunate British subjects who became their victims?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: My attention has been called to the Report referred to. The conclusion to which Mr. Lyall comes is probably correct, but it is not easily susceptible of verification. The Brazilian Minister informed us on the 28th March last that the Brazilian Government had no agency in England at that date; and the so-called “Colonisation Office” has ceased to act as the Agent of the Brazilian Government, which on the 18th April, 1891, it professed to be. Many of those who emigrated from Bradford to Brazil were induced to do so through the agency of a man named Naylor, who, we are informed, has left the country. Even supposing that the parties responsible be found, it is difficult to say for what offence they should be prosecuted.

RETURN OF ELECTORS IN EACH CONSTITUENCY.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Return of the registered number of electors in each constituency at the present time, which was ordered by the House on 10th March last, will be presented?

MR. MATTHEWS: I hope that the Return will be presented in ten days' time, or thereabouts.

LOANING PICTURES FROM THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that an application has been made to the Trustees of the National Gallery for the loan of a picture or pictures for the coming Centenary Exhibition to be held at Southport to illustrate the Art of the century; and whether such a loan could be granted, considering that the pictures would be placed in the permanent Art Gallery of the town, and not be subject to the risks of an ordinary temporary exhibition?

SIR J. GORST (who replied): My right hon. Friend has no information with regard to the application to which the hon. Member refers. The matter would be one for the Trustees to determine, and it would not fall in any way under his administration.

SCOTCH LANDLORDS AND CORN MILLS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) (for Mr. FRASER-MACKINTOSH, Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether landlords in Scotland are bound to uphold corn mills, used from time immemorial by the tenants; and, if not, whether he will introduce a measure dealing with such cases as those of Arisaig, where, from the discontinuance of the mill by a former owner, the tenants have to send their grinding corn to the Island of Eigg, many miles distant, and where they are often detained a week from stress of weather?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I am not aware of any obligation on the part of landlords to uphold corn mills. So far as I can ascertain, no grievance exists, and no corn is grown in the district referred to with the view of being ground in Eigg or elsewhere.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL AGE PENSIONS.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty why the Minutes of Evidence and an Appendix, presented by the Select Committee on Greenwich Hospital Age Pensions, and ordered to be printed on the 7th April, have not yet been issued; and when will they be issued?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Sheffield, Eccleshall): They will be in the hands of candidates in the course of next week.

IRISH REGIMENTS AND HOME SERVICE.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the 1st Battalion Connaught Rangers (late 88th), now stationed at Pembroke Dock, which is recruited entirely from the Province of Connaught, went to the Cape, May, 1877, from there went on to India at the end of 1879, returned home, December, 1891, and is under orders to move, in the autumn, to Portsmouth; and, if so, whether, considering that the battalion has not served in Ireland for several years, instead of being moved from Pembroke Dock so soon, it could be sent to Mullingar, which station will be then vacant?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The facts are practically as stated in the question. The battalion, however, went abroad from Ireland, and although on its return it was decided to station it in England, it will probably proceed to Ireland in its turn. I may add that out of eight Irish battalions now serving at home five are in Ireland.

ALLEGED SUB-CONTRACTING AT THE ALBANY BARRACKS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he has received communications from the London Building Trade Committee in reference to alleged sub-letting of contract work at the Albany Street Barracks and elsewhere, asking him to receive a deputation from the Committee on the subject at an early date; and what decision he has come to in the matter? I beg also to ask the hon. Gentleman whether any of the brick-laying work being done under contract at the Albany Street Barracks has been sub-let; whether the sub-contractor has been, and is, paying the recognised rate of wages to the men he employs; whether he is aware that sixty-one of the bricklayers employed by him have struck work because the sub-contractor declines to carry out the conditions of employment recognised by the trade; and whether the War Office will make inquiries into the matter?

MR. BRODRICK: The London Building Trade Committee have made an application to the Secretary of State in connection with work at Albany Street Barracks, and the facts are being investigated. I am afraid, as the notice only appeared on the Paper this morning, I must ask the hon. Member to allow time for an inquiry into the matter. As to receiving a deputation, I may say that before any decision is come to by the Secretary of State I wish to know what the facts are.

THE HURRICANE AT MAURITIUS.

MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received any information as to the hurricane in the Mauritius?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Acting Governor of

Mauritius has telegraphed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies the following facts:—

"Hurricane devastated Mauritius 29th April. One-third Port Louis destroyed. Royal College, twenty-four churches and chapels and many sugar mills in country completely wrecked. Over 600 deaths in Port Louis, over 300 deaths in country, over 1,000 wounded; in Port Louis district returns incomplete; probably same amount. No loss among the military. Estimated reduction of crop one-half. Destruction to property enormous. No famine apprehended. All relief measures taken. Relief Committees appointed. Panic allayed, order and quiet reign, but in presence of thousands of homeless people pecuniary assistance urgently needed."

I may add that the Secretary of State has communicated with the Lord Mayor with a view to the opening of a relief fund.

IMPORT DUTIES ON LINEN YARNS IN SPAIN.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a question on which I have given him private notice—whether Her Majesty's Government has received any reply to their representation respecting import duties on linen yarns in Spain in view of the expiry of the Treaty before the 30th June.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: We have received a telegram this morning from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid, in which he states that the Spanish Government are prepared to charge the same rate of duty which has up to the present been paid upon linen yarns, and that it will be continued until the 30th June, and after that date the new tariff will come into force.

ALIEN IMMIGRATION.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House can give any indication as to when the Bill dealing with alien immigration is likely to be brought forward?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think, Sir, it will be better if my right hon. Friend gives notice of the question. The Bill is in an advanced state of preparation.

Baron H. De Worms

PUBLICATION OF OLD STATE RECORDS.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the great interest which attaches to the official correspondence and papers of Thomas Pelham-Holles, Duke of Newcastle, covering the whole period of his long career in the Public Service, and especially that portion during which he was Prime Minister, between 1754 and 1762, and now included among the "Additional Manuscripts" in the British Museum, he will consider the possibility, for the aid of students of both national and local history, of having calendars of the collection prepared, in the same form as those of the State Papers in the Record Office, issued under the direction of the Master of the Rolls?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have communicated with the Record Office, with whom rests the responsibility of publications of this character, and the answer I have received is that the Newcastle correspondence in the British Museum occupies more than three hundred volumes. I am informed that they cannot say off-hand whether or not the correspondence deserves to be made accessible at an earlier date than other important manuscripts of the same period.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND F. MANAGH, N.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he cannot see his way to postpone the consideration of the Irish Local Government Bill in order that the House may at once enter upon the consideration of the Irish Education Bill, a measure desired by all classes in Ireland, and a measure of much more interest to the Irish people than the Local Government Bill now before the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was not aware that there was a unanimous desire on the part of the Irish Representatives for the Education Bill in its present shape. However, I hope that before we take the next stage of the Local Government Bill we shall be able to make substantial progress with the measure which he desires to see pass into law.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can give the date, as nearly as possible, when he will take up the Irish Education Bill, and will he also say whether that measure will be gone on with and carried through before the next stage of the Local Government Bill is taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to give some indication of a more definite character as to the fate of the Education Bill. I wish to ask him whether, assuming that the issue on the Second Reading of the Local Government Bill is determined early next week, what steps are proposed to be taken before Whitsuntide with respect to the Irish Education Bill, and whether he is going to proceed beyond the Second Reading?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it very unlikely that we shall be able to proceed beyond the Second Reading before Whitsuntide. We are now approaching the Vote on Account. The Treasury informs me that the Vote should be passed next Thursday, and I am anxious to finish the Report stage of the Small Holdings Bill, in order that it may be sent up to another place.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I am sorry to trouble the right hon. Gentleman again, but it is a matter of considerable interest to the Irish people to know definitely what are the intentions of the Government with respect to the Education Bill. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with that measure during the present Session, and to take the Committee stage of that Bill before taking the Committee stage of the Local Government Bill?

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, since there is a unanimous opinion in favour of the Education Bill, and a unanimous opinion against the Local Government Bill, he will withdraw the latter?

MR. SPEAKER: Order! Order!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can assure the hon. Gentleman I am most anxious that the Education Bill shall be proceeded with, and I can give him a pledge that the Committee stage of it will be taken before the Committee stage of the Local Government Bill.

MR. SEXTON: Then we may assume that the Second Reading of the Education Bill will be taken before Whitsuntide?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I earnestly hope so.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Are we to gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that he pledges himself to take the Committee stage of the Local Government Bill this Session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I said was that we should go through the Committee stage of the Education Bill before we entered upon the Committee stage of the Local Government Bill.

SIR W. LAWSON: Does the right hon. Gentleman really mean to take the Committee stage of the Local Government Bill at all?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That largely depends on the progress of Public Business.

MOTION.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON LAW, &c. (SITTINGS OF THE COMMITTEE).

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I beg to move—

The House will see that the Motion is not without justification when I state that whereas, according to ordinary precedent and the teaching of experience, a Bill of this kind might be expected to go through Grand Committee easily in the course of two Sittings, yet, as a matter of fact, three Sittings have already taken place, and only nineteen lines of the first clause have been dealt with, while the clause itself has not yet been passed. I am informed that on those nineteen lines thirty-three Amendments have been moved, chiefly by three gentlemen, and that a very large number still remain on the Paper to be discussed. It is evident, therefore, that if the Committee is to make any progress, as the House desires it should, in dealing with the Committee stage of the Bill, some further facilities must be given to the Committee for discussing it. At present they can only meet practically twice a week, and they cannot sit to discuss business while this House is sitting. The Resolution which I now venture to commend for the approval of the House simply gives the power to sit, although this House is sitting, and even in cases when this House may be adjourned. I hope that with these additional facilities the Committee will get through the work which this House has entrusted to it, which without them I see no prospect of their being able to accomplish within a reasonable period.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, until the conclusion of the consideration of the Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill [Lords], the Standing Committee on Law, &c., have leave to sit every day during the sitting, and notwithstanding any adjournment of the House."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid.) : The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has omitted to say one or two things in the statement he has just made to the House. He did not tell the House that those Members of the Committee who have put down a few Amendments to this Bill have facilitated the Sittings of the Committee in always attending and forming a quorum. The Attorney General, who is in charge of the Bill, will, I am sure, bear me out in this, and he has expressed his regret that the supporters of the Government have not attended better. Then, Sir, the Leader of the House has not stated that of the Amendments already discussed—some of which were consequential—five or six were of so excellent a character that the Government accepted them with pleasure. Now, Sir, I want to say one word on this proposal, which, although I welcome it, I think requires amending in one respect, and my hon. Friend (Mr. Lloyd-George) proposes to move an Amendment presently to carry out the object we have in view. It seems to me necessary that these Grand Committees should have greater facilities for discussing Bills than they have at present. Three hours twice a week do not appear to me to allow them sufficient time to get through the work before them. I hope next year that the Grand Committee will be engaged on more important measures than have been submitted to us this year, and I hope the Committee will facilitate Radical legislation in times to come. As to the character of the discussions in the Committee, there is only one thing that I regret, and that is that pressure has been put upon some of us who dissent from some of the provisions of this Bill of a kind which I, for one, most strenuously resent. Our Amendments have been of a reasonable character; many of them have been accepted, and many of them, I believe, will be accepted, and hon. Members should be made aware of the fact that every Amendment we have put down has been with the object of strengthening the Bill. I was opposed to the Bill at the beginning, because I believe that there is much more important legislation which should occupy the time of the House. But the Bill has got into the Grand Committee, and we accepted the position loyally, and we do not want to be bothered with other legislation at the same time, but should be allowed to make the Bill with an other which we are dealing thorough and complete. One of the Amendments which I proposed with this object was every clergyman who is found in a public place twice, and convicted, should be turned out of his living. I do not further discussion. That the Bill accepted by the Government cannot be considered of a different character—but not quite so severe—have been accepted; and the House may be sure, will therefore understand that we have considerably improved the measure, and that, with the further facilities, and the way of time the Government to the now offering, we shall be able to govern the Bill a much more thorough and useful Bill than it was when it was sent to the Grand Committee. Therefore, although I shall presently vote for an Amendment which will further add to the merit of the right hon. Gentleman's proposal, I shall, at any rate, be able to support on principle the Motion that he has made.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

(2.54.) MR. LLOYD - GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): This Motion is an excellent one, and I shall support it generally, with an Amendment which I propose to move to it. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has made out a case for specially extending the Motion to the Clergy Discipline Bill. We have only discussed this Bill for something like eight hours, which is equivalent to one Sitting of the House. I do not think that is extravagant discussion of a Bill which the Government consider of enormous importance, and I may mention in justification of the Welsh Members that not one long speech was delivered during the whole of the three days. The longest speech was delivered by the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler), who has consistently supported this Bill, who supported the Second Reading, and has done his best to support its progress during the Sittings of the Grand Committee. On the Amendment which he supported the longest discussion took place, and the Amendment was merely a matter of sentiment and was of no real importance in connection with the practical working of the measure. That discussion occupied an hour and a half, whereas Amendments of real importance, which were designed to purge the Church of criminous clerks, did not exceed half an hour in discussion. For instance, an Amendment that was moved by the hon. Member for Mid Glamorgan was to the effect that if a clergyman was found guilty of treason or felony, or misdemeanour, and imprisoned for a period of not less than six months, with or without hard labour, his living should be ipso facto declared vacant. That is a reasonable Amendment, and it was only debated about twenty or twenty-five minutes. We were opposed by the Attorney General and all those who are in sympathy with the Bill, and we were told that we were moving trivial and frivolous Amendments. I challenge any hon. Member who is supporting the Bill to point out a single frivolous Amendment moved by us at any stage of the Bill, and yet after eight hours' discussion a special Resolution must be passed with respect to this Bill, and the First Lord of the Treasury has gone so far as to say that the length of the discussion was unprecedented.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I did not.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: About seven years ago a Bill was discussed before this Committee on the subject of establishing a Court of Criminal Appeal, and on that occasion the discussion was kept going for twelve days by the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir J. Gorst), and a gentleman who is not at present a Member of the House, Mr. Warton. Another Bill was brought in at the same time; and after it had also been discussed at great length, the Committee came to the conclusion that they could not pass it that Session, and the Order was discharged. This was the result of the labours of the Member for Paddington and of a gentleman who is now a Member of the Government, and yet, after three days' discussion of this Bill, a Resolution of this extraordinary character is presented to the House. I move to omit the words "until the conclusion of the consideration of the Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill (Lords)."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "until the conclusion of the consideration of the Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill [Lords]." — (Mr. Lloyd-George.)

(3.0.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): When the constitution of this Committee was originally considered and fixed upon, it was thought, and I believe it was generally admitted by the House, that it would not be expedient to allow these Committees, as a matter of course, or by any action of their own, to sit during the Sittings of this House. The Amendment which has just been moved appears to me to be open to the very great objection that it would without any notice, or without any possibility of any adequate discussion, be at variance with that very carefully - considered and deliberated decision. I do not think we can proceed upon the consideration of the Amendment in its details with advantage. It is a question of such importance that it would deserve consideration quite apart from the examination we might have to make of a special case. I should be quite satisfied with this Motion as it is set out by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House if it had not been for one single expression used in the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Lloyd-George). He thought it expedient to deliver a challenge to the House and to all the Members of the House to contradict him if they were not prepared to assent to his assertion that all the Amendments moved in Committee had been so far reasonable, and that they were not open to the charge of being frivolous. I feel myself placed in so much difficulty by that challenge that I am obliged to notice, and I am bound to point out, that if this were the time for discussing the matter it might lead to a good deal of debate. I would suggest that that question had better stand over until the Amendments which have been moved in Committee are made the subject of debate in this House. But the right hon. Gentleman did not make these Amendments on their merits the subject of the present Debate. The Motion was made, so far as I understand, without any imputation on the conduct of any hon. Gentleman on the Committee. It is made upon grounds of general policy; and it is to the effect that, viewing the greater magnitude of the task before the Committee as it has now been opened, it is expedient to give increased facilities for the performance of this task. This is a Motion the general reasonableness of which has not been denied, and, if so, I should think the proper course for us to pursue is to dispose of it at once. It could not be convenient for us to allow discussion in regard to a Resolution which makes no imputation upon anybody, and which is generally fit and reasonable, to interfere considerably with the progress that we may make with the Debate, of to-day. If we are to go into controversial matter let it come in its own time, but there is no need to anticipate it. Let us, therefore, dispose if we can of that which does not give any reason for dissent.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I am glad to hear that no imputation is made on any Member of the Committee and we accept that assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), although we certainly understood both from the tone and manner of the speech of the Leader of the House that very serious allegations were made against us with respect to the character and the number of Amendments which we have placed down for discussion in the Standing Committee on Law. I have not heard sufficient grounds for the acceptance of this Resolution as a precedent; and although I do not see much against the Resolution itself I do say that no ground has been made out for a Resolution of this kind with respect to this special measure. A series of Amendments were moved in Committee; and as they involved questions of principle, of course they required discussion, and it was for that reason that we objected to the reference of the Bill to a Standing Committee at all. We wished that the Bill should be discussed in a full House, and the Amendments carefully considered, and I venture to say that the discussions in the Standing Committee have not been too long. On the contrary, the discussions have been short with one exception, which has been referred to. I proposed an Amendment which was interesting from a theoretical and theological point of view, but did not deal with the practical question, and we did not attach much importance to it. That discussion brought out so great an authority as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) who delivered by far the longest speech in that Committee, a speech that was characterised by the Attorney General as a repetition pure and simple of a speech which had been delivered by an hon. Member on a previous Amendment. The Motion of the Leader of the House is a very sweeping one; and if it is carried, the Committee will go on during the Sittings notwithstanding any adjournment of the House. I believe it was the right hon. Member for Midlothian who established this Standing Committee, and he said it was the intention of Parliament that this Committee should not sit at the same time as the House, and he is still of opinion that that is the proper course. It is proposed now that we shall not only sit day by day, but also that we shall be allowed—which, of course, means that we must—to continue our Sittings whilst this House is sitting. I do not object to sitting day by day in Committee, though it is hard on many of us. The Attorney General and others are paid for what they do, but there are Members of that Committee who have to work for their living. Still there are many of us who, in the interests of the Church of England, are self-sacrificing enough to sit four or five days a week if necessary; but, as a Member of this House, I protest against being compelled to sit up there when there may be important business in this Chamber to which I desire to attend. I say it is not fair that any hon. Member who desires to attend to his business in this House should be detained upstairs with a Bill of this character, and I shall move an Amendment which will prevent the Committee from sitting after the House has commenced its real business. It is proposed that we should sit day by day, which I suppose includes Wednesdays, Saturdays, and Sundays, for it would surely not be inappropriate to be engaged with a Church of England Bill on Sunday. Well, I do not object to sit on Wednesdays and Saturdays, but the Resolution also says that we may sit on notwithstanding any adjournment of the House. I do not know whether hon. Members on the other side are prepared to spend their Whitsuntide holidays in attempting to purify the Church of England of criminal clerks, but I must protest against being called upon to sit in Committee on questions of this character after the House has adjourned. In the meantime I hope the House will not say that the Committee upstairs, which has worked very hard and very thoroughly up to now, is to be punished, as it were, by having to neglect its duties in this House, and further by having to sit during the Whitsuntide holidays and any adjournment of the House.

(3.11.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): The right hon. Member for Midlothian says that there is no imputation that my hon. Friends who are Members of the Committee have at all frivolously moved Amendments or wasted the time of the Committee; but if the right hon. Gentleman insists on the insertion of these words, the Motion does make the imputation. I am not a Member of this Committee, but when I compare the number of Amendments moved and the discussions on them in the Grand Committee with those moved on the Bill which has occupied the House during the past three or four weeks, I find that the progress made is far greater in the Grand Committee than on the Small Holdings Bill. In most of these Bills the first clause is far and away the most important. On the Small Holdings Bill the discussion on the first clause took four or five days, but difficult points were elucidated and progress was made with the later clauses. The first clause in the Clergy Discipline Bill bristles with difficulties, and after careful examination of the Amendments moved by my hon. Friend and the discussions on them, I venture to say that the discussions were carried on very concisely and very shortly, and that, even if some of them were frivolous, which I completely deny, there was every disposition on the part of my hon. Friend to withdraw less important Amendments, and to insist, but shortly, on what he considered to be fundamental Amendments. That the Amendments were thoroughly good is evidenced by the fact that the learned Attorney General (Sir R. Webster), with the consent of the Committee, accepted several of them, and has shown also in the discussion that the Amendments of my hon. Friend have elucidated many difficult points in Clause 2 and the later Clauses of the Bill. Unless the Leader of the House withdraws these words, which refer to a special Bill, and makes it a matter of general policy that these Committees should sit from day to day and to any hour which the Committee may decide upon, I shall vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. Unless the imputation distinctly made by the inclusion of these words is withdrawn, I hope a large number of Members on this side will also vote for the excision of these words.

Question put.

(3.13.) The House divided :—
Ayes 201; Noes 40.—(Div. List,
No. 136.)

(3.23.) MR. SAMUEL EVANS: I beg now to move, Sir, in a very few words, an Amendment which I think will have the sympathy of the House. I move, Sir, to leave out all the words after "day," in order to insert the words—

"Except Wednesday and Saturday, during the sitting of the House, but not later than half-past Three."

I venture to think the Government have no right to expect us to sit six days a week. We are willing to sit four days a week if necessary, but it would be a great disadvantage to Members to have to sit on Wednesdays and Saturdays. I hope the Amendment will meet the approval of the House. I have already given my reasons for objecting to sit on the Committee when the real business commences in this House. If we extend the time to half-past three o'clock, it means that on Tuesday and Friday there is an extension of an hour and a half, and half an hour on the other days. Another effect of the Amendment would be to leave out the words "notwithstanding any adjournment of the House," and I think the desirability of leaving out those words does not require any argument.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "day" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "except Wednesday and Saturday, during the sitting of the House, but not later than half-past Three."—(Mr. Samuel Evans.)

(3.25.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is a great burden to ask the Committee to meet on those days; but who is responsible for that burden I do not care now to inquire. I would point out that, as the Resolution now stands, they are not obliged to sit on Wednesday or Saturday, or obliged to sit after half-past three. Therefore, if the Committee deliberately think they must sit on those very inconvenient days, and after that very inconvenient hour, it will be because they think it is obligatory upon them. I hope that will not prove to be the case, and if it does not prove to be the case, the Committee will have it in its power not to require its Members to sit on those days, and not to throw any unnecessary burden on them. I hope the hon. Member will not press the Amendment.

(3.27.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I think it is monstrous that the First Lord of the Treasury should now try to throw on my hon. Friend the responsibility for having such a Motion as this referred to the House. I venture to say that the right hon. Member for Midlothian in his speech took what was the fairest and most reasonable view of the matter; and when a fair Amendment is proposed, by which the Government will gain four hours a week, as well as two days, they ought to meet my hon. Friend by accepting it. I hope a large number of Members on this side who are already serving on a number of Committees, as well as attending to their private business, will make a strong protest against this ruthless way of compelling Members to attend long hours each day in the service of the House. The right hon. Gentleman by the course he has taken is doing nothing to preserve the free discussion of this Bill, and if he insists upon his methods he will find that he will gain nothing. The Bill will be thoroughly discussed. My hon. Friends will never submit to any pressure in this House, or elsewhere, which will prevent them from giving a fair and ample discussion to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman by his attempt to place the responsibility for obstruction upon my hon. Friends is only doing what has been tried several times before with regard to general questions on this side of the House by him and other Leaders of the House. I venture to say it is not a fair way of dealing with those who have discussed this Bill fairly, and who desire still to do their business, not only in this Committee, but in the House as well.

*(3.33.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): As one of the Members of the Committee I must protest against what has been said by the hon. Member who has just sat down. There is no good mincing matters. This is an attempt to put down the most reckless obstruction. The obstruction is from four Members who are on that Committee, and who are determined to stop this Bill passing. To talk of adding an hour or an hour and a half to the time seems to me to be simply childish. They may talk of adding another hour or two, or three or four, or even five hours; but what I say is that having referred this Bill to the Grand Committee, that Committee should get through with it, if they should sit from Monday noon till twelve o'clock at night, to put down obstruction. Then the hon. Gentleman says, to show how bona fide were these Amendments, that there was an Amendment moved by which a clergyman found drunk twice on the street was to be punished, which was not recognised to be a proper Amendment. That is not a correct statement of the facts. I asked the question myself, and it is clear from the Bill that a clergyman who is found intoxicated once on the street will of course be turned out of his benefice. ("No, no!") I say "Yes." It is under Clause 2. There is no question whatever about it; but we are not permitted to get to Clause 2. I defy anybody who reads the records of the Committee to say that this is not a most gross piece of absolute obstruction. If four Members are to be allowed to talk out and stop a Bill of this sort, all I can say is this, that Parliament must alter its Rules completely. I do hope that this Motion will be carried, and that we shall sit next Monday, not only during three hours, but the whole time up to twelve o'clock at night, to show these four hon. Members that we are determined to pass this Bill.

(3.34.) MR. ROBERTSON (Dundee): The tone and language of the hon. Member who has just sat down has imported into this Debate an element which had better have been left out. I had no intention of supporting my hon. Friends below the Gangway on this occasion, and I had no intention of taking part in the Debate but for the few words which have fallen from the hon. Gentleman opposite; and I wish to say at once that I am not an opponent of this Bill. I have never voted against this Bill, and I have taken no part in the Debate on the Bill. I neither commend nor condemn the course taken by the Welsh Members below the Gangway in this House and in the Committee. But I wish to say this—and this has been directly brought out by what has fallen from the hon. Member opposite—that if this Motion is an attempt to put down obstruction in the Grand Committee, I venture to say there ought to be no such thing possible as obstruction in the Grand Committee, and no Bill ought ever to be referred to a Grand Committee that is capable of being obstructed—("Oh, oh!")—which is in its nature contentious. ("Oh, oh!") The First Lord of the Treasury assents to that proposition. I do not know whether the First Lord of the Treasury has sat on a Grand Committee. I have sat on Grand Committees during the last six years. I recognise the utility of these institutions; I recognise the usefulness of the mixed system; but there is no part of our procedure which is susceptible of more dangerous development than this Grand Committee system. I have come to this most definite conclusion, with which I believe that all Members who have experience on Grand Committees will concur, that they are a useful instrument for Bills of a technical character or that require the consideration of Members who are more or less experts; but if Bills involve contentious matter, then they ought not to be sent to a Grand Committee at all. We had a Bill of this sort four or five years ago before a Grand Committee, the Light Railways Bill, with regard to which the same sort of charge was made. I am not charging the Welsh Members with obstruction, I am not disposed very much to favour their methods; but I believe they have done what they conscientiously believed to be right. The first mistake was made late at night when this Bill was first of all closed to the Second Reading, and when the reference to the Grand Committee was carried without discussion. The very fact of this Bill having been closed to a Second Reading rendered it unfit to be sent to a Grand Committee. I shall vote against the substantive Motion when it comes back, because I believe it to be a Motion in aid of this reference to a Grand Committee of a Bill which ought not to have been so referred.

(3.37.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Of course, personally I do not care very much whether a clergyman is found once or twice drunk on the street. I merely wish to say that I differ from the hon. Member who has just sat down in what he has said about the tone and language which have been imported into this Debate. I am very much obliged to the hon. Gentleman who made use of that language for introducing that tone. I cannot say that I would have adopted it myself, but I must say that if you want to have the attention of the public fixed upon a matter like this, it is by importing a tone of acrimony into a Debate that you can most effectually fix it. There is one other point on which I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee was right; that was when he said that no Bill should be referred to a Grand Committee which it is possible to obstruct. I do not know how far I have myself obstructed since I have been in this House, but I hope at some future time to inflict my obstruction and tediousness on the House. But I may remind my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee and other Members of the House, that this is a question on which there is a keen feeling in Wales; and if the hon. Members from Wales have been in earnest in what they were bringing before that Committee, and if they obstructed in the Grand Committee or in the House, they did what I hope they will do on other questions, because I know perfectly well that all the electorate of Wales will stand any amount of obstruction on this question, either in this House or in the Grand Committee.

(3.40.) SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I do not wish to imitate the hon. Member who has just sat down.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I quite absolve you.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: There has been a new tone introduced into this Debate. It appears from speakers on the other side that this Motion is intended distinctly to put down obstruction, and it has been clearly pointed out that four Members sitting here are the guilty parties. When I think of that, it reminds me of old times. It is four Welsh Members who are the four obstructors; but I see four other Members sitting here to whom in obstructing these Welshmen could not hold a candle. I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House will he deny that he is sitting there now because he obstructed with skill? I think it is rather too late in the day for his friends to get up and say they are actuated by a holy horror of obstruction. I do not know now how this Debate will end; I do not know when it will end; but I think there is one thing clear, and that is that the country will read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest what is going on. I am not seeking to blame anybody; I am only going to point out the uncertainty of this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR W. LAWSON: Mr. Speaker, as I see you are going to call me to order, I shall sit down.

*MR. SPEAKER: I was not so much going to call the hon. Baronet to order as to observe that the Debate generally was getting rather wide of the particular Amendment before the House.

(3.42.) MR. PHILIPPS: I do not intend to stand between the House and the Division for more than a moment. I only want to say one word. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has not seen fit to accept this Amendment, which is an Amendment, I think, of an exceedingly moderate character. As to the remarks of the hon. Member for Islington, I think he is sufficiently answered by the fact that he or any Member of the Grand Committee on Law has been challenged to put his finger on any one of these Amendments and say which Amendment is obstructive, which Amendment would not strengthen the Bill. There is not a single Amendment either in the name of myself or any of my hon. Friends that anybody could say is obstructive or that would not strengthen the Bill. We have given that challenge, and hon. Members opposite have absolutely refused to meet it. I think we below the Gangway here are to-day in an unfortunate position, and I ask the House to sympathise with us. We are in an unfortunate position because we are a small minority, and we have no leader. Where is my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton? Even he has left off leading us below the Gangway. I regret his absence. All we want is a leader.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is whether Wednesday and Saturday should be excepted. The hon. Member is not speaking to the Amendment.

MR. PHILIPPS: I had hoped to have heard the views of some hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench on this Wednesday and Saturday question. I had hoped to have heard what the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Clitheroe Division would have told us; whether he thinks we ought to sit on Wednesday and Saturday. It will be in the recollection of all the Members of the Grand Committee on Law that yesterday afternoon the right hon. Baronet the Member for Clitheroe took or attempted to take the leadership of my hon. Friends and myself. He was directing our operations and I think I have a right of complaint against the right hon. Baronet that after attempting to lead us on the Grand Committee on Law, he will not even express his opinion upon matters in which we have a deep interest when he comes down to the House.

(3.45.) MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I do not rise to complain of the language or manner of the hon. Member for Islington, but to take note of the fact that when he spoke about obstruction in the Standing Committee his words were hailed with a universal cheer from that side of the House. I would suggest to the consideration of the House whether if the charge made by the hon. Gentleman is true, the Resolution which is before the House is the proper mode of dealing with the mischief. I should myself be inclined to think that it is an unreasonable thing that because a well-known and recognised Parliamentary offence is committed by a small number of Gentlemen either in the House or in the Grand Committee, a measure should be taken which should be punitive not only in respect of these individuals, but also of every Member of the Committee. When we consider what that involves to a large number of Members of the House upon whose time there is already so much pressure, I say I think the House ought to pause before it comes to such a decision. I recollect some years ago I was on the Standing Committee on Law, when the Bankruptcy Bill of 1883 came before the Committee. The proceedings were exceedingly protracted. I myself moved 147 Amendments, and carried forty-two of them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, who was co-operating with us, repeatedly expressed his conviction that the proceedings in that Committee, if they were not obstructive, were at any rate closely bordering upon obstruction; but nobody proposed that we should sit even four days in the week, and such a proposal never entered anybody's mind. It appears to me that there is very great danger in establishing a precedent of this kind, and that if an offence has been committed it ought to be dealt with in a different way. This particular way is unreasonable and unjust.

*(3.51.) MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I venture to remind the hon. Member (Mr. A. O'Connor) that we on the Grand Committee are not prisoners, as he has suggested, by this Resolution, which is purely permissive and not mandatory. The Resolution only gives the Committee further powers than it now possesses, but its hours are entirely within its own will. I do not think the number of Members on the Committee against whom any charge of unduly prolonging the discussions is as high as four. I am not one of the supporters of the Bill now before the Committee, but having been present at the Committee during all its Sittings, and having helped the Government rather better than they sometimes have helped themselves at making a quorum, I venture to say that the question before the House is really the efficiency of these Grand Committees to carry on their business, and I support this Resolution, believing that in so doing I am supporting that efficiency.

*(3.53.) MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I am curious to know whether I am one of the Members whom the hon. Gentleman thinks unduly protract the proceedings of the Committee. I think the Welsh Members have every reason to complain of the tone of this Debate. What could we possibly gain by obstructing the passage of this Bill upstairs? Even were we so minded we could only delay it for a day or two; but the House is not ready yet to consider the Report stage of the Bill, and, therefore, a couple of days more or less occupied in Committee will not in the smallest degree prejudice the passing of the Bill this Session. I would suggest an answer to the question by the First Lord of the Treasury as to who is responsible for the protracted proceedings. The Attorney General said in the case of one Amendment he could not accept it, because to do so would be a breach of faith with the Bishops. Things have come to a pretty pass when Bills coming down from the Lords are not to be amended or discussed because of some agreement which has been entered into between the Government and the Bishops.

(3.55.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do not wish to go into the merits of the Bill, or into the question whether there has been obstruction upstairs. It certainly seems rather a strong measure that the Grand Committee should be called upon to sit during the hours that a discussion is proceeding in this House. We are sent here by our constituents to profit by all the wisdom that falls from Members in the House; but here you would have thirty or forty Members who could not listen to the speeches. But there is another objection. It might be said that although Members did not fulfil their duty of hearing the speeches at least they might vote; but by this Resolution voting might be proceeding upstairs in the Committee and here in the House at the same time. I do not give much weight to the question whether the Grand Committee should sit on a Wednesday, but we ought to have a clear understanding as to the business of these Grand Committees. Under these circumstances, I certainly should feel myself bound to vote against the Grand Committee being called upon by a Rule of this House to sit while this House is engaged in a discussion.

(3.57.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): It would be a great pity if there was any considerable expression of objection by Members on this side against this Resolution, which I believe in the circumstances to be absolutely necessary. My friends below the Gangway have said that they do not desire to obstruct the Bill, and that, on the contrary, their object is to improve it. Of course I accept that statement, but we must form our own judgment as to the effect of the course they have taken of repeating Amendment after Amendment on the same principle after a Division was taken. Their efforts to improve the Bill would have made it impossible for the measure to pass; and they thereby would have inflicted a deep wound upon one of the most useful and pleasant institutions connected with this House—I mean the Grand Committees, where we can discuss Bills in a friendly manner with an absence of all Party spirit. The course which is being followed would fatally damage the Grand Committee, as well as prove fatal to the Bill. We have no power of closing in the Grand Committees, and therefore it is necessary to provide the remedy of prolonged powers of sitting which may or may not be exercised. For that reason I consider the Resolution is absolutely necessary, and I trust it will be supported from this side of the House.

Question put.

(3.45.) The House divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 233.—(Div. List, No. 137.)

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

*(4.14.) MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I rise to a point of order. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, when asked whether it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the Committee stage of the Local Government (Ireland) Bill, gave an answer which left no doubt in the minds of hon. Members that the Government do not propose to go into Committee on the Bill.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I never said so.

*MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I wish to know whether it is in Order to continue the discussion upon the Motion for the Second Reading of a Bill which the responsible Minister of the Crown admits is not to be carried into Committee.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to move that the Question be now put.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must decline to allow such a Question to be put.

(4.16.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): In the discussion upon this Bill, the hon. Member for West Belfast said that he had been unable to discover what the County Councils in Ireland would do under its provisions. I am not surprised at his failure, because the hon. Member is lacking in the essential quality necessary to enable him to form an adequate judgment on the provisions of this Bill. He, no doubt, subjected the measure to a searching examination; but the whole tone of his remarks showed that he had no knowledge of the business which is transacted at the Baronial Sessions and before Grand Juries in Ireland. From the standpoint of the hon. Member, the business at the Baronial Sessions and before a Grand Jury is of a humdrum character. Necessarily so. The sittings do not provide the exciting scenes and mutual invective which make some meetings so interesting to the public. The hon. Member said that the people of Ireland would not accept this measure; but I entirely refuse to take the hon. Member as the mouthpiece of the Irish people in regard to this Bill. I am not aware that he is even entitled to speak for the smallest section of hon. Members opposite. We have heard this sort of declamation before. It is part of the stock-in-trade of hon. Members sitting on the other side of the House to say that the people of Ireland will refuse to accept any measure coming from this side of the House. I want to draw the attention of the House to the attitude of hon. Gentlemen opposite and to the character of the attack which they have made upon this Bill. Their arguments were not only conflicting in character, but they were absolutely self-destructive of each other. Now the hon. Member for Northampton charged the Government with having neglected their pledges, and the hon. Member for West Leeds (Mr. H. Gladstone) accused them first of all of delay, and then, abandoning that charge, he proceeded to assert that they had had no mandate for the production of this Bill. Then the hon. Member for Newcastle said this was a reactionary measure—more reactionary than that produced in 1879. The Bill of 1879 may have been of a more liberal and less reactionary character than the present Bill, according to the views of the young men who dream dreams and the old men who see visions on the opposite side of the House; but I should be sorry to see any Member on this side of the House introduce a Bill of the character of that which was introduced in 1879. The hon. Member for Carnarvon called the attention of the House to the proceedings of the Committee which sat in 1879; but I must remind hon. Members that that Committee was not appointed to consider the question of Local Government in the counties of Ireland, but that of the Local Government and the taxation of the towns of Ireland. Then, again, the hon. Member for the City of Waterford wrote an article in the Fortnightly Review in the month of May, in which he attacked this Bill from beginning to end, and most of his points were repeated yesterday by the hon. Member for West Belfast. The hon. Member for the City of Waterford said the Bill was based on a distrust of the Irish people, and that it was insulting and vicious in principle. I ask how far he can possibly maintain that criticism. What is there in the limits of this Bill that is insulting or vicious? So far as the question of the franchise is concerned, there is nothing in the Bill to warrant the charges brought by the Member for the City of Waterford against it. It is not an insult to the Irish people, and it is not vicious when compared with the measure relating to England and Scotland. Take the Baronial Councils and the County Councils. They are to have elected members. So far, therefore, as those Bodies are concerned, the Bill is far from being insulting to the Irish people or vicious in principle. So far, therefore, I am at issue with the hon. Member for the City of Waterford and the hon. Member for West Belfast. I also say that the County Councils are not "cribbed, cabined, and confined," under this Bill I assert that the County Council exercises an absolutely free and unfettered control over the annual expenditure of the county, and that the only body in connection with this Local Government Bill that is fettered is the Joint Committee. In considering the question of Local Government in Ireland, it is necessary to recollect the position of Local Government at the present moment. Hon. Members have, inside and outside the House, dealt with the Grand Juries as if they were omnipotent. They are nothing of the kind, and anybody who knows anything of the Grand Jury system knows that the Grand Jury are not the initiating body; that they have no power to deal with county expenditure in Ireland except that which is sent to them from the lower body of the Baronial Sessions. And the Joint Committee has really conferred upon it much smaller powers than the Grand Juries have at the present moment. I desire to consider fully what are the powers of the Council. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. Rednond) said the Bill preserved intact the powers of the Grand Jury, and he said it gave the control, particularly of finance, to the Joint Committee. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) said the Council would be the mere drudge of the Joint Committee, and that the Committee would be able to vote down the Council. I protest against that view being taken of the probable action of the Committee. It is not in accordance with the facts of Local Government in Ireland. In the first place, I will take the conduct of affairs at the Baronial Sessions, than which there could be no more popular assembly for the transaction of county business. The whole neighbourhood attend, and with little check from the presiding Magistrate state their opinions. And although the Sessions are carried on by Magistrates and cess payers selected by what I believe to be a cumbersome method, the decision arrived at by the Baronial Session is a popular conclusion, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred reflects popular opinion on the matter. There is no practice in Ireland which the hon. Member can allege in support of his statement that the representatives of the Grand Jury upon the Joint Committee would be likely or would necessarily or perpetually vote down the representatives of the cess payers; and I protest against that view being taken either by the House or by the country as a fair representation of what would occur upon these Committees. Then as to the question whether the Council is to be the drudge of the Committee, let me remind the House that, under this Bill, the Joint Committee is only given powers over capital expenditure. I will take the clause with the interpretation put upon it by the hon. Member himself, and will draw the attention of the House to the fact that the capital expenditure of the county, as interpreted by the hon. Gentleman, forms a very small percentage indeed of the whole expenditure, which, as I maintain, is under the free and unfettered control of the County Council. I have here a return dealing with the expenditure of the County of Antrim for the last five years, discriminating between capital expenditure as it will be under the provisions of this measure, and total expenditure under the total presentments of the county. In 1887 the capital expenditure was only 13 per cent. of the total expenditure; in 1888 it was only 12 per cent.; in 1889, 16½ per cent.; in 1890, 20½ per cent.; in 1891, 17½ per cent. of the total, making an average for the five years of 15¾ per cent. And it must be remembered that the County of Antrim shows a higher ratio than any other county in Ireland. I have also a return for the County Down for the same number of years, and in only one of the five years was the capital expenditure one per cent. of the total expenditure of the county. The average for the five years was .82 per cent., so that in County Down only an infinitesimal proportion of the capital expenditure would be drawn from the free and unfettered control of the County Council. I take next a county with which I am intimately connected—the county in which I live—Tyrone. That county is a fair example, and it is a county which has the two rate guarantees which are given under the clause, and one that meets in every respect the provisions of this clause withholding from the County Councils certain control. The proportion of the capital expenditure of the County of Tyrone during the last five years was only 3.04. I will just give one more instance to complete the argument which I want to draw from this. I will take the total sum of the presentments for the whole of Ireland for 1889, and I will take that year because it is the last year available in Thom's Almanac. I will ask the House to listen to the result which shows how infinitesimal is the point which the hon. Member for West Belfast is making against the Bill upon this clause. The gross presentment in Ireland for 1889 was £1,320,464. I will draw the attention of the House to two items—one is the item for new roads, new bridges, and the repair of roads and bridges about the county, which comes to £654,576, and the other deals with the buildings under the control of the Grand Jury, amounting to £8,060. These items make together £662,636. Now the proportion of that particular sum, taking the County Tyrone as an average county, that would be withdrawn from the absolutely free and unfettered control of the County Council would be £19,879. That is to say, that out of the whole sum under the control of the County Council by this Bill, £1,322,464, the control of only a sum of less than £20,000 would have to meet with the approval of the Joint Committees in the counties of Ireland.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): What about the officers' salaries?

MR. MACARTNEY: The officers' salaries are not capital expenditure.

MR. SEXTON: They are under the control of the Standing Joint Committee.

MR. MACARTNEY: They do not come within the provisions of the clause, and I contest altogether the point which the hon. Member makes. The whole of the salaries of the officers only amount to £190,000, and the hon. Member will see that if worked out that will hardly be one per cent., and will not make it five per cent. of the calculation I have made. It will not affect the argument at all. The figures on this question are entirely against the view which he has presented to the House that this Bill mutilates the power of the County Councils by withdrawing control. I say, and I have shown, that the items which are withdrawn from the control of the County Councils, and which must come under the approval of the Joint Committee, form practically an insignificant proportion of the expenditure of any county in Ireland. I wish to say a word upon the constitution of the Joint Committee. I admit, as was admitted by my right hon. Friend in introducing the measure, that the provisions of the Bill with regard to the Chairman of this Joint Committee are not satisfactory. An attack has been made on the Sheriff as the Chairman by the hon. Member for the City of Waterford, who has clearly manifested thereby his entire lack of knowledge of the Grand Jury system. He objects to the Sheriff as being one of the hardened sinners on the Grand Jury. As a matter of fact the Sheriffs are generally the youngest members of the Grand Juries, the most inexperienced, and therefore from my point of view the least proper persons on the Grand Juries to be appointed Chairmen of these Joint Committees. But I understand it is not a provision to which the Government are absolutely pledged; because they themselves say they experienced difficulty in settling it. There are no officers in Ireland who correspond to the Sheriff in Scotland. I do not believe it will be possible to substitute the County Court Judges, for reasons which are apparent to anybody who knows Ireland. They are not connected with merely one county, and therefore they would not suit the convenience of the Joint Committee or of the public administration of business. Then there is the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and I discard him for other reasons which I need not discuss now. I have, however, a suggestion to make as to the Chairman—either let the senior member of the elected representatives of the Grand Jury be the Chairman, or let the foreman of the Grand Jury preside. If you took the foreman of the Grand Jury the interests of public business would be served; and in Ireland it is a question of the adequate transaction of public business. In the case of England and Scotland the Government recognised this by putting in the position men who were acquainted with the discharge of public business, that the County Councils might be informed of their duties. If that was required in the case of England and Scotland, it is certainly necessary in the case of Ireland. I do not attach any value to the charge of the hon. Member for West Belfast that the seven Grand Jurymen and the Sheriff would vote down the other seven representatives of the County Council. It is a charge that can be made in this House with great freedom; but it is a charge discredited in Ireland, and it is a charge devoid of weight or substance. I do not care to discuss whether the Joint Committee is to consist of fourteen, or of even or uneven proportions; but I do admit that there is weight in the objection to choosing the Sheriff as Chairman, and I believe that either the foreman of the Grand Jury or the senior member of the Grand Jury would be most useful. The hon. Member said that a great principle had been destroyed when the illiterate voters were not given the privileges of the Ballot Act.

MR. SEXTON: No, I contend that a new electoral test has been imposed.

MR. MACARTNEY: The hon. Member said it was a shabby expedient, and he went on to say that a man who contributes has a right to possess a voice in the expenditure of local taxation. Yes, the whole question at issue is whether the man who is an illiterate voter at the present moment would have any voice whatever. I say he would have no voice, and I make that statement deliberately. I have had a longer experience of elections in Ireland than any hon. Member sitting opposite. Before the hon. Member for West Belfast came into public life at all, I was, in 1873, personating agent, and in 1874 and 1881 I was head polling agent in one of the largest polling districts in South Tyrone. I saw every illiterate voter come there to record his vote. I was there during the triangular election when Mr. Parnell ran a candidate against the recognised Liberal candidate. I do not believe that on that occasion two per cent. who gave their votes as illiterates gave them in the way they desired. They wished to give their votes in favour of Mr. Parnell's candidate, but the local organisation of the National League brought their pressure to bear in support of the Liberal candidate who is now sitting as hon. Member for the City of Dublin. In the minds of anybody who knows anything of the interior of an Irish polling booth, there cannot exist any doubt as to the fact that illiterate voters do not record their votes freely and openly. And if under this Act you allowed the illiterate voter to have the privileges of the Ballot Act he would still have no voice; his vote would have to be given according to the views of the political organisation which has him in tow. Therefore I say my right hon. Friend is quite right in excluding the illiterate voters from the privileges of the Ballot Act, and in so doing he is securing that the votes given under this Bill will be tendered in accordance with the ideas of the elector. I now come to the question of the police. The police of Ireland have always been on a different footing from the English police. The Irish counties have never contributed to the support of their own police, and the Governing Bodies of Irish counties have never had control of their police, and I should certainly view this Bill with the greatest apprehension if it placed the control of the police in the hands of the County Councils. I should view it with equal apprehension in my own City of Cork. It would be a dangerous matter to introduce into Irish politics, and I am glad that my right hon. Friend has deemed it right not to depart from the principles upon which this Bill was supposed to be framed—namely, that it should be a Bill for the transference to elected Councils in Ireland that business which has been carried on by non-elected bodies—and that he did not adopt the principle of conferring upon these newly-elected bodies powers which would be dangerous to themselves and certainly dangerous to the communities over which they were to have control. I now come to the clause upon which the strongest attack has been made. I allude to the clause which provides for the appeal of twenty cess payers against the action of the County Council, and gives them the remedy before two Judges at law. This clause has been introduced, as the Attorney General stated, for the purpose of providing adequate and efficient protection of the cess payers of Ireland; and I suppose that nobody will deny the presence of ample grounds for the introduction of protective provisions, in the interests of cess payers, against apprehended extravagance or misconduct on the part of the popularly-elected county bodies in Ireland. I think my right hon. Friend was amply justified in inserting in the Bill a provision of this sort. The Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. John Redmond) has said that it might be argued from our point of view that the clause might be left in the Bill, because if County Councils do not commit acts of oppression and are not guilty of misconduct it would be inoperative. But I go a step further than that, and say that if the County Councils are guilty of acts of oppression and of such misconduct as would bring them within the purview of the clause, it would be equally inoperative. Therefore, while I agree that the authors of this Bill had sufficient justification for introducing a clause to protect the cess payers in Ireland, I myself do not think this clause is a necessity, and I should not be at all sorry to see it disappear from the Bill, and, I believe, a great many hon. Members on this side concur in the views I am now stating. Now, Sir, I have to say one word of disagreement with certain expressions which have fallen from right hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House with regard to this Bill. The Attorney General for Ireland said that in his opinion this is a comparatively unimportant Bill, and remarks of a similar character have been made by the Leader of the House. I do not agree at all with that view. Speaking as an Irishman, and representing cess payers of Ireland, I look upon this as one of the most important Bills the present Government have introduced, and I am delighted that the cess payers will receive from a Unionist Government that which they have long desired to have—complete and unfettered control of the annual expenditure of their counties. I believe this Bill will do as much as any Bill the Government have introduced to create good feeling between the different sections of the Irish people, and I am not so apprehensive as some are that these County Councils or Baronial Sessions will be turned into mere arenas of political discord. The views of the hon. Member for Belfast that the members of the Joint Committee who represent the Grand Juries will be found consistently voting down the representatives of the County Councils are, in my opinion, incorrect. I believe that in nine cases out of ten the gentlemen who compose these Committees will be experienced men of business, and that whatever their political differences may be, when they meet for county purposes they will impartially deal with the local matters that come before them. In conclusion let me say that I cordially support this Bill, believing it will be productive of the greatest possible good to every class and section of my country.

(4.55.) MR. THOMAS HEALY Wexford, N.): I have to congratulate the hon. Member who has just sat down on the remarkable clearness with which he has dealt with a measure which we believe to be a perfect sham, and which we are aware the Government have not the smallest intention of proceeding with. What they hope to gain by bringing it in is one of those things I am unable to understand. When the Bill was introduced the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) did everything in his power by speech and manner to show that he was performing an uncongenial task. The only explanation I can give for the introduction of this measure is that the near approach of the General Election has stirred the Unionist conscience and has induced them to put pressure on the Government to fulfil one, at least, of the many promises by which they got into power. Well, Sir, I have carefully studied this Bill, and I maintain that every section and every line of it is based on suspicion, dread, and hostility, and is a rooted insult to the Irish people. To my mind it is a curious commentary on the Unionist speeches we have been listening to for the past four or five years. Hon. and right hon. Members opposite have been going about the country telling audiences that under the beneficent influence of the Unionist Government Ireland is now in a state of absolute peace and quiet, that law-abiding citizens are now able to go about their duties without fear of being molested by anybody, and that the people of Ireland are only too anxious to obey the law. If these speeches are true, why is this Bill framed in the manner it is? If the people of Ireland are simply yearning to obey the law, how is it this Bill is framed to take away from them some of the few privileges they possess at the present time? One clause of it will deprive the Irish people of a right they have enjoyed since the reign of William IV.—the right to deal with cases of malicious injury. Now, we were told about a month ago, in this House, by the Chief Secretary for Ireland that there was now no person in Ireland who was either partially or wholly boycotted. If that is the truth, where is the necessity for introducing this clause, when the very persons it is apparently intended to benefit do not exist? Clause 6 of this Bill not only takes away that right from the Irish people which they have enjoyed for so long, but it provides that they are to have no power dealing with criminal matters in Ireland, and the County Councils to be formed under this Bill will not be allowed to administer the oath. I maintain that Section 6 of this Bill gives the lie to every Unionist speech that has been made during the past six years. The provisions of this Bill have been so completely riddled and blown out of the water by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) that I do not intend to go through them in detail, but there is one matter to which I should like to allude. I refer to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Macartney), as to what goes on at Presentment Sessions in Ireland. Now, I have had some experience in connection with these sessions, and I have never seen anything but a fair and impartial hearing given by the men from whom this Bill proposes to take away the right of dealing with cases of malicious injury. Every case that comes before them is decided on its merits. It will not do for any man to come before them and merely say he is boycotted or objectionable to his neighbour; that will not ensure his application being entertained. If I want to look for corruption in the Boards of Ireland, I should not look to these Presentment Sessions, but rather to the immaculate Grand Juries. I have seen over and over again that no case coming before these men is too weak. No matter how flimsy a man's case might be, or how bad his character, if he could get up and swear that he was boycotted, or in any way obnoxious, he was certain to have his application considered favourably, and every penny he might ask for given him. It is not very long ago since the wife of a Grand Jurymen in County Cork got twelve months with hard labour for setting fire to her house. On two or three previous occasions her husband had obtained compensation for the burning down of his premises, and I have not the slightest doubt that if the woman had not been caught at last in the very act, her husband would have again gone before the Grand Jury, and received compensation for the destruction of his property. This is one of the bodies that it is proposed should be allowed to deal with the question of malicious injuries; and the inferior body, which in one case that came under my own knowledge took a view that was subsequently taken by a learned Judge, are not to be trusted. I have no hesitation in voting against this Bill as I should against any Bill which is based on hostility to the Irish people, and which gives to a Judge of Assize the power to disfranchise a county and to place the elected representatives of the people in the dock; and, further than that, allows an unrepresentative and unsympathetic body like that which exists at Dublin Castle to override an election, and place other people in the position of the representatives of the ratepayers. We want a Home Rule Bill, but this is a cross between a Coercion Bill and a Bill for the glorification of Boards of Guardians. One other remark I make with reluctance, and that has reference to the speech of the Member for South Armagh (Mr. Blane). He said—and I was glad to hear him as a patriotic Irishman make the remark—that the Protestant majority had nothing to fear from the oppression of the Catholic majority, and he, for one, would protest with all his power against any such oppression wherever he met with it. The Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) got up in his place and said that when he spoke of the oppression of the Protestant minority he made no allusion to the section of the Nationalist Party to which my hon. Friend (Mr. Blane) belongs. I suppose, therefore, he pointed at the section to which I belong. A man's nature is best shown by his spontaneous actions. I do not happen to be a large employer of labour, but I employ three men; and it may relieve the mind of the hon. Member for South Belfast to know that, although I am a Catholic, and my family are Catholics, and nineteen-twentieths of my friends are Catholics, yet of those three men two are Protestants. I think that will show hon. Gentlemen opposite that they have as little to fear from the section to which I belong as from the section to which the hon. Member for South Armagh belongs. I am sorry this question was brought up, because I do not believe there is the smallest fear that anybody in Ireland will be persecuted on account of his religion. No Irish Catholic will be any party to persecuting anyone because of a difference of religious opinion; and it was well said by a great Englishman, the late Cardinal Manning, that he had no fear that the Irish Catholics would ever persecute any religious creed, because, he added touchingly, "the children of the martyrs are never persecutors." I can assure hon. Gentlemen that they have nothing to fear from the Irish Catholics; and my constant hope and fervent prayer is that the day may be close at hand when every section of the Irish people will be found sitting side by side in a Parliament in College Green working in harmony for the common good of their country.

*(5.12.) MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid): I desire to congratulate the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Thomas Healy) on what I believe was his maiden speech. He dealt with the question from a practical point of view, and I propose to follow his example. He must not suppose that we entertain any fears that he would personally display any intolerance towards his fellow-subjects in Ireland; but if he asks me to go further, and to say that the loyal majority are in no danger of oppression at the hands of the majority, I regret to say that I am unable to agree with him, and I propose to offer some reasons for my opinion before I sit down. The hon. Gentleman seems to think that this Bill with its safeguards is an insult to Irish sentiment. I think the Bill without its safeguards would have been an insult to British common sense. An hon. Member, yesterday, said that there is something unreal about this Debate. What is the unreality?

An hon. MEMBER: The Bill.

MR. BARTON: No; the Bill is real enough. It is here in substantial form. It is the opposition to the Bill which is unreal. The indignation is feigned; the fury is simulated; the opposition was preconcerted before the Bill was introduced. The provisions of this Bill were prejudged before they were printed. The night before the Bill was introduced the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), speaking in the congenial atmosphere of Whitechapel, said of this Bill that it was a sham and a futile measure. The people of Whitechapel were evidently astonished at that statement; and, seeing their astonishment, he proceeded—

“You may say I ought not to judge it before I have seen it; but I have a taste for gardening, and I know you cannot get grapes from thorns or figs from thistles.”

It is plain that the right hon. Gentleman had made up his mind beforehand to oppose this Bill, and I say this Bill has not had a fair hearing or a fair trial in this House. We are told, amongst other things, that the Government ought to have introduced this Bill before; but I will ask hon. Members to carry their minds back ten years, and in 1882, when the Liberals were in power, the Member for Longford placed on the Paper a Motion in these words:—

“That this House regrets that the promises several times made of amendment of the Grand Jury system in Ireland have not been carried out.”

It had been promised by right hon. Gentlemen opposite in the Queen's Speech in 1881, and in 1882 we find the Nationalist Party complaining that the promise had not been acted upon; and now, when this Government attempts to carry out the reform of the Grand Jury system, both sections opposite unite to defeat their intention. It will be found, if you look at this Bill, that it will be convenient to distinguish between two separate portions of the Bill—the enfranchising portion and the safeguarding portion. It is by an ingenious confusion of these two portions that a plausible case is made on the other side. The enfranchising portion of the Bill follows the lines of the English and Scotch Bills, and can hardly be criticised; but objection is taken to the safeguarding portions. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) described ten points in the Bill as ten insults to Ireland. I represent a constituency in which there is a Unionist majority, and where there would be a Unionist majority in a County Council. If these points in the Bill are insults, they must be insults to my supporters. But I find that these insults melt away on examination and on comparison with a very interesting document—a County Government Bill for Ireland, which was brought forward by the Irish Party in 1888. That Bill contained almost all of these ten insults—some of them in a worse shape than in the Bill before the House. What were these ten alleged insults? The first was the withdrawing of a privilege in the case of the illiterate voter which had been abused. How can they call it an insult to withdraw in the case of Ireland a privilege which the House of Commons has lately declared by a large majority should be withdrawn throughout the whole of the United Kingdom? What hon. Gentlemen opposite ask for is not equality, but ascendancy. The second insult is the cumulative vote. In my constituency it is for the protection of the Nationalist minority, and I cannot look upon it as an insult to support a Bill which contains a provision for giving representation to my Nationalist opponents. The next supposed insult to Ireland refers to the fixing of boundaries, which is left to the Lord Lieutenant. It was suggested that they should be dealt with as in England, where it was said that in the cities it is left to the Corporations and in counties to Quarter Sessions. If that suggestion were adopted in Belfast, it would be left to the Tory Corporation, and in the counties to the Grand Juries, which correspond to English Quarter Sessions, and yet the hon. Member complains that the Lord Lieutenant is selected in the Bill. Whatever the Lord Lieutenant does can be criticised in this House, and he can be held responsible. In the Bill of the hon. Members opposite in 1888, will the House believe, the fixing of the areas of the baronies was to be left to the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council, and yet they ask the House to say that the same provision in this Bill is an insult to Ireland. The next alleged insult to Ireland is that Belfast and Dublin are not treated like other cities. The hon. Member in his adroit way pointed out that these cities had not been dealt with specially in the Bill, but he did not point out that by this Bill all the other municipal boroughs have been enfranchised, and instead of a £10 rating franchise, householders have been given the Parliamentary franchise for municipal purposes. He did not refer to that, but he did refer to the fact that, for particular reasons which I can well understand, Belfast and Dublin are not dealt with in this Bill. They have different machinery for municipal and registration purposes, and they are dealt with by different Acts which have recently been passed by this House extending their franchise; and if you were to deal with those cities in the Bill, it would take two or three pages to deal with their special requirements. I can well understand why that should be left to be dealt with afterwards. But I would remind the House that the Bill enfranchises all the other municipal boroughs, and meets the claim they have made for so many years. Under these circumstances, I think I am entitled to say that the treatment of these cities is no insult to Ireland. The next of these insults to Ireland is that the Grand Juries are left in possession of jurisdiction in claims for malicious injuries. The Attorney-General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) admitted that that was a matter on which the Government were willing to meet the views of the House. I venture to say that the Grand Juries do not wish to keep the settlement of these cases; we all want to find an independent tribunal to settle them. The question did not arise on the English and Scotch Bills. Mrs. Lewis's case is always trotted out when Grand Juries are under discussion. Frauds in cases of this kind may occur before any tribunal. There have been many cases of fraud on Insurance Companies, and there was recently in England a case of conspiracy to defraud Insurance Companies. The Grand Jury system in Ireland, however, guards as carefully as possible the interests of the ratepayers from fraud. The hon. Member who just spoke said there was a case of great injustice before a Grand Jury. But I would point out that that case went before the Judge, who heard it, and decided against the Grand Jury. The Judge removed the grievance, and in such cases always will do so. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. Redmond) in his article in the Fortnightly Review complains that Grand Juries can still file indictments, and the same complaint has been made in this Debate. But the House ought to be informed that the very same provision was in the Nationalist County Council Bill of 1888. The next insult is that the police are not put under the control of the County Council. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. Redmond) in his article does not suggest that the police should be under the control of the County Councils, and the Nationalist County Government Bill did not suggest it. I am surprised that they should now suggest it after their experience of the last few years. In view of contemporary facts it is idle to suggest that the police should be under the control of the County Councils. The next insult to Ireland is that it is said there is a control vested by the Bill in the Joint Committee over the litigation of the County Councils. I do not know how that is; but I hope it is so. When the Borough Fund Act was passed in the House of Lords, Lord Fitzgerald pointed out the necessity of preventing small Municipalities in Ireland yielding to temptation in the direction of excessive and unnecessary litigation. To illustrate the necessity of control over litigation I will refer to a case in the Land Judge's Court in Dublin in 1888. The Guardians refused to sue the tenants who were liable for the rates and able to pay them; and they sued the landlord. What did the Judge do? He referred to the facts, and said—

"This was an instance of what might be expected from the Guardians, and what they would do in the same direction if their privileges and powers were extended."

He made a conditional order of attachment against them for contempt of Court. There we have a Board of Guardians actually under judgment for contempt of Court for bringing an action which they had no right to bring under the law. I desire, next, to deal with the objections which have been so strongly urged against the controlling power given to the Joint Committee. I find that all the protests of hon. Gentlemen opposite are only the faint echoes of the protests of the Scottish Members when the Local Government Bill for Scotland was before the House. The hon. Member for Caithness said the Joint Committee was "An absolute majority composed of the Sheriff of the county and a member of the Commissioners of Supply."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) said—

"Why not trust the County Council? Will the Lord Advocate, or any Scotchman sitting beside him say they cannot trust their countrymen in these matters?"

The hon. Member for Aberdeen said the clause was—

"An unfounded imputation on their country."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) described it as a "practical insult to the rest of Scotland." I, for one, as an Ulster Member, do not regard as an insult that which was thought good enough for England and Scotland. The hon. Members opposite set up a superior right over Englishmen and Scotchmen. The next alleged insult is with regard to the appointment of officers; and I think this is the weakest of all the objections to the Bill. I venture to say that the provision of this Bill with regard to officers gives just as wide powers as are exercised by County Councils in England, and it actually gives wider powers than the Nationalist Bill of 1888. If this is an insult to Irishmen, there was a worse insult in their own Bill in 1888. The Secretary to the County Council in Ireland is to be appointed and removed by the Joint Committee. The Clerk to the Council—the corresponding officer in England—is in precisely the same position. Then, the County Surveyor by this Bill is to be appointed by the County Council, but he cannot be removed without the sanction of the Joint Committee. The County Councils are by this provision to have stronger powers with reference to the County Surveyor than the Grand Jury ever had, for the Lord Lieutenant has the power of appointing and dismissing the County Surveyor at present. I say that the Government would be neglecting their duty if they did not provide this control with regard to the County Surveyor. There is a reported case in which the late Chief Baron Pigott pointed out the importance of safeguarding the power of dismissing the County Surveyor. Why is it of vital importance? Because the County Surveyor has to deal with the contractors; and it is essential that his position should be one of independence. Then this Bill gives the County Councils the appointment of all the other officers without any control. Will the House believe it, that in the Nationalist Bill of 1888, in Section 14, they did not give the County Councils the power of appointing a single officer without the approval of the Local Government Board? How can these provisions be represented as insulting? With reference to the Secretary of the County Council, the powers of the Council are to be the same as in England; with reference to their County Surveyor, their powers are to be greater than those of the Grand Jury; and with regard to the other officers they are given absolute powers, while in their own Bill they proposed that the appointments should be all subjected to the sanction of the Local Government Board. I regret that there is no control over the making of these appointments, and I shall move in Committee to have a control established in these cases.

An hon. MEMBER: The Bill will never go to Committee.

MR. BARTON: We shall see about that. I shall just give one illustration of the reason which exists for some such control. The elected Guardians of the Ennis Union held a meeting with reference to the appointment of a relieving officer, when a resolution was passed to the following effect:—

“That in every future election to any office under the Board no candidate shall be supported by the Nationalist Guardians unless he be a member of the National League for at least six months previous to the date of the election, and produces his certificate signed by the chairman and secretary of the branch; and further that when selecting a candidate to be put forward for election, the minority of the Nationalist Guardians should be bound to act and vote with the majority present and voting.”

That is the Ennis test. Surely some control ought to be exercisable over such tactics. Then, we come to what has been called the “Put-them-in-the-dock” clause. But why that name? There is not a single feature of criminal law in the clause. There is no dock, no indictment on a criminal charge, no punishment, no fine, no imprisonment. It is not a criminal clause; the nickname is a misnomer. Is it an insult to Ireland that corruption should be dealt with by the Courts? In 1889 this House passed the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act, which makes corruption on the part of a member of a Public Body a misdemeanour punishable by two years' imprisonment with hard labour or £500 fine or both. That Act was passed in consequence of some corruption on the part of a Public Body in London; and that is the law of the land. Clause 21 of the Nationalist Local Government Bill made a similar offence punishable by a fine of £100, recoverable by one ratepayer. That is more worthy of the name of a “Put-them-in-the-dock” clause. I was surprised to hear an hon. Member opposite say that he could not see the analogy of an Election

Petition, because an Election Petition could only set aside an election, while this Bill proposes that the Lord Lieutenant should nominate a new Council. But an Election Petition can not only set aside an election, but it can seat a new Member, and the very Member who was rejected by the constituency. Is it the power of removal which is an insult? That power has been in force in Ireland for something like forty years. The Poor Law Guardians are capable of being removed by the Local Government Board; and that power has been frequently exercised in Ireland during the last ten or eleven years, and it has not been suggested that the power of removal was a special insult to Ireland. Hon. Members opposite proposed in their own County Government Bill that the District Councils should be removable by the Local Government Board. I will go further. When the Cork Board of Guardians was suspended I read an article in the Pall Mall Gazette which contained this sentence:—

“We express our satisfaction with the action taken by the Local Government Board in Ireland in suspending the Cork Board of Guardians.”

If it is the law of the land that the members of Public Bodies may be made amenable to the law for corruption, I do not think it can be said that this clause goes too far in including malversation and oppression. What is malversation and oppression? I will give four instances of malversation. In 1884, during one of the Coercion Acts of the hon. Members opposite, the Roscommon Board of Guardians gave outdoor relief of £1 a week to the families of the suspects. The nominal relief rate at the time was 1s. 6d. to 3s. At the time they received this pay most of families were in possession of horses, sheep and cattle, as well as land. This was stopped, however, by a sealed Order from the Local Government Board. What was the second example of malversation? When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), in 1886, was Chief Secretary for Ireland he obtained from Parliament £20,000 for the relief of certain Unions in the West of Ireland. In six weeks the number of people in receipt of out-door relief rose from one thousand to one hundred thousand, and £36,000 was spent on the security of the £20,000. Men with large herds of cattle and sheep were relieved; a gombeen money-lender was relieved; a contractor to the Board was relieved; a farmer holding over one thousand acres of land was treated as a pauper, and in some districts there were more persons on the relief list than were living in the district. If that is not malversation of public money, I do not know what is; and if hon. Members opposite suggest that the place in which that occurred within the last five or six years is fit to be trusted with Local Government powers without some control, I do not fancy that it is the opinion of the general body of Members. When the Seed Supply Act was passed, men who had been absent ten or twelve years in America, and were not in Ireland at all, were returned as having been supplied with seed; others who had been dead many years, and women who did not own, and who had never owned land were also on the list. I will give one more example of malversation—I think it is the worst—which approaches to oppression. Boards of Guardians, under the power of the Local Government Board, were dissolved for applying the funds of the ratepayers to illegal objects such as the relief of Plan of Campaign tenants.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman mention to us any one case in which a victim of the Plan of Campaign has received out-door relief from any Union in Ireland, because I declare to this House that it is an absolute misstatement.

*MR. BARTON: I would greatly like to hear the hon. Member upon this subject. These four examples of malversation justify the provision of the Bill dealing with malversation. Now I come to deal with "oppression." I believe there is danger of oppression. Is there in the South and West of Ireland a spirit prevalent which tends to beget oppression? I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the

Member for Bridgeton is present. On the 30th June, 1886, the right hon. Member said—

"Nothing but the fact that the police and Resident Magistrates were in the hands of a strong Central Government preserved certain districts in the South and West of Ireland from wholesale massacre."

I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what has happened since 1886 to alter that opinion? But some may say that, although this spirit of oppression exists, it never has been shown in the operations of any Board of Guardians. I will give a clear example to prove that this spirit has been manifested during the last two or three years by a Board of Guardians. In September, 1890, the Tipperary Board of Guardians unanimously passed a resolution expressing unqualified approval of boycotting and the Plan of Campaign, which was quite a usual proceeding, and the Guardian who proposed the resolution, in describing these two things said:—

"They were poor weapons in place of what Tipperary held in past times, when we met the tyrants at Ballycoby and Ballydavid, and at Tipperary here in the hotel."

What happened at these three places? At Ballycoby two bailiffs and a constable were killed, and a landlord and two constables were wounded. At Ballydavid in 1870 Mr. Cole Baker, a landlord, was shot while taking his morning walk, and at the Tipperary hotel Mr. Bredall, while collecting his rents, was shot, and died afterwards.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: We will save you the reiteration of all that.

*MR. BARTON: I am glad to hear the hon. Member interrupt, for he must do one of two things. He must either deny these things or defend them. All I ask him as a Member of this House and a Representative of Ireland to answer is, whether, if such things exist, this House is justified in passing a Local Government Bill without strict and strenuous safeguards? The right hon. Member for Bridgeton was right in 1886, and I regret to say that in the South and West of Ireland there still remains the spirit of those days. Then I ask this further question: Have there been cases of oppression with regard to Boards of Guardians? What do Poor Law Guardians do under the Labourers Act? That was an Act which gave the Board of Guardians power to erect labourers' cottages upon land and to take land for the purpose. Luckily for the unfortunate owners of land and farmers, there was provided an appeal to the Privy Council. There were 227 appeals, of which 196 were successful. The grounds of these successful appeals were that the selection of the land was vexatious, not bonâ fide, for purposes of annoyance, punishment, or revenge. Cottages were put on the land of boycotted men and landgrabbers, and other unpopular persons. Will hon. Members justify Boards of Guardians in so selecting lands, or disapprove the Privy Council for preventing them doing so? And will they disapprove this Bill for trying to put some check on practices of this kind? Let me give a case, that of Mrs. Bolton—I believe a relative of Mr. Bolton, whose name has often been attacked by hon. Members opposite. Five cottages were proposed to be put upon one farm of forty acres, on which there were already two cottages. Would the House be surprised that the Privy Council upset that scheme? Then would the Government be discharging its duty if it did not deal with such a subject as this? The only fault I have to find is, I would like to see a more effective provision to deal with it. A word more about this oppression. We are told that it is a new crime. I challenge any lawyer in the House—I see the hon. Member for East Fife (Mr. Asquith) in his place—to say it is a new crime. It is a crime as old as the law of this land. You can find precedents of indictments for oppression in Chitty's Criminal Law. In the State trials you will find a Chief Justice impeached for oppression in this House. You will find a definition of it in every law book from Blackstone down to Stephen's Digest of the Criminal Law. If you apply it to this particular form of oppression you can define it thus:—"A public officer under colour of his public office doing injury to another from an improper motive, which may be inferred from the nature of the act or the circumstances of the case." It has been urged that we ought to trust the Irish people, but right hon. Gentlemen opposite only trust them when it is a question of the abandonment of the rights and the liberties of Irish Loyalists. We have been taunted that the Government came into power on a policy of no coercion; but now hon. Gentlemen opposite are approaching the General Election with a cry for the coercion of Ulster. In this Bill I am supporting safeguards which will protect my opponents and not my supporters in my constituency. How, then, can it be said that Ulster men want ascendancy. What they want is to remove ascendancy, and to live with equal laws under an Imperial Parliament. The hon. Member for Waterford wrote in his recent article that the Grand Jury system is the last remnant of the old power and ascendancy of the landlord class. Well, we are asking hon. Gentlemen opposite to remove it. It is they who wish to keep up that ascendancy in order that they may have an excuse for Home Rule. The alternative which they would set up to this Bill and to the whole policy of the Unionist Party is by establishing Home Rule to set up in Ireland a permanent ascendancy, so cruel and tyrannous that no British subject has ever yet consented to endure it.

(6.9.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I quite agree with one remark of the hon. Member who has just sat down that there is a great deal of unreality in this Debate. Even the warmth of the hon. Member has failed to impart any reality into it. Yet I think that neither the Bill nor the Debate will be altogether useless, because in the Bill there is a declaration of policy by Her Majesty's Government, and its real importance consists in this—that it is a statement of the view they take of the remedial measures which they would like to apply to Ireland. I have a great deal of doubt as to the policy of the Government in some respects. We do not know whether bi-metallism is part of their policy, but we have reason to believe that Protection is, judging by the speech of the Prime Minister the other day. As regards Ireland, however, there is no doubt that their policy, which began with coercion in 1886, is to receive its crown and confirmation in this Local Government Bill of 1892. Therefore, we ought not to confine ourselves to minute details of the Bill, but to take it in its wide sense and ask ourselves whether it holds out any prospect that, if passed, it would do good to Ireland. There are five tests which may be applied to a measure of this kind. In the first place, to be successful the Bill ought to be similar in its provisions to those which have been passed for England and Scotland. In the next place, it ought to be a Bill which would satisfy Ireland; in the third place, it ought to tend to pacify Ireland; in the fourth place, it should cause the Local Authority to work in harmony with the Central Authority; and fifthly, it should, if possible, be so framed as to teach the Irish people the mode of self-government, and to fit them for exercising such powers as may be conferred upon them by any larger measure of self-government that Parliament may think fit to pass. Now, I do not think that the tests I propose are unfair ones. Take the first test. No one will deny that this measure is entirely dissimilar to the Acts that have been passed for the Local Government of England and Scotland. There are six points of difference between this measure and the English and Scotch Acts. In the first place, the Joint Committee that is proposed by this Bill, and which would have the effect of checking the Irish County Councils, has no place in the English and Scotch Acts. In the second place, the Sheriff who is to be appointed the Chairman under this Bill will be a totally different person from the English Chairman or the Scotch Sheriff. Then there is the question of the control of the police, which in England and Scotland is left in the hands of the Local Authority, but which is dealt with on an entirely different principle in this measure. There is, again, nothing like the cumulative voting in this Bill to be found in the English and Scotch Acts. The illiterate voter is also dealt with upon an entirely different principle in this Bill from the others. The sixth point of difference is the power which this Bill proposes to give to remove members of the County Council, and which is not to be found in the English and Scotch Acts. The existence of these important differences between this measure and the English and Scotch Acts prevents the Bill from being in the least degree a fulfilment of the pledge which has been given by the Government that the legislation on this subject should be on the same lines for the three Kingdoms. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney-General for Ireland has said that the object of the Government is to legislate for each part of the United Kingdom by means of measures adapted to each of the three countries. That is an elastic phrase, and will cover every Coercion Act that has ever been passed. Therefore, as far as equal legislation for the three countries is concerned, this Bill has not advanced a single step in the right direction. Then I ask whether it can be satisfactory to the Irish people. A sufficient answer to that question was given on the night of the First Reading of the Bill, when, out of 101 Irish Members, only fifteen went into the Division Lobby in support of it. As the Irish Members have, therefore, rejected it, I would point out to the House the absurdity of forcing the Bill upon them. The Irish Members say:—"We prefer to go on with our Grand Juries rather than have this machinery imposed upon us, which we think will work worse—it will gall and annoy us." In that respect how unlike the position we in Scotland took when English and Scotch Local Government Bills were brought in! We did not regard them as perfect, but we endeavoured to amend them; and I think I may say with safety that there was a general desire in the House to take them as the basis of the system, and to put forward honest and sincere endeavours to make the very best of them so that they would work well for the country. Can it be supposed that anything of the kind will happen in this case? And the absurdity goes further. In the case of the English Bill we had a profitable discussion, because we knew what we were talking about. A large number of English Members had practical experience of the working of English County Government, and the rest of us knew the outline of it. In the case of Scotland, the discussion was similarly profitable. What would be the case if we were sure of getting into Committee on this Bill? The Irish members would no doubt know a good deal about it; but the Irish Members would be outvoted. They would conduct the discussions in the House, which would present very much the same appearance as at present. The Treasury Bench would be occupied by the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General, who would give more or less perfunctory answers to the objections of the Irish Members. The Division bell would ring, and the English majority would vote down the Irish Members without even having heard their arguments and the answers given. We know perfectly well from past experience how Irish matters are dealt with. We English and Scotch Members are not in a position to help Irish Members, because we are ignorant of the facts. How many English and Scotch Members can explain what is the incidence and function of baronial cess? This Bill requires interpretation and explanation on the part of somebody who understands Local Government in Ireland to enable us to properly value its effects. Therefore, I say that the Irish Members are in a worse position than even the Scotch Members were, because they could appeal to and count on a certain amount of knowledge on the part of Englishmen which does not exist in this case. The fact is, that what we shall have will be a repetition of the old duel between Dublin Castle and the Representatives of the Irish nation. The latter will be over-ruled, and those whose cause will prevail are those who do not know anything of the facts. We might almost as well give a commission to the Government to employ the assistance of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for all the effect which the opinions and views of Irish Members are likely to have. We might as well assent to the Local Government of Ireland being controlled by a code of rules to be drawn up by the Lord

Lieutenant without the intervention of Parliament at all. If that does not strike the House as absurd, I am afraid that no words will make it appear absurd; and the only fact that prevents it from being so ridiculous is that we have done it so often before. And here I am obliged to fall back on the dictum of the First Lord of the Treasury when he brought in this Bill, and to say that not only is the particular section to which he referred, but that the Bill as a whole, is an instance of the tendency of Legislative Bodies to do a stupid thing only because it has been done before. Then I come to ask whether the Bill will tend to pacify Ireland? We have all been accustomed to agree that the difficulty in Ireland is largely of a social order, arising from the alienation of the people from the law, from suspicion and distrust felt towards the agents of the law, and felt particularly towards the Central Authorities of the Government. Will this Bill tend to remove these evils? So far as I can follow it, it will tend to accentuate and exasperate them. And I can tell you why: It will divide every Local Body into hostile parts. We shall have the representatives of the people looking upon the County Council as their authority, and the County Council anxious to pose on every occasion as the representatives of the majority of the people. We shall have, on the other hand, the representatives of the Grand Jury on the Joint Committee resisting what the County Council proposes, regarding themselves as called upon to resist, and receiving their functions as a sort of fortress or entrenchment from which the landlord class can defend itself. And I apprehend the facts that the two bodies are not left to face each other in equal proportions, and that the Sheriff is forced upon them as a Chairman, are indications of the intention of the Government to let the scales incline in favour of the landlord class and in favour of the non-representative body. Then I pass over the other safeguards and come to the question of the Judges trying the County Councils, as I view this as the most important. Surely, remembering the past history of Ireland, there is no body of persons in that country whose position it is more desirable to safeguard and to remove from suspicion of political partisanship than the Irish Judges. The House knows there have been some instances in which the Irish Judges have shown political partisanship. I have no doubt everyone will remember the case of Chief Justice May and the charge which he delivered in the beginning of 1880, or the end of 1879, and which was of so strong a partisan nature that public opinion, even in Dublin, insisted upon his withdrawal from further conduct of the case. However much Judges desire to avoid imputation of this kind, it is one to which they are often exposed, and therefore the Government ought to take every means of removing them from suspicion. Can anyone imagine a cause more likely to renew that suspicion and to aggravate the distrust felt towards the administrators of the law than their introduction into political cases of this kind? The Attorney General made an ingenious comparison between the trial of the County Councils and the trial of Election Petitions by the Judges, and the hon. Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Barton) recurred to that analogy with a view of defending the proposals. But there are several large distinctions. In the first place, an Election Petition is a trial between parties, between diverse opinions, and therefore it is in the nature of an ordinary civil suit. In the next place, it is to be tried upon definite law. Our election law is now well set; we know what the law is, and therefore the Judges have a definite base on which to go. They are not left merely to their own discretion in creating law for themselves, because the law in regard to one case immediately becomes applicable to another, and to both Political Parties. But in this case we have a law which is evidently to be applied to one class—the County Councils, the representatives of the people, and in favour of those who allege malversation or oppression. Why is this? Here I fall back upon the instances which were given by the hon. Member for Mid Armagh to show what he considered cases of malversation and oppression. I ask whether his cases of malversation and oppression were not rather cases of political partisanship. Every one of the cases which the hon. Member cited was a case in which a Political Party was involved; they were not cases in which people had tried to enrich themselves—not cases of corruption like the cases alleged against the officers of the Metropolitan Board of Works. They were only political disputes, in which a Local Body was charged with using its Local Authority in order to take sides in a political contention. These, however, are not cases to which the ordinary law is to be applied, but are cases of a purely political nature, in which the Judges will generally become involved as political partisans. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh gave another illustration with regard to corruption. He said that was already punishable by law. Why, then, is it not left to the law? Why introduce provisions into the law of Ireland which do not exist in the law of England if you have in the latter law a provision which is employed to cover the case of Ireland? Hon. Members have complained that we have talked of this as if it were a criminal prosecution, but it will be remembered that when the First Lord of the Treasury introduced the Bill he spoke of County Councils being “found guilty,” and whether it was intended or not, this marked the animus of the intention with which the provision was inserted. Now I come to the question, “What is oppression?” The hon. Member for Mid. Armagh has endeavoured to deal with that. He has told us the effect of the law, but the instances he gave did not seem to me to have much relevance to the proceedings of a County Council. The House will have observed that the hon. Member implied some criminal act done, some bodily harm inflicted.

MR. BARTON: I said that an act of oppression meant injury done. I admit that in the majority of cases it was bodily harm.

MR. BRYCE: Well, I should have liked to have heard other instances. I am bound to say that there was nothing in the cases cited, and I heard nothing in the Debate on the First Reading tending to throw light on the vague and general term "oppression," though much has been said about safeguards against the possible action of Local Bodies in Ireland. The cases which would probably arise in Ireland would be those in which some political issue would be involved, some Party difference arising, attempts at boycotting or favourable contracts given for political reasons, or someone chosen for an appointment because he belonged to a particular political Party, or the use of the power of the Council in one instance and not in another to the advantage of one person and disadvantage of another. So far as I can see, and looking at what happens, they are cases of this kind which are contemplated as within the purview of the Bill, and it appears to me that the words in the Bill leave open the widest possible margin to the Judges to act according to their discretion—permitting, in fact, a Judge to take a political view in the creation of a new class of offences, and to enforce the law against those offences. I cannot conceive a more odious, a more dangerous duty to impose upon a Judge, and I earnestly hope that the Judges themselves will refuse to undertake such duty. In any case, I think it is a part of the Bill which we are bound to resist to the last. Now I come to my fourth question, "What are the relations which will be established between the Central Authority and the Local Authorities?" It has been asked, "Is there any friction in the relations in Scotland under the Local Government Act?" No, there is not, because in Scotland we have not got that severance of classes which unhappily exists in Ireland; there is no animosity between classes. There are men on the County Councils in Scotland belonging to both the landlord and occupying classes, and there is no disposition to oppose anyone because he does not belong to a particular Party. But is that so in Ireland? Will not Party animosities be strengthened by the Bill? The whole tenour of the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh shows how different is the condition of things in Ireland, and his whole argument was to show the necessity of safeguards to protect one class from the attacks of the other. That is why we feel the danger of the conflict between the Local and the Central Authority under this Bill. It is well known in Ireland—it is a tradition—that the Central Authority sympathises with the class from which it springs, and supports that class—the landlord class—represented by the Grand Juries. Therefore County Councils will not expect to have justice from the Central Authority in Dublin; they will not look to this as an impartial authority in the sense that we in Scotland look to our Central Authority as impartial between two sections or parties. It is, unfortunately, the fact that in Ireland the division of classes is such that the one is suspicious of the other, and this constitutes the great difficulty of local administration in Ireland, for actions naturally take a tinge of colour from these local circumstances. ("Hear, hear!") The Chief Secretary cheers that statement, and I am reminded of the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh, who carried his argument in favour of safeguards so far as to show that if these were so much wanted then you ought not to have this Bill at all. The way in which I would like to put it is this. I believe that to have this Bill without popular representation on the Central Authority with a strength that can only come from the will of the people will be to aggravate the conflict of classes in Ireland, will make government from a Central Authority more difficult, and provoke more dissension than there has existed in the past. The conclusion I draw is this: in forming a scheme of Local Government we should form a Central Authority also, a Central Body strong and trusted by the people to exercise that control which Local Bodies no doubt do sometimes require. We do not deny that control is required. I might take an illustration from the United States and show that in every State of the Union a great many safeguards are imposed upon the Local Authority. They are imposed by the people of the State with the desire to mark out precisely the path for their own Local Authority, and to subject them to the general law. They can trust the application of the general law when the action of their Local Authority has to be controlled. So will it be in Ireland when there is a strong Central Authority in which the people have confidence. I will not dwell on the last of the points I intended to refer to that the Bill will not in any way promote the fitness of the people of Ireland for self-government. A scheme of Local Government like this, "cribbed, cabined, and confined," will afford the people no training, no teaching towards that self-government they desire, for the Local Bodies, in the exercise of the circumscribed powers allotted to them, will be threatened on every side with the power of appeal against them to control and dissolve them. If they exercise the powers which are left to them they will have the temptation held out to them to take rash and ill-considered steps, knowing that these steps can be checked and stopped, knowing that they have comparatively little responsibility for their own actions. Responsibility should accompany power; it is a safeguard to power, and when you narrow power and destroy responsibility you can have no efficient self-government. I agree with the First Lord of the Treasury that the Bill has little value. I am not surprised that he has put it lower in importance than the Land Purchase scheme, though, judging from the state of things in Ulster, that Act needs much amendment if it is to have any great result. Who is this Bill intended to please? I do not think it very much pleases the loyal minority, though one or two Members of that Party have screwed themselves up to the point of giving the Bill a qualified approval. We know it does not please the bulk of the Tory Party, if we may judge from what passed at the Birmingham meeting of Conservative Associations. I do not suppose it gives much pleasure to Members on this side of the House who retain the name of Liberals and are opposed to Home Rule, for they can hardly think it is a satisfactory redemption of the pledges they have given that Ireland shall have equality of treatment to England. A Bill like this "keeps the word of promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope." The Bill reminds me of the proposals for Constitutional Government for Japan, full of declarations of popular rights and recognition of the principle of representative government, with the right of elected representatives to pass legislation and vote supplies, and then at the end a clause giving to the Mikado the right in urgent cases, he being sole judge of urgency, to supersede the action of the Legislature, make his own laws, and raise his own supplies. As I look at the Bill I recall the sentiment in regard to the revolutionary Government of France, "Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose." The more Bills you pass against the wishes of the people, the more appears the folly of the mistaken policy. It is time, after all our experience, that we should see this. This Bill, if passed, will only add one more to a long list of measures forced upon reluctant Ireland by an English Government, sometimes in honest ignorance, sometimes in conscious craft and insincerity; and if ever this Bill comes into operation, it will supply another proof that the only reform that will ever succeed in Ireland and bear the fruit of success in the peace and contentment of Ireland will be a reform enacted by Irishmen themselves for the better government of their own country.

Motion agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till Monday next.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) LAW AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 261.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I do not think there is any objection to the Second Reading of this Bill, which merely applies to Scotland the provisions of the Day Industrial Act of England.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): The Bill deals with a matter which comes under the cognizance of the Home Office, and as I think has already been explained, the Secretary of State has under his consideration a measure which includes the proposals to be found in this Bill. Pending the introduction of that Bill I understood the Second Reading of this was to be indefinitely postponed.

MR. CRAWFORD: Not at all.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I hope the hon. Member will postpone the Bill for a few days. The Bill my right hon. Friend hopes to introduce is in an advanced stage of preparation.

Second Reading deferred till Friday next, at Two of the clock.

A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I think there is general agreement in favour of the Bill.

COL. IV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MR. F. S. POWELL: The hon. Member must know as a Member of the Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee that what this Bill proposes has been approved over and over again by that Committee, and this is to embody it in the general law.

DR. TANNER: It is precisely from being a Member of that Committee I recognise the importance of dealing with such a matter as this deliberately.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Railway Rates and Charges Provisional Order [Abbotsbury, &c.] Bill; Railway Rates and Charges Provisional Order [Midland and South Western Junction, &c.] Bill; Railway Rates and Charges Provisional Order [Taff Vale, &c.] Bill; Railway Rates and Charges Provisional Order [Athenry and Ennis Junction, &c.] Bill; Railway Rates and Charges Provisional Order [East London, &c.] Bill, with Amendments.

QUESTIONS.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (TRAMWAYS) BILL.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to call your attention, Sir, to the fact that the London County Council (Tramways) Bill was just now read a third time, notwithstanding the fact that there appear five notices of opposition on the Notice Paper against the Motion for Third Reading.

*MR. SPEAKER; The Order was called in the usual way, and no hon. Member raised any opposition to the Motion for Third Reading. The hon. Member was himself standing at the Bar when the Order was called, but no objection reached me. It is not in my power now to go back upon the decision of the House.

INTER-COMMUNICATION BETWEEN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Report of Lord Hartington's Commission to the following effect, namely—

"There does not appear to exist sufficient provision by either Service for the wants of the other: little or no attempt has ever been made to establish settled and regular inter-communication or relations between the Services; no combined plan of operations for the defence of the Empire in any given contingency has ever been worked out or decided upon";

and to the statement of Mr. R. H. Knox, Accountant General of the Army, to Lord Wantage's Committee in December last, namely—

"The provision of expeditionary battalions to be sent abroad in the case of a small war was a point that was not worked out by Lord Cardwell's Committee, and no plan that I know of has been worked out by any Committee or by the War Office with a view of meeting that emergency"; and whether the facts are as stated; and, if so, whether the War Office has taken any steps since last December to organise the Army to discharge those duties which either a great or small war would render necessary?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): It has been arranged that, as soon as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War is able to be in his place, there shall be a discussion on the subject involved in the Report of the Committee over which Lord Wantage presided. Those subjects include, to a great extent, the points raised in my hon. and gallant Friend's question; and I think it will be best if he would raise them in the course of the discussion.

STEAM TRAWLING IN IRISH WATERS.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that three steam trawlers are working in Magilligan Bay, near Portrush, within the proscribed limit; and whether, in the interests of the local fishermen, he will take steps to enforce the law, and, if possible, have the limit extended?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): Under a bye-law made by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries on 5th, August, 1890, after full consideration of the evidence taken at a local inquiry into the matter, steam trawling was declared illegal inside a line drawn from Ramore Head to Warren Point. It is the case that steam trawlers have frequently been at work within the prohibited limit. The matter has engaged the attention of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries and the proceedings necessary for the enforcement of the bye-law are now under consideration.

LIGHTHOUSE BOAT ATTENDANCE.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.) (for Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is in a position to lay upon the Table a copy of the contract between the Commissioners of Irish Lights and Charles Geoffrey O'Connell, of Portmagee, County Kerry, for attendance on the Bull Rock Lighthouse; whether the Commissioners determined the contract in September last; and, if so, would he state on what grounds; and what was the amount paid to Mr. O'Connell in respect of his services under the contract?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The contract between the Commissioners of Irish Lights and C. G. O'Connell for boat attendance on the Bull Rock Lighthouse was determined by the Commissioners at the end of September, 1890, in pursuance of a clause therein contained reserving to the Commissioners the power to put an end to the contract at any time by giving the contractor one month's notice. This contract, and other similar contracts for boat attendance on other lighthouses on the south-west coast of Ireland, have been determined, because the Commissioners have found it necessary to employ one steam vessel to effect the relief of several lighthouses on this exposed and stormy coast in place of several separate sailing boats for each station. Mr. O'Connell has received £331 15s. in respect of his services under the Bull Rock contract. I can let the hon. Member have a copy of the contract if he desires but it appears hardly necessary to have it printed as a Parliamentary Paper.

CARRYING REVOLVERS WITHOUT LICENCES.

MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the growing practice of carrying revolvers in the County of Durham; and if, in the interests and safety of the general public, he will instruct the authorities to be more stringent in enforcing payment of licences for firearms, and of the penalties where firearms are carried without licences?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Chief Constable that the police in the County of Durham have stringent orders to report to their superior officers any cases of persons carrying revolvers or other firearms without a licence, but that up to the present time there does not appear to be any increase in the county of the practice of people so doing.

REGISTERED LETTERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what was the number of letters registered last year, and what was the total amount received by his Department for such registration?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (SIR J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Returns for the last financial year are not yet complete. The figures for the previous year, ending 31st March, 1891, are given at page 1 of the last Report of the Postmaster General. They show that 11,357,197 letters on which fees were payable were registered. At 2d. each, therefore, the total amount received was £94,643. In addition to these, 1,467,376 letters were registered for Government Offices without fee. These are not included in the published Return.

THE TRANSATLANTIC MAILS.

MR. LEWIS (Anglesey): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the American mails landed at Queenstown are frequently delayed several hours to wait for the sailing of the mail steamer at Kingstown; what was the average time that elapsed between the arrival of each mail at Queenstown and the departure of the mails from Kingstown during the month of July in last year; whether the mails from New York to London via Southampton are on an average a shorter time in transit than the mails via Queenstown, notwithstanding that the sea route to Southampton is considerably longer than the sea route to Queenstown; whether there would be a considerable saving of time if the mails were taken direct from New York to Holyhead, and could he state what would be the average gain per voyage, and whether Her Majesty's Government will take into consideration the advisability of substituting Holyhead for Queenstown as a port of call for embarking and disembarking mails?

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say, if the Treasury would consent to give the amount asked for, would not Queenstown be far and away the best port for the landing of the transatlantic mails?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not prepared to make any comparisons as to the advantages of Queenstown and Southampton. The American mails are not delayed at Queenstown unless it appears that to forward them specially would not accelerate their delivery; the mails from New York for England were only landed in Ireland four times in July, 1891. The average interval on those occasions was twelve hours; the third paragraph would require a voluminous Return and laborious calculation, which I should not be justified in undertaking without the expressed desire of the House. I am informed that there would not probably be any saving of time by taking the Atlantic mail steamers to Holyhead; and there is no accommodation for them there.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say, is it not the fact that the Treasury are now perfectly satisfied as to the advantages of Queenstown as the port for embarking and disembarking the mails?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have not received any communication from the Treasury on the subject.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government Bill dealing with Industrial and Reformatory Schools will extend to Scotland the clauses of the English Act relating to truant and day industrial schools; and whether it will be introduced before Whitsuntide?

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. I hope to introduce these Bills before Whitsuntide.

FREE POSTAGE OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has given instructions to the officials of the post offices in this House to act upon his recent statement that Parliamentary Papers as well as Bills can be posted by Members of this House?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am sorry to say that I was in error in stating to the hon. Member that Parliamentary Papers as well as Bills can be posted free by hon. Members from the House. They are so posted to, but not by, hon. Members. I am having a note kept of the volume and cost of such papers posted by Members, and when the extent of the matter has been ascertained the question may be considered.

MR. LENG: Will the right hon. Gentleman have specially in view the posting of Returns?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will carefully consider the matter as soon as I have ascertained what it amounts to. There are items to consider that might not at once occur to the hon. Member.

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the nature of the reply received from the Queensland Government to the telegram sent them by the Secretary of State, on Monday 16th instant, respecting the Kanaka Labour Traffic Regulations; when copies of the present and revised Regulations will be distributed; and when the Reports and other documents on the subject mentioned by him on Monday the 16th will be distributed?

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Glasgow, N.W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether it is a fact, as reported in the Press, that under the new Regulations armed boats accompany the recruiting boats?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The following telegram was received on Friday last from the Governor of Queensland:—

"Polynesian Labour Act has been sent by mail of 22nd April, debates in Parliament have been sent by mail 29th April. Revised Regulations go to-day. Every effort made to secure reliable agents. I agree in Premier's telegram to Agent General of 11th May which was communicated to you. Regulations seem adequate."

The new Regulations which it will be observed are now on their way will be presented to Parliament as soon as possible after their arrival. The hon. Member will, no doubt, have seen the telegram in the Times of Saturday which sets out the substance of them. The present Regulations and the Reports of the Polynesian Immigration Department, with the existing Queensland Acts and recent correspondence, will be given in a Parliamentary Paper which it is hoped will be in the hands of Members on Thursday. I have not information to answer the further question put to me.

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) ACT, 1891

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the Returns required by Section 33 of the Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1891, will be distributed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GOSST, Chatham): The Papers were presented on the 17th inst. and they will forthwith be distributed.

DELIVERY OF ENGLISH MAILS IN IRELAND.

MR. THOMAS HEALY (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if there is in Ireland any other group of towns of similar importance to the towns of Wexford, Enniscorthy, and New Ross, similarly circumstanced with regard to distance from Kingstown, as badly served in the delivery of English mails?

SIR J. FERGUSSON : It may be that many towns of less importance than those named enjoy a better mail service, because their position gives them the benefit of a good through service. There are not express trains on the Dublin, Wicklow and Wexford line. The Railway Company does not appear to think the traffic sufficient to afford them, and the amount of the correspondence in the district would not warrant the Post Office in paying for fast mail trains.

THE VACCINATION COMMISSION.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is his intention to give effect to the recommendation of the interim Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination, that vaccination prisoners should no longer be subject to the treatment of ordinary prisoners; and whether he will, in pursuance thereof, assent to the Second Reading of the Prisons Acts Amendment Bill now before the House, and give to these prisoners the treatment of first-class misdemeanants, or introduce legislation to the same effect?

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) had notice also of the following question :—To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is his intention to propose legislation to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Vaccination?

MR. MATTHEWS : The recommendations made in the interim Report of the Vaccination Commission involve a considerable and important relaxation in the law on this subject, and Her Majesty's Government think it right to consider the evidence on which those recommendations are founded more fully and carefully than they have yet been able to do before deciding what legislation they will recommend to the House, especially as small-pox has considerably increased in several parts of the country. The Government will lose no time in announcing the course they propose to take.

MR. CHANNING : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the interim Report dealing with the question of the treatment of prisoners does not present a simple issue upon which Her Majesty's Government could decide at once?

MR. MATTHEWS : It is not a simple issue—it depends on many considerations, and we are anxious to see the evidence.

MR. CHANNING : I can quite understand that it is necessary to fully consider the evidence in reference to the remission of cumulative penalties, but what I ask is that the Government should deal at once with the question of the treatment of prisoners, which is quite independent of action taken before conviction.

MR. MATTHEWS : The whole of the questions hang together, and this particular point depends on the view taken of the offence.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) : Does the right hon. Gentleman expect to conclude the inquiry in time to bring in legislation this Session?

MR. MATTHEWS : It is possible. The President of the Local Government Board is giving his consideration to the subject now.

LETTER BOXES AT SUB-POST OFFICES.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the keepers of receiving offices are now being required to pay for the provision and fixing of a new kind of wall boxes at their offices; what is the cost of such boxes, and the approximate cost of fixing; does the Department require that these boxes shall be supplied by particular makers, and could they be provided at a much lower rate by open competition; and what are the salaries usually paid to the keepers of the smaller class of receiving offices?

SIR J. FERGUSSON : The present rule is that the letter boxes at sub-post offices should be cleared from the outside, whereas formerly this was done from inside the office. Sub-postmasters are therefore required to provide letter boxes opening from the outside only—the object being to prevent all access to the contents of the box by assistants or others inside the office. But they may fix any kind of letter box they prefer, provided it complies with the requirements of the Department in this and other respects. As an assistance to sub-postmasters, who wish it, the address of a maker of letter boxes is furnished to them—who supplies one size at £2 2s. 0d., and a larger size at £2 10s. 0d. The fixing of such boxes would cost from £1 to £1 10s. as a rule. Proper boxes could not, it is thought, be supplied at lower prices than these. Sub-postmasters throughout the Kingdom are remunerated on a fixed scale of payment which regulates their salaries in accordance with the amount of the business done. The minimum salary allowed by the scale is £5 a year.

MR. WILSON: Then if certain keepers of offices are being required by surveyors to provide boxes at more than £2 2s., that is in excess of the requirements of the Department?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is one of the conditions of their employment, and though the scale of payment is low there are abundant applications for the appointments.

OVERSEERS AND REGISTRATION IN IRELAND.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is the duty of clerks of unions and town clerks acting as overseers under the Franchise Acts for counties and boroughs respectively, when making out their supplemental lists of inhabitant house occupiers, to insert the name and qualification as they find them on the requisition form tendered by or on behalf of the person claiming to be put on the register of voters for successive premises; whether he is aware that although the Court of Appeal so directed in the case of "Lyons v. Chambers," in November, 1889, the Clerk of the Rathdown Union is adopting a different course, to the exclusion of a large number of persons entitled to the franchise; and whether he will direct him to act on the decision of the Court of Appeal?

MR. MADDEN: My answer to the first paragraph is in the negative. As to the second paragraph I have to say that no direction was given by the Court of Appeal such as the hon. Member suggests. All that was decided in "Lyons v. Chambers," was that the clerk of the union would be within his right in placing persons whose qualification is by way of succession upon his list, if he is satisfied that the succession is direct.

ALLEGED INFRINGEMENT OF A GOVERNMENT CONTRACT.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether in April he received a letter from the Secretary of the Military Harness and Accoutrement Makers' Trade Union, calling his attention to an alleged infringement of the Factory Clause in a Government contract; whether he has had the matter investigated; and whether he intends to forward a reply?

MR. BRODRICK: Yes, Sir, the letter was received and duly acknowledged. Under very special circumstances permission was given to an accoutrement maker to have a small portion of the work performed outside his factory on premises subject to Government inspection. I satisfied myself, both at the time and by a subsequent inspection of the premises, that nothing has been done which would be an infringement of the Resolution of the House.

THE PERSIAN TOBACCO CONCESSION.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Persian Government has been induced, by the intervention of Her Majesty's Representative at Teheran, to pay to the Imperial Tobacco Corporation of Persia the sum of £500,000, in consideration of having abrogated the concession granted to that company; whether he is aware that the capital of the company was £652,000, of which £297,400 and £2,600 founders' shares, were paid to a company called the Eastern Concessions Syndicate, which appears to have acquired the concession from Mr. Gerald Francis Talbot, on 3rd May, 1890, and to have sold it to the Imperial Tobacco Corporation of Persia on 3rd November of the same year; whether he will lay upon the Table of the House copies of contract, dated 3rd May, 1890, between Mr. Gerald Francis Talbot and the Eastern Concessions Syndicate; contract dated 3rd November, 1890, between the Eastern Concessions Syndicate and the Imperial Tobacco Corporation of Persia; contract, dated 19th September, 1890, between the Eastern Concessions Syndicate and John Byron Dawes, relating to the underwriting of a portion of the capital of the Imperial Tobacco Corporation of Persia Company; all of which contracts are alluded to in the prospectus of the Imperial Tobacco Corporation of Persia, published 3rd November, 1890; and the names of the persons constituting the Eastern Concessions Syndicate; and whether he is aware that in the aforesaid prospectus it was stated, with a view to secure subscriptions, that the net annual profits from the concession accruing to the Corporation were £371,875?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The Persian Government have agreed to pay £500,000 as compensation to the Imperial Tobacco Corporation for the abrogation of their concession. The concession provided for a reference to arbitration in case of dispute between the parties. When the concession was abrogated, the Corporation pressed for arbitration. The Persian Government, however, were anxious to settle the matter without such a reference, and, at the request of both parties, Her Majesty's Government gave their good offices for bringing about an arrangement. The information furnished by the Corporation was that their capital was £650,000, dealt with as follows: Paid for the concession to the Eastern Concessions Syndicate, Limited, £300,000 (£83,000 in cash, and £217,000 in shares); cash sent to Persia and expended and remaining in London, £350,000; total, £650,000. The Syndicate had acquired the concession from Major Talbot, to whom it had been granted by the Shah of Persia. There are no copies of the documents mentioned in the third and fourth paragraphs of the hon. Member's question in the possession of the Foreign Office.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the documents referred to are mentioned in the prospectus, and anybody is entitled to go and look at them; consequently I ask that before a final settlement is made Her Majesty's Government should obtain a copy of these documents from Somerset House in order that the atrocious swindle may not be committed which is contemplated by Her Majesty's Government.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is not a question to be answered

Mr. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): On a point of Order I would ask whether the expression just used can be withdrawn, as it has been freely stated across the floor of the House that "he has got it out"?

*Mr. SPEAKER: I took notice of the expression, and, thinking that the question might be answered, I requested that a question put in that form should not be answered; and I meant thereby to mark my sense that the expression was unparliamentary and altogether unsuitable to this House.

Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether the Tobacco Corporation have expended any money at all on any useful purpose in Persia for which the Corporation should expect to receive an indemnity of £500,000?

Mr. J. W. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir, the Corporation have expended a large sum in bringing their concession into operation. I cannot give the hon. Member the figures at present, but I think he will find, when the Return is laid on the Table of the House, that they are very clearly stated.

Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I am not sure that I have made my meaning clear. Of course I understand that large sums have been expended in Persia; but were they expended in acquiring the concession, and was anything of a practical nature expended to the benefit of the people of Persia in any way, for, as the matter stands, it would appear that the money was expended in "squaring" the Persian officials?

Mr. J. W. LOWTHER: My answer was intended to cover the expenses—perfectly proper and legitimate and natural expenses—to which the Corporation have been put in bringing into operation the concession they had obtained, such as in the employment of servants and the purchase of buildings and materials.

Mr. PICTON (Leicester): Will the hon. Gentleman tell us whether the money paid in compensation is being lent by the Russian Government for that purpose? Is he aware of that? Could he also furnish to the House the names of the gentlemen forming the syndicate?

Mr. J. W. LOWTHER: I am not aware that the money has been lent by the Russian Government. As to the other matter, I am afraid I must ask for notice.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): Does the hon. Gentleman know how many Baronets on the other side of the House are connected with this Corporation?

[No reply was given.]

THE NEW COINAGE.

SIR J. BAIN (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his intention to exhibit the designs for the proposed new coinage to the Members of this House before issue; and whether it is intended to impress the value on all coins to be issued?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The value will be impressed on all coins with the exception of gold coins and crown pieces. Four-shilling pieces will be withdrawn, so that no confusion can arise as between the four-shilling and five-shilling pieces. I do not propose to exhibit the designs of the new coinage to Members of the House.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): When will they be issued?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have not yet received the final Report. I do not see any necessity for putting the designs before Members of the House. The Committee appointed to examine the designs is an authoritative one, including Sir Frederick Leighton as representing Art, while the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Lubbock) and others represent banking interests, including the Bank of England. I think the matter should be allowed to rest on the authority of the Committee and the responsibility of the Government. To put the designs before the House would probably lead to criticisms being expressed by a few, the great majority of those in favour of the designs not expressing any opinion at all.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: When will they be put into circulation?

MR. GOSCHEN: I hope the Mint will take the matter in hand immediately. Of course the dies have to be engraved and arrangements for manufacture will take some time.

Mr. J. W. Lowther

IRREGULAR VOTING FOR A PETTY SESSIONS CLERK.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings connected with the recent election of Petty Sessions Clerk for Doneraile, County Cork district, when several magistrates who took part in the election infringed the rules laid down for the guidance of Justices on such occasions; is he aware that Lord Castletown voted on that occasion for Mr. Roche, though his Lordship does not reside in the county, and had never sat on the Bench before; also that Mr. Levinge voted on the same occasion, though only appointed a magistrate that very day; and, if the facts be as above stated, will the attention of the Lord Chancellor be called to these infringements of the rules laid down under the Petty Sessions Acts?

MR. MADDEN: I have inquired into the circumstances of the election referred to in the question, and I find that there were two candidates—Mr. Murphy and Mr. Roche, and that the votes of two magistrates who voted for Mr. Roche, and of one who voted for Mr. Murphy, were subsequently disallowed. There is nothing before me to suggest that these votes were given otherwise than bonâ fide. Lord Castletown has a residence in the district, which he occasionally visits, but it was held that he did not reside within the meaning of the rule. There does not appear to have been any intentional infringement of the rule.

MR. FLYNN: Did not Lord Castletown vote on the occasion in question in violation of the regulations laid down?

MR. MADDEN: I have said that Lord Castletown voted under a misapprehension, but there is no evidence that his vote was tendered in other than a bonâ fide manner.

MR. FLYNN: And was the agent entitled to vote?

MR. MADDEN: Certainly.

UNDER AGE ENLISTMENT.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if it is true that the authorities refused the discharge of Private Michael M'Pike from the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers; and, if so, upon what grounds?

MR. BRODRICK: Private M'Pike enlisted under the age of eighteen years, but was accepted, as his physique came fully up to the standard of a youth of eighteen years of age. His having enlisted under the age of eighteen years gives his father no right to claim his discharge, as he was accepted on his own statement, verified as far as possible by his physique.

CHARTERED COMPANIES IN AFRICA.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he could see his way to appoint a Resident Inspector in each of the territories of the great Chartered Companies in Africa; if an annual Report to Parliament from the Crown official could be furnished; if an assigned date for the termination of their privileges could be made, in order to open Parliamentary inspection and consideration; if he contemplates imposing any tribute to the Imperial Exchequer on these companies; and if there is any reason for delegating the Imperial authority in Africa to these companies, entirely composed of unofficial persons?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I informed the hon. Member that I doubted if I should be able to give him very full information to-day. I am afraid that it would be impossible for me to reply to the numerous and novel points raised by the hon. Member within the limits usually assigned to an answer to a question. His proposals would, if adopted, practically entail such essential modifications of the conditions under which the several charters were granted as would necessitate the withdrawal of the charters. The last paragraph raises the question of the whole policy of granting charters to companies, a policy which has been frequently discussed in the House and which would appear to be matter for debate.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: There is one point in my question which perhaps the hon. Gentleman might answer now, and that is whether the Government could appoint a Resident in the territories of these companies? These companies have practically powers of life and death over the native races, and it would seem that for their protection it would be judicious to appoint an Imperial official?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: It is a matter that would require a good deal more consideration than the Secretary of State has been able to give to it. I may point out that these companies are, as a rule, each managed from London, from the head office of the company, and those who reside in the territory are really only the executive officers of the company carrying out the instructions from the management in London.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: That is precisely the reason why I put my question. Does it not appear to the hon. Gentleman that it would be well to have an Imperial official Resident in the territory? What redress would even an Englishman get if he were wronged? I imagine he would not be likely to get much satisfaction on an appeal to the Board of Management in London?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: If the hon. Member will repeat the notice of his first question, and give me a little time, I will consider. The appointment of an Imperial officer of the kind demands very serious consideration, and it makes, of course, a large demand upon Imperial funds.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I will put down the question for Thursday. Of course, my object is to secure protection for the native races.

THE SALARIES OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a case which appeared in the Daily News of the 12th instant, where a Customs officer was summoned at the Thames Police Court by a seaman for detaining twelve ounces of tobacco and a bottle of Florida water, and to the comments of the magistrate on the proceedings of the Customs authorities; whether, in the inquiry held by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1891, into the complaints of the officers of the Outdoor Department of the Customs, that while superior officers receiving large salaries were granted substantial benefits, the subordinates—namely, boatmen, receiving very low pay, were granted nothing, but sustained pecuniary loss by the abolition of classification, and that, in consequence a great deal of discontent prevails amongst the officers of this class; and whether, in view of the temptation to improper exercise of their duties which is caused by the low scale of salaries, the Treasury would grant an improvement in the position of these officers?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member has been good enough to postpone this question from Friday, but I have not yet completed the inquiries, and I shall be glad if he will put it down again for Thursday.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I will put the question down again on Thursday.

AN ALLEGED DEATH FROM OVERWORK.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the evidence given at the Marylebone Coroner's Court, on the 18th April, at the inquest on the body of Mr. William Bedwell, who was in the service of the Registrar of the Marylebone County Court for upwards of forty years, and died through overwork; whether the Coroner is correctly reported to have said that, on the face of it, the case involved a public scandal; whether he is aware that Registrars' clerks, although they are appointed and paid by the Treasury, are not Civil servants, and are not entitled to any superannuation allowance, but that the clerks of the City of London Court, the Examiners of Accounts, and County Court Judges, receive superannuation allowances; and whether it is proposed to make any change, with a view of placing Registrars' clerks in a better position?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): In the absence of my hon. and learned Friend who is engaged elsewhere on Parliamentary business, I will read his answer to this question in his own words. I am informed that Mr. Bedwell, whose death is referred to in the hon. Member's question, died partly from heart disease. I believe it is the fact that latterly he spent a great deal of time at the office beyond the ordinary hours; but there is, on the information before me, no foundation for the statement that he died from overwork. Clerical assistance is allowed if required. I have no report of the Coroner's observations beyond that which the hon. Member was good enough to send me from a newspaper; but there certainly is no warrant for the observation suggested in the hon. Member's question. Registrars' Clerks are neither appointed nor paid by the Treasury. It would not be desirable to introduce any legislation with a view of making the clerks of upwards of five hundred Registrars permanent civil servants or entitled to pensions.

CLERGY DISCIPLINE (IMMORALITY) BILL.

COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, S.W., Bootle): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the fact that the Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill is intended to revive the criminal jurisdiction of the Bishops' local Diocesan Consistory Courts, which was abolished by the Church Discipline Act, 1850?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Clergy Discipline Bill is in no way intended to revive any criminal jurisdiction of the Bishops' local Diocesan Consistory Courts, but merely to simplify the existing practice, and to remedy certain defects which have prevented the efficient administration of the existing law.

STREET ACCIDENTS IN LONDON.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can say what class of vehicle it was that was chiefly responsible last year for the 147 deaths and 5,784 personal injuries resulting from accidents in the streets of the Metropolis; whether he is aware that during the same period only five passengers were killed on all the railways in the United Kingdom; and whether he will take steps for the better regulation and control of the street traffic?

MR. MATTHEWS: The number of personal injuries quoted in the question includes the 147 deaths reported. The greater number of accidents was caused by light carts, cabs, and vans. I should point out that the number of passengers killed on the railways in 1891 was 103, including 23 who were killed whilst crossing the line at stations. The Commissioner of Police is in constant correspondence with the Vestries and other Local Authorities in respect of the establishment of additional refuges or the removal to more suitable sites of those already existing, and on other matters relating to the safety of the streets of the Metropolis, with a view to the prevention of accidents.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what proportion of the accidents occurred in connection with vans so constructed that the driver could not see out of the side or back; and whether vans of this kind are allowed in any other city in the United Kingdom?

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot say whether vans of this kind are or are not allowed in any other city in the United Kingdom, or in the world. I cannot give any statistics of the kind the hon. Gentleman desires.

FOREIGN-MADE GLASS BOTTLES.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that large quantities of foreign-made glass bottles are received at the ports of London, Liverpool, Belfast, and Glasgow, and also at other ports in the United Kingdom, and pass into this country without any restrictions as to marks on bottles or packages; whether such importation of foreign-made goods is a violation of the principle of the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887; whether he will cause full inquiry as to such alleged importation to be made; and whether the Government will, if necessary, amend the letter or the administration of the existing law to meet the case, and prevent such unrestricted importation as aforesaid?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have no knowledge of the number of foreign-made glass bottles imported into this country. If they are imported without any false indication of origin or other false trade description there would be no infringement of the Merchandise Marks Act. The Committee which reported in 1890 declined to recommend that the law should be so altered as to render compulsory the marking of all goods with an indication of origin.

MR. SETON-KARR: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to inquire into the facts of the case as to whether these bottles are imported in large quantities or not.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The difficulty is this. Glass is one of the articles of which we have returns: but glass bottles are not separated in this return from other articles of glass.

MR. SETON-KARR: I should like to ask whether he will inquire whether glass bottles, as differentiated from glass goods, are imported in bulk from foreign countries without any mark to show in what country they are manufactured, thus causing a presumption that they are manufactured in this country?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have no doubt that is so, but I have endeavoured to explain that the law is not broken, unless they are so marked as to give a false idea of the place of their manufacture.

MR. SETON-KARR: In consequence of the unsatisfactory answer I have received I beg to say that this day four weeks I shall call the attention of the House to the importation of glass bottles in the manner described, and move a Resolution.

THE CASE OF THE REV. E. B. HAWKSHAW.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can now state the result of the inquiries which have been made by the Lord Chancellor into the case of the Rev. Edward Burdett Hawkshaw, the Chairman of the Ross Bench of Justices, who wrongfully assumed, during eighteen years, the title and hood of a Master of Arts of Oriel College, Oxford, although he was in fact a Bachelor of Arts, and described himself as a Master of Arts on bills publicly announcing missionary meetings and the delivery of sermons, and also in the same capacity conducted the services and administered the sacraments of the Church; whether he is aware that, under one of the canons of the Church, such an irregularity involves the punishment of suspension, and is regarded as a serious offence by members of the University of Oxford, and is punishable under the University Statutes; whether Mr. Hawkshaw continued his irregularity until it became necessary for him to take the degree of Master of Arts in order to qualify himself for the prebendal stall of Nonnington in Hereford Cathedral which was offered him by the Bishop, who then for the first time discovered the irregularity; whether he is aware that a strong feeling has been aroused by this disclosure; and whether Mr. Hawkshaw will be removed from the Commission of the Peace?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information as to the facts stated in the first paragraph, except that I am assured by Mr. Hawkshaw that it is wholly untrue that he ever described himself, or saw himself described, as a M.A. I know of no canon relevant to this subject except the fifty-eighth canon, which appears to me to provide suspension against a minister who, being no graduate, wears a hood. I do not know whether the University Statutes contain a provision such as the hon. Member indicates. These are matters which appear proper for the Ordinary and the Vice Chancellor to deal with. I am informed that Mr. Hawkshaw took his Master's degree before any legal necessity arose for his possessing that qualification. I know nothing about the local feeling; and I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that no facts have been brought to his notice which call for the removal of Mr. Hawkshaw's name from the Commission of the Peace.

THE CONDITION OF WELLINGTON PLACE.

LORD H. BRUCE: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works why the thoroughfare of Wellington Place should be pulled up during the latter end of May, when the vehicular traffic is greater than at other times during the year?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I can only say to the noble Lord that I have no authority over Wellington Palace; it is under the Vestry, and I cannot, therefore, do anything in the matter. I may, however, inform him that the work is almost completed, and I hope in a few days the traffic will be uninterrupted.

Mr. Cobb

THE FIRE AT HANDLEY.

MR. STURT (Dorset, E.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office a question of which I have given private notice as to whether, under the exceptional circumstances of the case, he will allow a certain number of tents to be sent from the War Office to Handley for the accommodation of the unfortunates whose houses were destroyed in the fire which occurred there?

MR. HULSE (Salisbury): I have been in communication with the Mayor of Salisbury, and am informed that in case the War Office will send the tents, every facility will be given for the despatch of the tents from Salisbury to Handley.

MR. BRODRICK: I have communicated with the Military Authorities, and under the circumstances the War Department will afford every assistance in their power.

THE JEBU EXPEDITION.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I should like to ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies whether he can give the House any further information as to the operation of the British forces in West Africa?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The following telegram has been received from Lagos, dated 23rd May:—

"Information received from reliable source, not from officer in charge of expedition, Jebu Ode taken May 20, after considerable resistance. King captured. Willoughby, native officer, killed, and three men; four officers wounded, not seriously, also twenty-five men. Starting for Jebu Ode, May 24.—CARTER."

ALLEGED DISTURBANCES IN BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON: Having regard to a recent speech of the Prime Minister, and certain other proceedings of which the House is aware, I should like to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, as a matter of urgency, a question of which I have given him private notice, whether the Government have received any information or have made any inquiry as to the substance of a paragraph which appeared in the Evening Standard on Saturday to the effect that news came from Belfast that women and boys of the Queen's Island works had commenced an attack with sticks on two fellow-workmen, accompanying this attack with yells of "Down with the Fenians"? One of the men assaulted was struck with an iron bar, and the other man had his head split open, and it was only flight that saved their lives.

MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member for Monaghan gave private notice of this question, so that I have been able to obtain a report on the subject. I am informed that the report in the newspaper to which the hon. Member refers is wholly unfounded. There does not appear to have been any incident to suggest it beyond the fact of a trifling quarrel between two young boys of about fourteen years of age, such as might occur in any place and at any time, and the incident of a boy having been accidentally injured at the works. I am happy to add that there are hundreds of Roman Catholics quietly engaged on the Queen's Island Works without being in any way interfered with.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

LORD H. BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will grant him any facilities to pass the Bill standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Wilts, as well as those of other Members of the House, to provide improved cottages for rural labourers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to the noble Lord I can only say that, although the subject is of great importance, I do not think it is possible in the present condition of Public Business to give special facilities for this Bill, or for other private Members' Bills.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, for the convenience of the House, he can now state when he proposes the adjournment of the House for and its re-assembling after Whitsuntide?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the most convenient course would be for the House to separate on the Friday before Whit Sunday. As to what day we shall re-assemble, that will largely depend on the progress we make with Public Business before the Recess.

MR. BRAND (Cambridge, Wisbech): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now fix a date for the introduction of the Rating of Schools Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Bill is now ready, and will be introduced in a day or two.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): Will this Bill deal with the use of schools for public meetings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will deal partly with the subject of the rating of schools and partly with the use of schools for public meetings.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when he will bring in the Bill for securing the rights of the public to access to mountains and moorlands in Scotland, which Her Majesty's Government have undertaken to introduce?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The Bill will be brought in immediately.

MR. BRYCE: I must ask the Lord Advocate to give me some more specific reply than "immediately"—it adds nothing to the answer he gave me a week ago. If the right hon. Gentleman gives me no further answer, I must repeat the notice of my question. The right hon. Gentleman has been most evasive in his replies.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I hope to bring in the Bill this week, probably within the next two or three days.

MR. BARTLEY: I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he proposes to take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, and whether he will give it an early place on the Paper, so that we may discuss the Income Tax?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I propose to take it this evening, as we can proceed with it after twelve o'clock. I could have taken it the other evening if I had been able to give sufficient notice to hon. Members; but I hope we shall make progress with it after twelve o'clock to-night.

MR. H. GARDNER: I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he intends to take the fourth stage of the Small Agricultural Holdings Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My present intention is to take the Report of the Small Agricultural Holdings Bill immediately after the Vote on Account, which, as hon. Members are aware, must be taken on Thursday. I thus propose, unless contingencies arise that are not at present contemplated, to take it on Friday.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I should like to put a question to the First Lord of the Treasury with respect to what took place on Friday night. Practically there was no Motion down on the Paper, and it was understood that the night would be devoted to Government Business, particularly, I think, the Indian Councils Bill and the Inland Revenue Act. Under these circumstances, surely it was the business of the Government, as we certainly understood it was their intention, to see that a House was made. So many remarks are constantly made about the waste of time in this House that I think the Leader of the House owes some explanation of the failure of the Government to do what was obviously their duty.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman is quite correct when he says that the Government desire to proceed with the Indian Councils Bill; but he is mistaken when he includes the Inland Revenue Bill. At nine o'clock, I regret to say, I was not present myself; but I am informed that there were thirty gentlemen who support the Government and two gentlemen who do not support the Government in attendance. The result was a "count," and some slight, though I hope not material, delay in the completion of the Government Business. I must recognise that when the Government take the Morning Sittings it is their duty to assist the House to form a quorum at nine o'clock; but they must receive some sort of co-operation from hon. Gentlemen opposite. The whole burden should not be left on the Government, and we can do little more than we did.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: As we are to have the Vote on Account on Thursday when will the usual statement be available for Members?

SIR J. GORST: I will lay the Estimates on the Table to-night, and have them printed at once.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is his intention to proceed to-night or at any future time with the Private Bill Procedure Bill?

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Long...

SIR J. FERGUSSON: This is a measure of the simplest kind, intended to rectify an omission in the Post Office Act of last year, whereby Local Authorities are empowered to make guarantees in connection with the establishment of telegraphic offices. This is extended to Ireland and to England, but not to Scotland; and as there has been a great desire in Scotland to have it, this Bill is intended to rectify that omission. It also makes some provision for post office sites.

MR. MADDEN: To a very large extent this for Monaghan gave place. I have already adjourned to another question, so that place. If the Government obtain a reprieve, I desire to have this Bill, I confess informed that I am disposed to let them have it, paper to show I have a pretty shrewd suspicion as to what will happen before it gets into working order, suggest Bill, and possibly one or two other quarters of bungling and mischievous Tory legislation, will be made the subjects of a clean sweep by a new Parliament and in a Government which have other views about Ireland than the present Government. If the First Lord of the Treasury only desires to complete his programme before going to the country, I should be disposed to let him have the Bill to the top of his bent, and let the country know that we have at last reached the limit of Tory concessions in regard to Ireland; that this brilliant Bill represents the last—the supreme—effort of Tory statesmanship to satisfy the aspirations of at least fifteen millions of the Irish race scattered all over the globe. I do not think we could possibly do better than go to the country with this Bill, and tell the people that this is the Tory alternative to what was promised in 1886. We can lay it before the people in all its minute and multitudinous absurdities, and ask them if there is a single man in England who believes—least of all the author of the Bill himself—that it will provide a substitute for the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). Does anyone believe that this Bill will to any extent abate the Irish difficulty? I doubt whether there is a single gentleman in the most reactionary corner of the Benches opposite who will stand up and say that a Bill of this kind, which contains an affront to Irish national sentiment in every clause, and proceeds on the assumption that you are dealing with an inferior and a subject race, is going to satisfy the national aspirations which have existed for ages in the Irish heart, aspirations for which thousands and hundreds of thousands of men have suffered and died, and for which to-day thousands are just as ready to suffer and die, even if it be on the Shankhill Road when Ulster charges with all its chivalry. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) does not even claim that this Bill is a substitute for Home Rule. But if it is not meant to satisfy the Irish people what is it meant to do? Who wants it? Not the Irish people. There is not a single Irish Nationalist Representative of any shade or any section who has not told you that he rejects this Bill, and not only that—he rejects it as a national insult and a wild practical joke. Do the Protestant farmers in Ulster want it? I challenge hon. and gallant and learned Members from Ulster opposite to deny that the Irish Grand Jury system as cordially as we do. This is a Bill not to abolish the Grand Jury system, but to make it a permanent institution—a permanent estate of the realm. The effect of this Bill will be to constitute the Grand Juries a mannikin House of Lords in every county with absolute power and no responsibility. I hope hon. Gentlemen will submit this Bill to the forthcoming Convention of Ulstermen in Belfast, and I venture to say that nine out of every ten of these Protestant farmers would rather have one Irish National Parliament than have these thirty-two Standing Committees of local landlords. So far as I know, and so far as we have heard, no one in Ulster wants this Bill. Everybody rejects and despises it. We know that even Tory Members from Ulster have only been induced to swallow the Bill with a considerable number of grimaces. And why? Because they know that it simply agitates the Local Government Question without settling it. If by any possibility the Bill should pass, the County Councils would be simply thirty-two centres of perpetual agitation and discontent in Ireland, with a case so strong that they would probably succeed in dislocating County Government altogether, and in disestablishing the Standing Joint Committees and Grand Juries. During the Debate, at least one independent Tory Member from Ulster has been induced to toe the line, and we appreciated the gallantry with which the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) attempted to show a trace of a somewhat belated enthusiasm. But to get the Ulster landlords to approve of the Bill, you have been compelled to hand over to them the absolute control of the police, and to guarantee that all county officials in Ireland, Members of the "loyal minority," shall be placed beyond the control and above the authority of the County Councils, and be insured full salaries and ample pensions at the expense of the cesspayers over whom this Bill will set them as masters. You can reconcile the loyal minority to almost anything if you will only put a new batch of Tory pensioners on the country. The House recollects that when you wanted to reconcile the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) to the Land Act of 1887 which he denounced so vehemently and so dramatically——

That the

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I did not denounce the Bill of 1887.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: The House will remember the dramatic exclamation of the hon. Member, "God help the Irish tenantry!" and the announcement in the Tory papers that the hon. Member had cancelled his engagements to speak at Tory meetings.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The hon. Member is speaking of a different Act altogether, and I do not choose it to go to the country, even from the hon. Member, that I opposed the Land Act of 1887. As a simple matter of fact, I laboured to make that Act better than it was, and succeeded in doing it, I think. The hon. Member is referring to the Arrears Bill.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: Not a bit of it. When the Bill came down from the House of Lords the hon. Gentleman denounced the Amendments made by the House of Lords, and exclaimed, "God help the tenantry of Ireland!" and cancelled his engagements to speak at Tory meetings. That Act involved a Land Commissionership for a gentleman who, in addition to all his other virtues, was a near relation of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman conquered his aversion to the Lords' Amendments with a patriotism and disinterestedness quite worthy of the loyal minority. What man or section of men nearer to Ireland than West Birmingham wants this Bill, or has any feeling for it except one of contempt and ridicule? I listened with attention to the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for

Mr. William O'Brien

Ireland (Mr. Madden) while he made what I may call, without disrespect to him, a feeble canter over the course. The feebleness was in the facts and not in the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman nailed the fifth clause, the "put-them-in-the-dock" clause, to the mast as the Government colours. The Government appears to have chosen that clause as their oriflamme of war. The First Lord of the Treasury was indignant with the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) for not dealing at length with that clause, as if any detailed argument were required to show that the criminal trial of County Councillors at the whim of any twenty cesspayers is about the grossest insult ever offered to a country under the guise of offering it liberty. We have reason to be grateful to the Government for having the courage of their convictions about this clause, and I would suggest that the only possible improvement they could make in it as a means of conciliating Nationalist sentiment and enlarging Irish liberties would be to substitute two Removable Magistrates for the two Judges of Assize, and to define the mysterious word "oppression" in as large and generous a sense as the term "intimidation" was interpreted by the Removable Magistrates under the Coercion Act, so as to include oppressing a member of the loyal minority with "a humbugging sort of a smile." The hon. and learned Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Barton) made a speech of learned length, which went to show not that this is a Local Government Bill, but, if I may use the phrase, the worse it is the better; the argument was that the Irish people are so incorrigible that they cannot be trusted with local self-government. I believe the hon. Member's ear is tuned to higher music than that Orange cry. The hon. and learned Gentleman is only an Ulster man by a geographical expression of speech, and we have always regarded him as one of those men who in an Irish Parliament would make the minority respectable and respected, and possibly convert it into a majority when the pledge to die in the last ditch fighting against the Queen's troops shall have disappeared from the qualifications for a seat in Parliament for loyal Ulster. The hon. Gentleman was very impressive on the subject of the term "oppression," and invited me to deal with the iniquities of Irish Boards of Guardians in giving relief to evicted tenants, and daring to plant a labourer's cottage on the sacred soil of the loyal minority. The hon. and learned Gentleman and his friends have never been able to forgive the Boards of Guardians since they were relieved of the domination of the ex officio members, the most effete and corrupt oligarchy that ever existed. I should be delighted to follow him into these matters; but I fear you, Sir, would think it wide of the mark. He also discussed the victims of our oppression in Ireland. The only victims of our oppression I am acquainted with are the rack-renters, whom we have forced to disgorge two millions a year of dishonest rack-rents; and in that form of oppression we had this Tory Parliament and the Government for our accomplices. Let me remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that while this Debate was proceeding an English Judge and jury were appraising the value of this talk about our victims. Did he ever hear of Mrs. Eliza O'Connor, of New Tipperary? She was one of the victims mourned over by the Times in large type, and for whom the Primrose dames appealed to the British public for subscriptions. The English jury having seen the lady apart from the glamour and the poetry of the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union, and having heard the hon. Member for South Tyrone, expressed their sense of the oppression practised upon this famous New Tipperary victim by awarding her one shilling damages, and the Lord Chief Justice of England expressed his sense of the situation by not granting her expenses. But all the hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks as to oppression were utterly irrelevant to the case of the County Councils, for under the Bill they would have rather less power than an Irish Board of Guardians. They could not give sixpence to an evicted tenant, or build a labourer's cottage without the imprimatur of a Tory Standing Joint Committee. The masterly analysis of their powers under this Bill by the hon. Member for West Belfast remains unanswered and unanswerable; his contention remains untouched, that in substance and in fact the only power the County Councils would have would be to mend roads that were mended before them. For my part, I can conceive no opportunity for the County Councils to practise oppression unless it is supposed that they would use the stones they got to mend the roads to throw at the heads of the loyal minority. The only oppression in connection with the County Council would be that which the Councils themselves would suffer. In power they will be beneath the level of a parish vestry, while in all the acts of their lives they will be liable to be tripped up and cuffed by Official Boards. Boards of Guardians were dissolved for passing political resolutions, and these County Councils will be swept away by a Judge of Assize for passing a resolution protesting against their own sufferings. The Attorney General for Ireland briefly invited us to reform the Bill in Committee. Our answer is, "Reform it altogether." The thing is a mockery and imposture in every part. Nobody believes in it, and nobody wants it, except possibly the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who still preserves a fondness for the castles in the air which he built in his more sanguine days, and has the same interest in his plans as a maiden lady crossed in love has in a faded love letter. We are told that it is not safe to give the majority in Ireland local self-government unless you keep cuffing and snubbing them, and that it is not safe to shake hands with an Irishman unless he is first handcuffed. That is a singular position to take up after six years of resolute Tory government. The First Lord of the Treasury led us to believe the other night at Manchester that he had brought us all to be as meek as mice in Ireland, and that he was in a position to bid defiance to agitation in future. Does the right hon. Gentleman disavow the sentiment I attribute to him?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not recognise the words.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I cannot give the golden English eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman, but the view of the average Manchester man of the words of the right hon. Gentleman was that he was so far successful in Ireland that he could bid defiance to agitation in future. But with regard to local self-government for Ireland, in the words of Festus, "the opportune time has not yet arrived" for treating the Irish people as if they were other than ticket-of-leave men under the surveillance of the police. With a Tory Government the opportune time will never arrive; and those who are sitting here in the last years of the twentieth century—if Tory principles of government prevail.

in Ireland in the meantime—will have some brave Mr. Balfour of the future standing up in the House and assuring the Commons of England that he has made a clean sweep of Irish disaffection, and is just on the eve of treating them as real citizens of the Empire; but the opportune time has not yet arrived. If your theory is that we are a nation of thieves, rogues, and Hottentots, treat us as you would treat Hottentots—take away our votes and rule us from head-quarters by drum-head court-martial, and take away the pretence of conciliating Irish national sentiment, and you will be doing as well as you are doing by this Bill. Hon. Members opposite taunt us with our little differences on minor points. We have our little differences like other people; like the Orange Tory Party in Ulster. I ask hon. Members to look at home. It is the habit to talk of the loyal minority in Ireland as if it were a consolidated unity with interests and sympathies absolutely identical. There can be no more ridiculous mistake than that. The Grand Jurymen and Tory placemen, in whose interest this Bill is promoted, are only the minority of the loyal minority. I challenge contradiction when I say that so far as this Bill is concerned, and so far as every detail of the Irish Land Question is concerned, the interest and sympathies of the Protestant farmers, North as well as South, are with us; and if they were left alone by outsiders—Scotchmen who have left their country for their country's good, and English Prime Ministers who are one moment haunting the lobbies of the Vatican with petitions for help, and the next flinging their horrid war brands among the Orange rowdies of Belfast—they would be still more with us. The right hon. and learned Gentleman told us that Irishmen fight bitterly enough, but when the fight is over their instinct is to shake hands and be friends. That is so, and will be so, in Ulster. Five-sixths of the loyal minority are with us to a man on the questions of Local Government and compulsory purchase in Ulster, and I invite anybody who denies that to make them test questions at the Belfast Convention and see if their army will not desert them in regiments, leaving them nothing but General Officers and Prime Ministers. If the Government dream of passing this Bill—and apparently they do not—they will be simply doing for the thousandth time that stupid thing—foisting on Ireland what she does not want—instead of doing the one wise thing they have never done or attempted to do, giving her what she does want, and what would content her, leaving you no poorer, but making her far richer. You cannot go to the country with a better epitome, a more compendious short catechism of the theory and doctrine of Tory government in Ireland than this Bill, with all its insolence and absurdities. I would not argue with the man who believes that such Bills as these are going to rid you of the Irish question. At the end of this Tory Parliament, just as at the beginning of it, Irish nationality confronts you, not weaker, but stronger and more irresistible. There is, I verily believe, at this moment no living force in all the politics of the world more widespread, more passionate, more beyond your power to weaken or destroy. In attempting to get rid of the Irish nation from our small island you have created other Irelands in Canada, the United States, and Australia, and have raised at least fifteen millions of Irishmen with a love for Ireland and a passion for Irish nationality, which you can no more destroy than you can destroy the green of the Irish fields or the oxygen of the Irish air. These fifteen millions can be conciliated; they have already been conciliated to a most marvellous degree by the mere hope and promise of legislation of a different character from this Bill; and they are more ready, more eager, now than ever to take that conciliation completely, fully, and honestly to their heart's core the moment it is translated into action; but depend upon it you will never by coercion hurl from their hearts the instincts of Irish nationality, and still less when you think of befooling them by a policy of shabby, insolent, illusory half-measures, such as the Bill now before us. So far as the motion for the Second Reading is concerned, I, for one, am perfectly and absolutely indifferent, because I am fairly well assured that, whether this Bill be now read a second time or not, it will be kicked out with contempt by the constituencies before this day six months.

(5.1.) MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I propose, with the permission of the House, to enter upon a practical and business-like examination of the provisions of this measure. In doing so, I am afraid that I shall make some demand upon the patience of the House, and that I shall be much more dull than the speaker who has immediately preceded me. I am afraid it is not possible for me to rise to the exalted level of his eloquence. I suppose when it was known that he would take part in this Debate it was expected that he would at once enter into competition with those Irish Members who preceded him, in multiplying epithets of vituperation generally which have been heaped upon this unfortunate measure; and certainly he has been quite as successful in that respect as any speaker who has preceded him. In the course of little more than half-an-hour he has said that this Bill is a shabby, insolent, and illusory half-measure, a mockery, an imposture, and a piece of insolence, a contemptible, ridiculous, and absolutely monstrous absurdity; that it has been proved to be a practical joke, and that it is an affront and an insult, not merely to the Irish people, but to the Irish race to the extent of fifteen millions all over the world; and, finally, that it is abounding in mischief. I confess I should be inclined to pay more attention to these flowers of rhetoric if I did not know that it is "only Pretty Fanny's way"; if I did not know that they strew the path of every proposal for reform in Ireland which has been made, not by this Government only, but by every Government, and that similar language has been heard from the hon. Gentleman and from some of his colleagues in regard to every proposal for land reform, or for the reform of government in Ireland, which has been brought in either by my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) or by the right hon. Gentleman on the other side; and yet we have seen that after some, at any rate, of these Bills have been passed into law certain hon. Gentlemen claimed them as their charter of liberty for Ireland, after having abused them as being an insult and a mockery of the aspirations of the Irish people. But there is one thing, at all events, which I may say about the speech of the hon. Member. He has not given to the House, from first to last in his speech, one single piece of evidence, one single proof, that this Bill deserves all the vituperation which has been lavished upon it. He has indulged in general criticism, consisting of abuse of everybody, chiefly of the Prime Minister and of the hon. Member for South Tyrone; but the Bill he has left entirely alone. He has told us nothing about the reasons for the general description which he has given of it. Now, it is absolutely necessary that we should go a little more into detail; and let me say that it is the difficulty and the characteristic of all discussion upon questions of Local Government that it is extremely difficult to distinguish what is detail from what is principle. Under these circumstances it is almost impossible to carry on the Second Reading discussion in the way in which Second Reading discussions are usually carried on. I will give one illustration, in passing, of this. In opening the Debate upon the Second Reading Motion the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast made a speech which I venture to say was one of conspicuous ability, and above all of conspicuous ingenuity. The hon. Member in the course of that speech was able to establish a case against the Bill unless it can be upset. Although the hon. Member criticised a great number of its provisions, he laid his chief indictment against that part of the Bill which provides, as he says, for the control of the proceedings of the County Council by the Standing Joint Committee, which would consist of a majority of landowners. Well, but the House knows that the Committee is to consist of seven representatives of the Grand Jury and seven representatives of the County Council. Everything depends upon who is to be Chairman. The Government propose a Chairman, who the hon. Member says would in every case take part with the Grand Jury, with the representatives of the Grand Jury; and therefore that was, so long as it was unanswered, a very strong point against the Bill. But the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland got up immediately afterwards, and said the Government were well aware that the proposal was open to an objection of that kind; but that their object was to obtain an absolutely impartial Chairman, and that they were thoroughly willing to consider any suggestion that might be made on that subject. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury reminds me that he made the same statement on the First Reading. The Attorney General for Ireland said they would be willing in Committee to accept any Amendment that would carry out this object. Coming back to the Standing Joint Committee, I want to point out that it makes all the difference in the world, in regard to the criticism of the Bill, whether this Standing Joint Committee, which it is alleged is to have control of the County Council, is really to consist of a majority of landowners, or whether it is provided that if there should happen to be any difference of opinion between the representatives of the County Council and the representatives of the Grand Jury, it will be settled by a perfectly impartial arbitrator. In the one case there would be a serious objection to the proposal; in the other it would be altogether a different matter. This particular point, therefore, shows how difficult it is, as I have said, to separate in a discussion on the Second Reading what is opposition to the principle of the Bill from what is really only a question of Amendment in Committee. I will try, and I hope I may be successful, to extract what seems to me the principles of the Bill, difference of opinion upon which would justify a vote against the Second Reading. I say the first principle is that it is desirable to extend to Ireland Local Government, by which, of course, I mean Municipal County Government, based generally on the principles of the Scottish and English Acts. With regard to the question of principle, if any hon. Gentleman or right hon. Gentleman does not agree that it is desirable to do that, then of course he would be justified in voting against the Second Reading, and we shall be perfectly willing to take issue with him upon it. I do not think it is quite clear what is the position of right hon. Gentlemen in reference to this matter. In the First Reading discussion the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne announced the reception which he and his Party were prepared to give this Bill, and said this—

"Our position is to welcome any measure which points in a liberal and conciliatory direction without compromising our opinion that reform of county bodies is hopelessly insufficient to meet the requirements of Ireland; but that this reform unless constructed on an almost unattainable scale would increase the difficulties of government in Ireland."

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain

In other words, the right hon. Gentleman says they were prepared to welcome any measure which pointed in a liberal and conciliatory direction; but the spirit in which they were prepared to welcome it was the spirit of their belief that it would be hopelessly insufficient to meet the demands of Ireland, and that unless it was conceived on an impossible scale it would be absolutely mischievous, because it would increase the difficulty of government in Ireland. The other night my hon. Friend the Member for South Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce), speaking also on the subject of this Bill, said—

"The only reform that would ever succeed in Ireland, and which would bear the fruits of peace and contentment, would be a reform enacted freely by Irishmen themselves for the free government of their own country."

If this expression of opinion represents the view of right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, then it is perfectly clear that they consider that any reform of Local Government in Ireland, unless it is accompanied by Home Rule, would be positively mischievous; and, as I say, that is undoubtedly a question of principle which I, for one, should be very happy, indeed, to discuss with hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, because the position which I understand the Unionist Party take on this matter is that reform of Local Government in Ireland is desirable on its own merits absolutely, without reference to the question of Home Rule. This proposal is not intended in any sense as a peculiar form of, or as a substitute for, Home Rule. It has nothing whatever to do with Home Rule. Whether we have Home Rule or whether we do not, still we shall require an efficient and satisfactory system of Local Government in Ireland; and I say we concede this to the people of Ireland, because we believe it to be good for Ireland, because Local Government is after all the most important concession which we can make to a people; it is even more important than Parliamentary Government. Local Government has more to do with the happiness, the health, the comfort, and the welfare of the population than the greater part, at all events, of the business which is carried on in this House. For the poor, especially it is of the greatest importance, because the character of their lives largely depends upon what is done for them by the Local Government under whose control they live. Further, Local Government we believe has been proved to be in this country the best political education for the people; and certainly it appears to us that Ireland stands rather in need of further political education. And then, lastly, we say it is a fair demand which has been made on the part of Ireland, and one which we clearly concede, that there should be opened up for Irishmen in Ireland an opportunity of gratifying what I may call their local ambition. For all these reasons, which, as I have said, have nothing whatever to do with Home Rule, we are anxious to see this Bill passed, and we believe it will have very considerable beneficial effect in Ireland. The second question of principle, with regard to which I should be inclined to describe a difference of opinion as justifying the rejection of this Bill, is this, that the grant of these liberties in Ireland must be accompanied by securities that they will not be abused. Well, I should like to ask, is there a difference between the two sides upon that point? I want to know do right hon. Gentlemen on this side, who are going to vote against this Bill, say that no securities are necessary? If so, they are extremely inconsistent, because most undoubtedly their whole previous course of action shows that, in their opinion, securities would be necessary, if the concession were ever to be made. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) speaking at Newcastle said—

“The second thing about which I have never concealed my opinion is that I, for one, will never be a party to placing a minority and the property of a minority at the mercy of a majority, in case they should be inclined to deal lawlessly.”

That was said in 1886, and no Irish Member below the Gangway complained of that statement as an insult to the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle contemplated as a possibility what every sensible and reasonable man must contemplate, that if Local Government is given to the Irish people these powers might be abused; and he said he, for one, would be no party to placing the minority and the property of the minority in the hands of the majority. I do not want to multiply quotations; but again I say I take it for granted, until I hear to the contrary, that the right hon. Gentleman and those he ordinarily acts with have not changed their opinions—that they believe securities are necessary, and, consequently, upon this point, at all events, there need be no difference of principle.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I think you will find I was speaking on the subject of Home Rule.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: The right hon. Gentleman was speaking, on the occasion of the speech from which I have quoted, in reference to Home Rule; but it appears to me that the same principle applies exactly to Local Government. If the majority in a Home Rule Parliament would be likely to, or if it would be possible that they should, abuse their powers to the disadvantage of the minority, à fortiori the members of a Local Government Body or a County Council may most probably fall into the same errors. But here is a statement which makes it still more clear. In June, 1886, referring to a plan for the extension of municipal and provincial administration such as this, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“Such plans unite the greatest means of mischief with the smallest promise of blessing.”

That is consistent with the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman that no reform of Local Government is desirable unless it has been preceded or accompanied by Home Rule. Then he goes on to say—

“They” (that is the plans for Local Government) “open a wide power for injustice on the part of the many to the few; it will increase the opportunities for intolerance of class and of religion.”

Well, that is exactly what I say. There is no reason for thinking that it would be a necessary consequence, but a possible consequence; and I venture to think that if it would be admittedly a possible consequence, it will be admitted by the right hon. Gentleman himself that it ought to be provided against. The Government surely would be failing in its duty altogether if it did not take some security against this possible abuse. They have been warned by the representatives of the Nationalist Party that they will abuse any concession of the kind. United Ireland, at the time when it was the organ of a united Party, said—

"We will unscrupulously use every position that we capture in Ireland as a Home Rule factor to drive the enemy unsparingly off the ground."

I do not say whether this threat would be carried out; but I do say that there is the intention clearly expressed—the oppression which the hon. Member who preceded me said he could not understand is there clearly pointed out—the oppression of the minority, which should be absolutely driven off the ground. Now, I want to ask, is it agreed, or is it not agreed, that it is desirable to give Local Government—full, complete, and effective Local Government—to Ireland; whether we are willing to give Home Rule or not? And, secondly, is it agreed, or is it not agreed, that if we give full, complete, and effective Local Government, we should have some securities that the powers would not be abused? If it is so agreed, then, so far as I can see, there is no difference of principle; and there is no reason why hon. and right hon. Gentlemen should not agree to the Second Reading of this Bill. There is only one other reason which, I should say, would justify a vote against the Second Reading of this Bill. It may be said, it has been said by some speakers, that although they are in favour of the extension of Local Government to Ireland upon British lines, this Bill does not fulfil its promise, and is not on British lines; and although they consider safeguards are necessary, the particular safeguards which have been selected by the Government are so absolutely intolerable in their character that they are not even worthy of a moment's consideration or of amendment in Committee.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Hear, hear!

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: Then we regard that as being a question of principle which divides us. Under these circumstances I will consider as briefly as I can whether this Bill is on British lines, and whether the safeguards are intolerable and unreasonable. I must say that I shall do so with much greater pleasure because I hope to convince the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby; but I cannot help believing that, like the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues, he is practically against the idea of Local Government at all, without, as I have said, the previous

concession of Home Rule. I can well understand what an outcry would have been raised if we had proposed bodily to transfer either the English or the Scotch Act to Ireland. It would have been said—"Through your profound insolence and contempt for Irish opinion you have proposed to put in this Bill provisions which may be good enough for you, but which our intelligence absolutely rejects." But it was pretended, it was declared, that the Bill has been at all events based upon the lines of this legislation. As I am going to deal with the safeguards later, I shall consider first what I may call the enabling portions of the Bill, that is to say, those portions of the Bill which deal with the character of representation and with the transfer of functions. So far as the character of the franchise is concerned, practically every man paying rate, great or small in Ireland, will be entitled to an equal vote—one man one vote—in dealing with these local affairs. There is precisely the same provision in the English and Scotch Acts. It is true that there are two new provisions. ("Hear, hear!") Very well, they are the only things you object to. There is the provision as to the cumulative vote. I am not going to defend that. I am absolutely opposed to the cumulative vote. I believe it would only irritate the majority and offer no protection to the minority; and therefore if this Bill gets into Committee I will support any Amendment, whether moved by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, or any other hon. or right hon. Members, to cut out this cumulative vote provision. But nobody can pretend that the introduction of the cumulative vote into the Bill is a question of principle which would justify the language of the hon. Member who has just sat down or the rejection of the Bill on the Second Reading. Then as to the question of the illiterate vote. Now I speak I hope with modesty, and I ask Irish Members below the Gangway is this a matter of great importance? How many illiterate voters are there in Ireland? I know there are a great number of people who claim to be illiterate voters, but nothing will make me believe that the illiterate voters can be so very numerous amongst a people so intelligent. You will say that their education is not so good as ours; but they had a good system of education before we had ours, and therefore I do not believe that the proportion of illiterate voters can really be so much greater than it is in England—and remember this is not a question of reading and writing, but that they are so illiterate that they cannot mark the ballot paper; and I say that the number of illiterate voters cannot be a matter of consequence as regards the question of franchise. This Bill does not propose to disfranchise anyone. That is not its object. The Bill proposes to protect the voter from intimidation and to maintain the secrecy of the Ballot. Well, I repeat as regards the question of franchise that this is not, as I have shown, a serious matter. The franchise is as democratic, as complete, and as full as anything we have in England or Scotland. I now come to the transfer of functions. As regards the transfer of functions, will it be believed that with one exception, which I shall deal with directly, the transfer of functions is wider than it is either in England or Scotland? In the first place—I do not lay stress upon this, but it is a very important fact, that this Bill will give to the Irish people control not merely over the County Councils, but over District or Baronial Councils—a thing which we have been promised, but which England and Scotland have still to continue to wait for.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): What can they do?

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: What can they do? Well, they can do what District Councils can do. I am not dealing now with the question of what they can do, but with the comparison between this Bill and the English and Scotch Acts; and I say that in this respect—though I do not lay very much stress upon it—the scheme is comparatively wider and more liberal than that of the English and Scotch Acts. But that is not all. The County Councils in Ireland, in the first place, can deal absolutely—with a slight exception which I shall refer to later—with the whole of the annual expenditure of the county. That is precisely the same power as exists in the English and Scotch Acts. The whole of the ordinary annual expenditure will be placed under the control of the majority of the ratepayers. Not only so, but these bodies are to be given certain powers which are not possessed by either the English or Scotch County Councils, such as the care of woods and forests, the administration of the Factory Acts, and what is of the very greatest importance, the control of the sanitary legislation. It is alleged that an exception has been made in the case of the control of the police, because it is said the County Councils will not have control over the police; but the County Councils in England cannot control the police. The control over the police is given to the Joint Committee.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Not altogether.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: Yes; practically the control and responsibility of the police is given to the Joint Committee. In London, where there is a great Local Body, we know that the control over the police is retained by the Imperial Government. Well, what happened in the Home Rule Bill? Even in the Home Rule Bill of 1886 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian thought it necessary to reserve the control of the police, at all events for a time. If he thought it necessary in a Bill of that kind to withhold the control of the police from such an important body as the Irish Parliament, a fortiori, there is some ground for withholding it at the present time, at all events, from the County Council. But my point is that, contrasted with English and Scotch Local Government, there is not so much difference. In neither is the control of the police given to the popular authority. But it would be a monstrous absurdity to reject a Bill which transfers fully and completely every function which is at present performed by a selected local body to a popular Democratic representative body, because the Act which makes this great concession and change does not at the same time transfer to the popular body a power which never has been enjoyed by any selected body in Ireland up to the present time. It would be to make an entirely new departure, and whatever there may be to say for it, clearly this is not the time, and clearly a fact which is not germane to the immediate question which we have under consideration, should not be imported into the Debate, in order to constitute a case of objection to the Second Reading of the Bill. I say, then, that, so far as the transfer of functions go, they are sufficiently complete, and they may even be described as being fuller than those which are enjoyed by England and Scotland. I come, however, to the safeguards which have been proposed. Now, I have said I assume that it will be admitted in all parts of the House that it is reasonable and right that some kind of securities should be provided. All we have to consider is whether these securities are entirely unreasonable—so unreasonable that it is not worth while, it is not even right and proper to consider them in Committee. Now the first remark I have to make is that all these securities are potential securities. The actual effect of them will, in practice, I believe, be almost nil, and almost insignificant. They are not conditions which guard the use of these powers, but they are precautions which are only to come into play if the powers are abused. If the Irish County Councils elected under this Bill will carry out their duties, as I hope and believe the vast majority of them will, with the spirit with which similar duties are carried out in County Councils and Town Councils in England and Scotland, these precautions, will hardly ever come into play at all. Now, what are the precautions? In the first place there is the clause to which so much objection has been taken for the arraignment of a Council in case it is guilty of corruption, of malversation, or of oppression. That is a clause which has been described again and again as an insult to the Irish people. Where does the insult lie? Does it lie in supposing that possibly one of these bodies at some time or another may be guilty of malversation, of corruption, or of oppression? Such things have been known before with popular representative bodies in England and in Scotland. They have been known in Ireland. During the administration of Lord Spencer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) ten Boards of Guardians were suppressed. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton will not say they were wrongly suppressed; I suppose he had good reason for suppressing them. I suppose he suppressed them either because they were corrupt or because they were oppressive. I ask him to say, if he did not suppress them because they were corrupt and oppressive, why did he suppress them? Does he think now they ought not to have been suppressed? I have no doubt whatever that they were rightly suppressed. If Boards of Guardians have been rightly suppressed, why may not a case arise in which—

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Why have you not got it in England?

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. and learned Gentleman is in too great a hurry. I hope he will let me pursue my argument, and in due course I will tell him what we have in England. Where is the insult, where would there be any greater insult, in suppressing County Councils than in suppressing Boards of Guardians? As far as I have heard up to the present time, it has never been considered an insulting or an offensive act to the Irish people that in these exceptional cases some of these Boards of Guardians have been suppressed. If it is admitted that an abuse of this kind against which the clause is intended to be a safeguard might take place then there is no question of principle, and the only question is as to the method. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) said the other night that his objection, as I understood him, was not to some safeguard, but it was to the safeguard adopted. He said, "Why do not you remain content with the general law of the land; why do you introduce a novel and exceptional mode of procedure?" I think that is a question fairly open to argument. But what is the general law of the land? The hon. and learned Gentleman asked me what happens in England. In England every Local Authority—Town Council and County Council—is amenable to a Court of Law for its acts. I will take as an instance the Municipal Act of 1882—only passed ten years ago. There is a clause in that Act which is quoted from a similar clause in the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835—

"Every Order of the Council for the payment of money out of the Borough Fund may be removed into the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice by writ of certiorari, and may be wholly or partially disallowed or confirmed, with or without costs, according to the judgment and discretion of the Committee."

In England there is a provision which gives a Court of Law the right to have arraigned before it any act of a Town Council involving the payment of money, and to decide, absolutely at its own judgment and discretion, whether that payment shall be disallowed or confirmed partially or in whole. Now, I go a step further. Supposing that the Court having done that—and there are cases in which this clause has been resorted to—supposing the Court decide that the action of the Town Council has been improper, that the expenditure has been illegal and corrupt, and thereupon asks that the resolution shall be rescinded; and suppose then that the Council is recalcitrant and refuses to obey, what happens then? The Council goes to gaol. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) prefer that method? Does he prefer that the Irish County Council, when it performs an act of corruption or oppression, shall go to gaol? Does he think this a less insulting provision than the provision of this Bill which merely says that the services of the Council shall politely be dispensed with? All I can say is, if that is the only difference between us, I do not see why we should not come to an agreement. I confess I am not so much enamoured of this clause, which brings in the two Judges, as not to be perfectly willing to substitute a clause which would, in the circumstances named, send the Irish County Councils to gaol, if they prefer that, for the clause that would make them give up their position as Councillors. The objection really seems to be a very curious one, because it is an objection to the intervention of a judicial tribunal. I have shown that so far as the intervention of a judicial tribunal is concerned the same thing is done, although, perhaps, by a rather different method, in England and Scotland as is proposed for Ireland; and if the method adopted in England is preferred I really do not see there is any sufficient importance attached, either on the Government Bench or anywhere else in this House, to this clause to prevent the objection being met as hon. Members may desire. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) left this clause alone, and I think he was very wise. He said he would not deal with it because it was too absurd. I have never known anything so absurd that the hon. Member has not been perfectly willing to deal with it in this House if he saw his opportunity. I am perfectly satisfied that, if his objection were so strong as he wished the House to suppose, his speech would have been lengthened by at least an hour by an exhaustive examination of this clause and a most complete exposition of its entire folly.

MR. SEXTON: I did say that this clause put into the hands of two Judges the power to deal with matters not of crime, but of prejudice and of opinion, and the power to disfranchise electors.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: I admit I do not follow the hon. Member, because the offences to be brought before the Court are offences of corruption.

MR. SEXTON: And oppression.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, I know; but let us deal with them separately. There is no difficulty about corruption. Then there is the offence of malversation. Again, I say, there is no difficulty. Oppression, the hon. Member says, there also is; and the whole objection is to that word. It is for a lawyer to define that, if it is not defined; but if the difficulty of the hon. Member is that oppression is not defined, nothing can be easier than to put a definition in the Bill. (Cheers.) Is the fact that hon. Members below the Gangway, and apparently hon. Members above the Gangway, do not understand what the legal view of oppression is, a justification for voting against the Second Reading of this Bill, when, as I have said, they may be perfectly certain that a majority of the House would be perfectly willing to insert any satisfactory definition which may be proposed from this side? My point with regard to this clause is, that some security of the kind is absolutely necessary; that this is a provision which is less stringent than the practice in Ireland and in Scotland, and that if the practice of England and of Scotland is preferred, there is no earthly reason why it should not be substituted. Now I come to what the hon. Member for West Belfast attaches the greatest importance to—I mean the functions of the Standing Joint Committee. The hon. Member described his conclusions in a sentence when he said that the County Council would be “the drudge, the scullion, and the serf” of the Standing Joint Committee, which would be a Committee, so far as its majority was concerned, of landowners, and that consequently the County Council would in almost every act of its existence, except in breaking stones or the destruction of dangerous insects, be at the mercy of a Committee of landlords. I was very much surprised, I admit, by his speech. I have since examined the Bill most carefully. I have taken pains, by inquiry of those with knowledge of municipal practices and law, to ascertain what will be the effect of the Bill; and I say, without hesitation, that the statement of the hon. Member is a gross caricature. Let us see. In the first place the Government have already told us that they will accept an impartial Chairman.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY : Cecil Roche.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN : Who is he? No, that kind of interjection is really not argument. Surely it must be possible—I do not know—to find an impartial man in Ireland; but if the wit and intelligence of hon. Members below the Gangway can find an impartial man who would be fitted to be the chairman of a body like this, we know that, in principle at all events, there would be no objection on the part of the Government. We have that assurance from them. Therefore, in dealing with this thing, it is nonsense to argue as if it were a majority of landlords we have to do. Supposing the members of the Committee were divided and their interests were divided; we are dealing with a body in which the balance will be held by someone who, ex hypothesi, is to be impartial. But in the second place it does not appear to me that the representatives of the Grand Jury can fairly be described as landowners. They may be, but they may not; as a matter of fact, as I understand it, they are intended to represent, not landowners as such, but the largest payers of cess. They may be occupiers, and I believe, in a great number of cases, are. ("No!") At all events, the hon. Member for West Belfast, in piling up his objections to this clause, told us that the landowners did not pay the cess, and therefore this control of landowners who did not pay cess would be exercised over the conclusions of the representatives of the ratepayers who did pay. But if the landowners do not pay, then they will not be the representatives of the Grand Jury in this case, because they would not be the largest cesspayers or the representatives of the largest cesspayers.

An hon. MEMBER : They are now.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN : No; the representatives of the Grand Jury will act on this Committee as the representatives of the largest cesspayers. Does this House consider, I should like to know, no special protection is due in Ireland to the largest cesspayers? The state of things in Ireland is altogether exceptional, and, as far as I know, has no parallel in this country. Speaking generally, all over Ireland five per cent. of the cesspayers pay fifty per cent. of the cess. Now that is a most extraordinary state of things.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY : Where did you get that?

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN : Never mind where I got it. I assert it, and if the hon. Member would like particulars for any county or barony in Ireland I will give them.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY : Give us one case.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN : The hon. and learned Gentleman is so extremely moderate that I must gratify him. I will take a case at haphazard from any page of this Return. Shall it be the second or the third, or which will he choose? I will take one on chance. Here it is : Province of Leinster, Queen's County, Barony Clonmellagh, five per cent. of the ratepayers pay 57·3 of the cess. Barony of Clonmellagh, 5·6 of the ratepayers pay 49·7 of the cess, and so on. I believe, with one exception, in the County of Meath, where the circumstances are peculiar owing to the largeness and the fewness of cesspayers, the same result will be found all over Ireland—in many cases much more extraordinary than I have given. In one case two per cent. of the ratepayers pay 50 per cent. of the cess. This is my point—as reasonable men do we think that no special consideration whatever is due to persons who, being very few in number, pay so large a proportion of the total rates? Is there no danger that, unless some protection is given to them, there may be an inclination on the part of the majority to spend money which is to a large extent not theirs but that of the minority for purposes which really are hardly justifiable? If any consideration whatever is to be shown to those large cesspayers it is almost impossible to give it in a form less considerable or more insignificant than that which is contained in this Bill. Now I take issue directly with the hon. Member for West Belfast. Here is one point to which the hon. Member who sat down last has not made the slightest reply, although it cuts almost the whole ground from under the feet of the hon. Member for West Belfast. The County Councils have control over the whole annual expenditure in a county, and that amounts to 97 per cent. of the whole. They are absolutely uncontrolled by the Standing Joint Committee with regard to 97 per cent. of their expenditure; and the only expenditure over which the Standing Joint Committee—of which we are told that the County Council is to be “the drudge and the scullion and the serf”—is to have any control is three per cent. Was ever such an extraordinary argument based upon such a slender foundation? But that is not all. In its main features there is something similar in our English and Scotch legislation. What is the fact in England and Scotland, where the case is not nearly so strong? In Scotland I believe there is a Joint Committee, with functions almost identical with those of the Irish Committee. As regards England, every loan, or every application for a loan for capital expenditure, has to receive the assent of a Government Department, the Local Government Board, and that assent is only given after the holding of a local inquiry. Therefore, as between Scotland and Ireland, there is identity in the two systems; and as between England and Ireland the object is the same, although the method is different. For my part, I am bound to say that I think I should prefer the system of the Joint Committee to the present English system, which forces us to have recourse to the Local Government Board, or, in the case of a Town Council, occasionally to the Home Office or to the Treasury. But the main point is that some protection is afforded to large ratepayers that their interests, and, above all, their future interests, shall not be pledged and mortgaged without some chance of appeal from the County or Town Council. The same remark applies to the provision which requires the consent of the Joint Committee to the opposition directed against Parliamentary Bills. I do not know how this is in Scotland. I suppose that there it is controlled by the Standing Joint Committee. But in England a Town or County Council has to get the authority of the Local Government Board. The hon. Member for West Belfast made on this point an extraordinary statement which struck me at the time. I was almost aghast at the idea that the Bill should contain such provisions as he represented. He said that the control of all litigation was given to the Standing Committee, so that even a County Council could not even prosecute a man for a nuisance without asking the consent of this body. Of course a state of things of that kind would be perfectly ridiculous, and would make the Bill so cumbrous as to be unworkable. But nothing of the kind is contained in the Bill. This provision does not apply to what may be called ordinary prosecutions or litigation. The County Council will have those general powers under which they will be able to take all steps necessary to enforce the Public Health Act, the Artizans' Dwellings Act, and all the other Acts under which it has control; and the only object of this section—which the Government, I would suggest, may cut out if there is no objection—is enabling; that is to give power to the County Council, if they get the assent of the Standing Joint Committee, to promote exceptional and extraordinary litigation.

MR. SEXTON: There is nothing in the section about extraordinary or exceptional litigation.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: No; but I have taken the best possible advice on this subject—I have gone to the highest authority on Municipal Law—and I am assured that as that clause stands there is no doubt whatever that the County Council have full powers for all ordinary litigation connected with the carrying out of the Acts entrusted to their charge. There is another point taken by the hon. Member. He said—and the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) repeated the statement—that the County Council would be unable to appoint or to remove the smallest officer without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee. Why, what is the real state of the case? Clause 52 deals with this subject, and says—if the hon. Member does not understand it, any lawyer will tell him this is its construction—that at the outset the County Council shall prepare a scheme showing the number of officers they want to employ, their functions, and their salaries, but not their persons.

When that scheme has been approved, then the County Council has absolute power over the patronage. No one can say one word as to the choice of the persons; and the list of patronage is wide enough to gladden the soul even of an Irish Member. And then the hon. Member says that the County Council cannot dismiss these officers after they are once appointed. With the exception of two officers, for whom there is much to be said for the protection of their offices and the safeguarding of their positions—the county secretary and the county surveyor—Sub-section 8 of Clause 52 says they may appoint, dismiss, and I think reduce, any single one of their officers. They have as absolute power as any County Council in England, and the whole case of the hon. Member for West Belfast is based upon an entire misconception and an entire misreading of the effect of this clause. Under these circumstances the power of this Standing Joint Committee is so extremely limited and so extremely insignificant that I do not very much wonder that the hon. Member for South Antrim said that if the Bill got into Committee he should wish to extend it. I beg to impress this upon my hon. Friends, that the power of the Standing Joint Committee is confined to a power over three per cent. of the actual expenditure, and that the whole object of this clause, the whole advantage of this precaution, is not to give control over what I have called the ordinary work of County Council, but to prevent the possibility, which everyone must admit to be a possibility, of a County Council either through folly or perhaps deliberate intention, engaging in large capital expenditure in which the interests of future ratepayers would be mortgaged and seriously interfered with. I must apologise to the House for having detained it so long. My examination has been necessarily one somewhat of detail, but I have been obliged to go into detail in order to follow the arguments, as I have endeavoured to do, of hon. Members from Ireland. Now I assert it is impossible any reasonable man can maintain that, if the statement which I have made as to the effect of this provision is correct, it constitutes anything offensive or insulting to the people of Ireland. No, Sir, the real objection to this provision is that hon. Members below the Gangway think that it will be effective. United Ireland two or three years ago said that the grant of Local Government to Ireland by the British Government would “sell the pass” as effectually as a Home Rule Parliament. Now this Bill does not sell the pass, and that is the great fault of it in the eyes of the Irish Members. I feel that the opposition to this measure is an electioneering opposition. It is all very well for hon. Gentlemen to come here and say that they regard Home Rule as the only remedy for the grievances of Ireland. It is all very well for them to object to the removal of any one of these grievances by any means whatever. The fewer grievances there are the less will be the demand for Home Rule. I doubt whether the people of Ireland share the well-simulated indignation of certain of their representatives with regard to the Bill. I am certain that the people of Ulster do not, and they deserve some consideration. They say indeed that they would welcome the Bill.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN
Well, a section which represents the majority of the people of Ulster. The representatives of that section come here and say that their constituents would welcome it, and I do not think that the constituents of the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway are so indignant as they are represented to be. I believe that if this Bill were passed they would make a good use of it—that they would rejoice in the new liberty that would be conferred upon them; that in the great majority of instances, at any rate, the same results would follow which have followed the granting of a similar measure for England and Scotland; and that the whole of the people of Ireland would take a far greater interest in their local affairs. It may be impossible to carry this Bill through Committee in a Session like the present, but it would not be at all impossible if hon. Members would imitate the spirit of the hon. Member for North East Cork, who said he would like it to be passed even without discussion.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: If you will give us the Dissolution. Will you?

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: I am not in a position to answer that question, but I say this: I think it is a most liberal offer, and I call the express attention of Her Majesty's Government to it. If I were sitting on those Benches and in a position of authority, I should say without hesitation, "I will close with the hon. Member. Give us this Bill without discussion or with such discussion as is reasonable and fair, and we will give you a Dissolution immediately." I am sure the Government would like to know how far the views of the hon. Member are shared by other hon. Members below the Gangway. In the meantime I say that the production of this Bill is a fulfilment of the pledges of the Unionist Government, and that it enables us to point out to the people of this country that the greatest obstacles against progress in Ireland are the Home Rule policy and the Home Rule Party.

(6.5.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): I think I have heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down a hundred times before. I have never heard him make any but that speech on any capital measure proposed by Her Majesty's Government with respect to Ireland. What happens is this. The Government bring in a Bill. Its proposals are attacked, and the Government get into distress, and then of course "a friend in need is a friend indeed." The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham gets up and makes his speech. I heard him make a speech on the Coercion Bill of 1887 in almost identical terms, and also on the Parnell Commission Bill of 1888. This is his stock speech, and whenever the Government want such a speech I think I could make it for them. The right hon. Gentleman first says, of course, that there are one or two points on which he is bound to differ from the Government, and then he proceeds to develop the Bill. He trots out the horse and shows you his beauties. "It is true," he says, "that the horse has certain vices," and this, that and the other; "but are you going to refuse to purchase the animal because of such small vices, which can be taken out of him by a little exercise?" He afterwards says that if hon. Members will bring forward a temperate Amendment he will support it in Committee, but when the time comes for the Amendment to be brought forward, where is the right hon. Gentleman? I remember on the Parnell Commission Bill there was some proposal to define the charges and allegations. Where was the right hon. Gentleman? I think he was at Washington on that occasion. It invariably happens that he has sufficient Radicalism left in him to condemn some obnoxious points in the measure, and he says that he will vote for their removal, but they are not removed, and the Bill ultimately passes into law with the benediction of the right hon. Gentleman. Then, again, he is always modest with regard to his knowledge of the subject. He has always some Hurlbert to whom he refers as his authority. You remember that Hurlbert was his great authority five years ago with regard to the Constitution of West Virginia when he recommended its adoption for Ireland. He has gone to the highest authority on this occasion, the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney). The right hon. Gentleman said, with respect to the "put-them-in-the-dock" clause, "If you will accept for Ireland what already exists in England I shall be glad to support as an alternative that the power of certiorari be given in the case of Ireland." But will the House believe it?—the power of certiorari already exists in that country with regard to the Grand Jury system, and it is continued in this Bill. Therefore, he would give us what we have already. I do not know why the right hon. Gentleman always resorts to the enemies of the Irish people for his information. He goes to his Hurlberts and his Macartneys to back him up, instead of to those who are most intimately acquainted with the subject. The accuracy of almost every proposition in his speech traversing the arguments of the hon. Member for West Belfast I deny. In the first place I would ask—why should there be a Standing Committee at all for Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham said it was necessary, because five per cent. of the ratepayers in Ireland pay fifty-seven per cent. of the rates. He assumes that it is the landlord who pays the rates, but it is not; and it is not the five per cent. of the ratepayers who would be represented on that Committee. Land farming in Ireland is such a profitable business that the landlords hold no land of their own—they let it out amongst their tenants. They pay no cess except for the land in their own hands, and, speaking generally, I say that the Standing Committee would no more represent the ratepayers of Ireland than would the Council of the Mikado of Japan. Now, I have never taken a strong view with regard to minority representation in Ireland. So far from being opposed to it, I have always been anxious for such representation; but it is not fair representation they want—it is absolute power, and unless they get it they take no interest in the working of local affairs. I should be delighted, in fact, if a scheme could be provided whereby the minority could be properly represented. But we have to deal with the Government plan, which is one to perpetuate the Grand Jury system; and I say that no plan will be satisfactory that does not give some elective body the power of dealing with the question of malicious injury. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman deal with it? I contend that the Tory Party were more liberal in this respect in 1878 and 1879, when they were an undiluted Party, than they are now, when they have the support of the Unionists and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. It is true that in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet there was no distinct principle of election, but he allowed in it half the Grand Jury to be drawn from the elected representatives of the Boards of Guardians, and it gave to these elected bodies, among many other powers, that of dealing with the question of malicious injury. Since then, it is true, the Grand Jury have had additional powers given to them. But now the Government propose to allow only the Joint Committee to deal with capital expenditure. Therefore I say that I infinitely prefer the Bill of 1878 to this Bill. I would now ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham why has the subject of malicious injuries, which is connected with the reform of the Grand Jury system, been omitted from this Bill? Does he not know that at every Assize that which creates most gall in the public mind is the mode in which the Grand Jury deal with the question of malicious injury? Yet, the right hon. Gentleman has ignored this point altogether. No Local Government Bill will be of any value for Ireland unless this question is fully and adequately dealt with. None but the Tory Party would propose to continue such an anachronism as that of the Grand Jury system in Ireland. It is a system which is rotten from top to bottom. I say abolish the Grand Jury system for all purposes. There is no need now for the finding of true bills. The Attorney General well knows that no prisoner will be in the least injured by the abolition of such a system of indictment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has said that the Grand Jury represent the higher ratepayers. I say they represent no one. He takes the point that in Scotland the Commissioners of Supply are analogous to the Grand Jury in this case. Yes, but in Scotland the landlord pays nearly the whole of the cess, so that in Scotland it is right that the Commissioners of Supply should continue to have the chief representation and control. There is practically no way of impeaching the Grand Jury in Ireland. There is no satisfactory way of challenging it so far as I know. It consists of twenty-three men whom the Sheriff may choose to put upon it. He may select twenty-three men from the butler's hall; twenty-three coalheavers from the quay; or even twenty-three paupers from the workhouse or twenty-three lunatics from the nearest asylum. I say therefore that they represent nobody but the Sheriff. These twenty-three men are put upon the jury for the purpose of counterpoising the elected representatives of the people. Is that the case in Scotland? There the Commissioners of Supply have an historic reason for their existence, and they represent the people who pay most of the rates. The landlord there pays half—I am told that he pays nearly the whole. But in Ireland the Grand Jury neither represent the higher ratepayers nor the minority—only the Sheriff. Suppose that to-morrow the Liberal Party come into power and appoint a succession of Attorney Generals as Judges. Supposing they do not take the view of the loyalist minority, but appoint popular Sheriffs. These Sheriffs might appoint twenty-three members of the Local League or Federation, and where would then be the protection of the loyal minority? If you want to protect the higher ratepayers or the loyal minority you should give them some independent mode of election. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham said that Local Government was more important to the Irish people than Home Rule. He said it affected the condition of the poor, and enabled the poor man to get some kind of decent government, and also enabled local politicians to obtain reasonable training in politics that would, I suppose, enable them to compete with the giant intellects sent here from Birmingham. We have not found that we were not a match for those on the Treasury Bench with whom we have had to deal, though we have not had the advantage of being Mayors or Aldermen of Birmingham. No doubt it is desirable that the Irish people should have more training in local affairs than they have hitherto had, but does this Bill give it to them? I anticipated that the right hon. Gentleman would, in recommending this nostrum to the Irish people, have told us how it would benefit the poor man. The main things that are wanted in Ireland are the very matters this Bill does not touch. We want some system for the improvement of agriculture, some system of forestry, some system to improve the breeds of cattle and poultry, some system for draining and improving the land, and some system dealing with the subject of labourers' dwellings. Does this Bill deal with those matters? Does it sweeten the life of the poor man in Ireland? Nothing of the kind. It is a purely artificial Bill, and its operation in this connection is confined to the breaking of stones, which my hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) referred to. Those grievances which go to men's hearts, you are wholly unable to deal with in this Bill, so far as the elective principle is concerned. An impartial man has to be found who will hold the scales as between the Grand Jury and the representatives of the people. It is not, however, only one impartial man that you will have to find. Diogenes will have to look for thirty-two of them. No doubt we might find one impartial man. I could find one in this House; he is sent here from Birmingham. Men of his calibre are exactly what we want in Ireland, if we could only get them. But unfortunately the country does not breed them. Our country—whether in the Orange districts or in the Nationalist districts—Providence seems to have sterilised in the matter of producing impartial men of this kind. But we want thirty-two of them. We have eighty Resident Magistrates, and we know that they are all impartial men. We know the first Lord of the Treasury has fought many a sturdy battle in this House for their impartiality. It would give the House an idea of the way the Government propose to get impartial men if I tell the House a story. The Government have got one official in Ireland whom everybody respects, Sir Thomas Brady, the Fishery Commissioner. His whole life has been devoted to the interests of the poor, and of the poorest class of the poor—the seafaring class—and to trying to improve their lives and trying to procure for them better boats.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Hear, hear!

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Johnston) was his colleague, and unfortunately in an evil hour I got him removed from his post, which I have infinitely regretted from that hour to this moment. Sir Thomas Brady had the misfortune to be over sixty-five years of age, and because he was a popular man with the people, hardworking, devoting his days and his nights to the service of the poor men, he was not exempted from the sixty-five years' rule, as were a number of old Tory fogies whom the people hated and despised. Why was he not exempted? Because the Government wanted to give away the job. And remember this fishery question will be one of the questions we shall like the Maritime County Council to deal with. To whom was it proposed to give this position? To the most odious man within the four seas of Ireland, Mr. Cecil Roche. These are the impartial men for whom the jobs of presiding over the County Councils are to be found under this Act. Why does not our Birmingham Diogenes give us some idea of where the thirty-two impartial men are to be found? From what sect, from what class of the community are they to be drawn? I believe we did have one Resident Magistrate in Ireland from Birmingham. He was appointed by the late Mr. Forster, and I believe he was a Police Commissioner who had been dismissed, or some dismissed official from Birmingham. At any rate, will anybody tell me where these thirty-two men are to be found? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) tells us that he will support us if we find them. It is not our business to find them. What we say is this. The choice should be with the impartial people at large, and it is the duty of the people to have their likes and dislikes. The people of Birmingham like the right hon. Gentleman; the people of Connaught do not. Let the people make their own choice. Let the people of Birmingham choose the right hon. Gentleman, and let the unenlightened people of Longford choose men like myself; and therein I maintain you have the only safety for working human institutions. Why do not Englishmen find out the necessity of these provisions for themselves? The right hon. Gentleman was very proud of his one ewe lamb, the power of certiorari; but I ask him why do not Englishmen need some system of Joint Committee, with one impartial man to preside, appointed by the Government? Why do not you feel the need, in your Anglo-Saxon souls, of impartial men? I should think, say in the town of Liverpool, at this moment you would be very glad of having an impartial man. I heard much bad language used between Liverpool men on Wednesday week about gerrymandering and about the oppression of the Tory Party for the last forty years. Why Sir, that reminded me of an Irish Board of Guardians. But nobody proposed—not even anybody from Birmingham—to nominate an impartial man to preside over these warring clans in Liverpool. It never entered the Anglo-Saxon mind. What they say is, “No, we prefer instead of having billeted upon us some official with the trade-mark of the lion and the unicorn, that he should have the brand of popular approval at the polls.” That is your own plan, not only in this country, but also in your colonies. It is only the sister island that requires to be wedded to impartial men. Sir, I denounce this whole system as a hypocrisy. We are as good as you are; we are as bad as you are, and we are no better and no worse. That is exactly the state of the case; and it is this system of erecting yourselves in a kind of hierarchical position and talking to us in a Cockney accent, that is so offensive. The right

hon. Gentleman tells us that this is a good Bill. What is it good for? What improvement does it make in the lives of the people? What withdrawal does it make of the powers of the oligarchy? I challenge the Chief Secretary (Mr. Jackson) to deny this—that every proposal for reform in Ireland has hitherto been objected to by resolution after resolution of the Irish Grand Jury Bodies, and that every proposal of coercion has been supported by resolution after resolution of the Irish Grand Jury Bodies. Well now, at the last Assizes of March the thirty-two Irish Grand Juries had before them this Bill, and from not one Grand Jury, from Antrim to Cape Clear, did a protest against this Bill go forth. Why? Because every one of them is satisfied with it; because it leaves them in garrison where they are. It does not touch a single one of their powers, and they know it and are satisfied with it; and because the Irish Grand Juries are satisfied with it I am not. I will take that as the test of the merits and value of this Bill. It is a Bill which has the hall-mark on it of these Grand Jury Bodies which it proposes to abolish, and tested by that test alone this Bill stands condemned and judged. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that there are securities in this Bill and that there were securities under the Home Rule Bill, and that while we object to the securities under this Bill, we did not object to those under the Home Rule Bill. But the Home Rule Bill was worth paying for. If we had to give securities, we got something worth taking. We were willing, and are willing, to give every reasonable security for the purpose of setting up in Ireland a decent and respectable system of Government, but we are not going to give securities for the purpose of having an odious sham and humbug set up in our midst. We wanted Home Rule, and we were willing to pay for it in securities. But we do not want this Bill we reject it, we are not prepared to give securities for it, and that is the answer to the whole question. What were the securities in the Home Rule Bill? If we were not to be allowed to set up a Crentz ascendancy, and we were prohibited legislation thereon. We say, Sir, if we give you that as security. If you not want control over the Army, paymen

Navy; the Bill said so, and we said Amen. Under the Home Rule Bill we had not power over garrison, or fortress, or arsenal, and we said, "All right, keep them, much good may they do you." And so on, dealing with a number of questions of that kind. We said it was right and proper, in dealing with an island which had been a subject of contention for 700 years, and which had excited statesmen and warriors during these seven centuries, that this House—especially in regard to a Bill that had to pass the House of Lords—should take some reasonable security such as those proposed in that Bill, and we are still of the same opinion. But what is the security wanted in this Bill for? Security against what? Who can these bodies oppress? Is it for breaking a few extra stones, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) pointed out? That is all they can do; and is a body to be solemnly indicted before two Judges if they break a hundred-weight of stones more than are thought sufficient for the roads? That is practically the whole power of the whole business. Then what about the oppression of the minority under the rates? The misfortune is that the minority do not pay the rates; I only wish they did. If there is any excess of rates struck, it is the majority who will have to pay them. It is astonishing to find that any catch-cry is good enough for English Tory audiences when they are dealing with Ireland. You say you want to protect the rates of the minority, thereby assuming that the minority pays the rates; but it is not the landlord but the common people, the tenant farmers, who pay the rates and who are the majority. What then becomes of your minority bogey? Is it to be propounded that the majority will mis-spend the rates which they themselves have to pay? I can understand the argument that the majority of the ratepayers do not pay the majority of the rates. Very well, adopt some provisions whereby those who pay the rates will have the control of them. We know the landlords do not pay the rates in the country. If you can invent any scheme whereby you will give the highest ratepayers, who are not a minority in the sense of a loyal minority or a Protestant minority, but in the sense of being a ratepaying minority—if you can invent a scheme for giving joint control in this matter, I for my part am not in favour of challenging or denying the prudence of such a provision. But that is not your provision. You have started the minority bogey in relation to Home Rule, you have carried it into your Local Government Bill, which has nothing to do with it, and you blandly assume, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, that the minority in both cases is co-terminous. It is not so. The Bill is as a whole a worse Bill than the Bill of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill). The Tory Party have, like the crab, gone backwards. The provision about the two Judges did not exist in that Bill. The provision is an absurd and unworkable provision—it is not worth while spending time discussing it; and really I think my hon. Friend might be spared the taunt of not discussing a Bill which the Government themselves do not profess is going to pass. The House of Commons has for once fallen to the level of the Kensington Parliament. This is a mere debating society, and this is a debating society. Bill presented in dummy by the Government for debate, not only here but at the polls. It is by means of an academic discussion of this kind that the Government means to carry out the promises made in 1886 by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill). Perhaps I may be allowed to remind the House, not of the words he then used, but of the language he used in 1888 when he was challenged with having used these words. The point I make is this: the Government have been promising us for six years a Local Government Bill. They had not been promising the English people a Local Government Bill for six years, and they had not been promising the Scotch people a Local Government Bill, but England and Scotland each got a Local Government Bill. The Irish were promised a Local Government Bill from 1887 downwards, and it was the first measure promised in the Queen's Speech in 1887; but you have no more intention of keeping your word on this subject than King William had when he made the Treaty of Limerick. When in 1886 the noble Lord the Member for Paddington stated that Ireland could be governed without coercion and by the Local Government scheme which the Government intended to pass, he meant every word he uttered; consequently he is no longer in the Cabinet. He promised a Bill with "Similarity, simultaneity, and equality"—and when challenged two years later he not only nailed his colours to the mast, but he nailed the Tory Party to it also. What did the noble Lord say. In vol. 391, page 586, 25th April, 1888, I find he is reported in Hansard as follows:—

"It has been supposed—and this supposition I have never before noticed, although it has been rather widely alluded to in the Press—that in the declaration which it was my duty to make at that Table in August, 1886, I was stating that which was much more my own opinion than the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. Sir, I think it right to say that that was not so in any degree whatever. The declaration which I made at that Table at that time was, as far as it related to Ireland, a written declaration. Every sentence of it—I might almost go as far as to say every word of it—represented the opinions of the Government, and had been submitted to, and assented to, by the Prime Minister himself, and by the Chief Secretary for Ireland of that day. More than that, that declaration I made with regard to Ireland—I recollect it as well as if I had made it yesterday—I made without one dissentient voice, and without one dissentient murmur being raised among the hon. Gentlemen who belonged to the Tory Party. More than that, I was given to understand, in the plainest way, that the declaration of the Government thus made received the full and entire approval of the Leaders of the Unionist Party."

What then was the pledge in 1886? It was a pledge that in the following year a Local Government Bill for Ireland would be introduced and passed into law. We have had a Coercion Bill instead. You passed Local Government Bills for England and for Scotland, and now three years later, at the close of a moribund Parliament, which you yourselves have stated you are going to dissolve next month—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No.] You have not said so in so many words but you have hinted it by way of Votes on Account, by circumlocution and by messages to Press Associations, and by speeches at Hastings about Free Trade, and by incitement to civil war. You have shown it by providing money for a bogus convention in Belfast next month. Money for that purpose has been obtained from this country just in the same way as you allege our agitation is conducted by American dollars. It is altogether of London and Birmingham manufacture. And then, Sir, the Government bring in this belated Bill six years after it was promised, and after they have kept their word to England and Scotland. I ask the House whether it is decent to bring in a Bill of this kind without intending to pass it into law? The First Lord says we are not to have a Dissolution next month. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham back that promissory—or rather non-promissory—note?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said nothing about the Dissolution.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Then we are going to have it next month? Let me meet you either way. Therefore, a Bill is brought in which you yourself cannot pretend is to be passed. It is brought in just before a Dissolution in order that it may serve as the skin of the Tory drum to be beaten in front of the ballot-box. There is no honesty, not only in the Bill itself, but in the mode of its introduction; and it is by these means, Mr. Speaker, it is hoped to make the Irish people respect British faith. Is it any wonder that British faith is a bye-word in Ireland, and that pledges given by Ministers in this House are regarded as dicers' oaths across the Channel? One of the ablest men in the Tory Party, the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), declared in 1886 that by the following year Ireland shall have a Bill satisfying the requirements for Local Government in Ireland. He makes that statement from a written paper drawn up at a Cabinet meeting, and it is accentuated by cheers from the Tory Party fresh from their baptism at the hustings. The Government are now going back to the country which they have bamboozled by their pledges, not having carried out the scheme of Local Government for Ireland, which they declare to be pacified. After all, coercion is but a means to an end. It is valueless except in so far as it brings about the pacification and appeasement of the country. Either Ireland is contented or she is not; either she is a good subject for Local Government and the blessings of freedom or she is not. If she is, why do we not get it? This Bill has no life. It is not pretended that it is intended to be passed, and I venture to say that you cannot even gull your own electorate in England by telling them that this Bill is any fulfilment of the pledge made by the noble Lord on behalf of the Government in 1886. This Bill, and the way in which it was introduced, furnish one more lesson to the Irish people of the fact that so long as a Government is powerful enough to defy its pledges it has not even a blush for breaking them, and that the only thing which passes through this House with celerity is a Coercion Bill. Such a Bill runs down an incline plane in the House of Commons and with railway speed through the House of Lords. An ameliorative Bill, like the rolling stone of Sisyphus, has to be pushed up a hill; and the task, like the promises of five years ago, is never carried out, although the approach of a Dissolution may give a little stimulus to it. I venture to say that the pretence of the Government on this point no longer deceives the humblest elector in this country, and certainly so far as Ireland is concerned I do not think in any Nationalist constituency there would be even one voice lifted up to raise the cry of "More power to Balfour's elbow."

*(7.8.) SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I desire to say a few words upon this Bill, because I have had some experience of Local Government. And certainly I have never, in the course of my life, shared the doubt and distrust expressed by the hon. Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) in reference to the extension of Local Government either in London or the country. I may also say that since 1885 I have consistently advocated Local Government for Ireland, and I maintain still that the extension to that portion of the United Kingdom of what has been found so beneficial in this country is eminently desirable. Experience in England and Scotland has justified this, and Ireland will also justify it. And I have still a strong feeling in favour of the views expressed a few years ago by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), that the principles upon which Local Government should be extended to Ireland and England and Scotland should be those of similarity, and the treatment of the United Kingdom, as far as possible, as a whole. I also think that the tendency of its own friends to minimise the importance of this measure is a mistake, both of fact and of policy. It is the last, and not the least, link in a practical programme of Irish remedial legislation, much of which has been accomplished, as I have myself seen in Ireland, and the rest of which could be secured by a wise and wide Bill for Local Government, ridding us of any reproach of inequality in our dealing with the sister country. Now, Sir, I confess that my first impression of this Bill was not one of perfect satisfaction. I know that there are hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House who shared my opinion, and I am bound to say that even now I cannot feel myself completely at one—at any rate on important points of detail—with those who have introduced this Bill. At the same time I have studied the Bill carefully, and I have endeavoured to come to an impartial conclusion with reference to its provisions, with the result that my first conclusions have been modified, and that I am at least clearly of opinion that it may be made into a good Bill, and that only some half-dozen Amendments will make it conform to the principles I have stated. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) doubts the discovery of an impartial man. Well, Local Government may produce one, for I remember it once did so in a Mayor who, on first taking his seat as Chairman of the Magistrates, said that during his year of office he would do his best to be neither partial nor impartial. Now, Sir, I will first point out to the House that the basis, the backbone of the Bill—which is contained in the first three clauses—is absolutely identical with the principles upon which the English and Scotch Bills are framed. The first clause covers Ireland with County Councils in just the same way as these Councils have been established in England and Scotland. In the second clause the franchise applicable to County Councils in Ireland is practically the same as on this side of the Channel, an inhabitant occupier plus a rating franchise, including both owners and tenants as occupiers, and, of course, women. So far, I think, no exception can be taken to the Bill. In the next place there are none of those so-called safeguarding provisions which I think were at first, and wrongly, suggested in the case of the English Local Government Bill—I refer to ex officio members and the property qualification, which were also comprised in the Bill of 1888. The only one point in which it differs—for the elections are to be, equally triennial—is in the filling up of casual vacancies. In this Bill it is provided that these vacancies shall be filled up by the Council itself. That is a difference concerning which there may be room for difference of opinion, and it may be an improvement, though I doubt it. Then, Sir, there is another point in which Ireland has a distinct advantage. The scheme of Local Government for England and Scotland has not yet been completed, but provision is made in this Bill for the creation of Baronial Councils or District Councils for Ireland, and so far the scheme has a comprehensiveness which the English one does not possess. This scheme, too, has another advantage over the English—and it is an advantage which I have claimed and again claim for this country—and that is, that the county and municipal boroughs are all treated as County Councils. There has been great friction in England with regard to the powers which the boroughs once had, and which are now absorbed by the County Councils, but in Ireland the boroughs have a separate County Council existence, which I think will be found advantageous, and to which I shall some time refer as a preference in favour of Ireland and a precedent. Well, now, I should like to say a word with reference to the powers conferred by this Bill. So far as I can judge, speaking generally, the powers possessed by English Corporations are extended to Ireland. The fiscal administration of the county—I will speak of the checks and safeguards later—is placed in the hands of the Council, as is also the administrative business of the county, and I would expressly point out that what is the bulk of the work in our English County Councils and which affects the health of the people and touches the home—I refer to sanitary administration—is properly confined to the County Councils under this Bill. Then the cess-payer has the control over the county expenditure, and some new powers which we are trying by Bill to get for England—e.g., to contribute to charities and be represented through County Councils on the Governing Bodies. When I heard the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. Timothy Healy) speaking of the want of powers, I thought to myself that this Bill conferred a list of powers which would afford a large scope for activity and demand a great sacrifice of time. The application of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act is placed in the hands of the County Councils, and this would lead up to dealing with the fisheries, and no one can feel more than I do the paramount importance of developing that industry in Ireland. I do not think that anyone can visit the fishery school at Baltimore—the best fishery school in the British Empire—without feeling that Ireland has set an example to other nations in this direction, and that she deserves all the encouragement that can be given her. Then I think the hon. Member must have overlooked Clause 19 and other clauses which enable the County Councils to deal with woods and plantations and with forestry and agriculture. The question of agriculture is an especially important one to Ireland. I was in Denmark the other day, and there I fell into conversation about Irish interests with the largest exporter of agricultural products from that Kingdom, and he said to me that the great rival of Denmark in the future will be Ireland. Well, I believe that under the Bill the County Councils could provide for both practical and theoretical teaching on the subjects referred to; but if that is not so, I would urge that it should be done by the insertion of clauses in Committee; and I would remind the House that education is being improved by a separate Bill, and that the Government have done very much for the Irish teachers, as one of them reminded me at Rathmore. Yes, if we want education great, we must first make the education great. I could go on speaking of other powers conferred by this Bill, because they are undoubtedly numerous. If, however, it were pointed out that certain useful powers were lacking or inadequate, no one would more cordially support any Amendments towards supplying them than I. But, the machinery of County Government for Ireland being thus provided on the main lines of England and Scotland, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Barton) that the enfranchising powers of this Bill should be considered apart from the safeguards, which I confess I should deal with differently from him. Limit, if you like, or destroy in some cases, the proposed safeguards, but do not let us destroy the whole Bill for the simple reason that there are points of detail on which we do not agree. These are matters which, if important, and even essential, are still capable of amendment in Committee. Well, Sir, I am very glad to find the disposition which has been evinced by the Government. They must know that there are differences of opinion among their own supporters on this matter. I do not forget Birmingham; and I believe that a considerable minority agree with me when I say that I approve most heartily the intimation of the Government that they are prepared to reconsider, and I hope concede, many points in the direction of greater similarity and equality, and so improve and strengthen the Bill. I trust, therefore, that we shall carry this Bill into Committee and discuss its details with an independent spirit, so that we may at such a time cease to do all for Party and unite in doing something more for the State. Now, with regard to the safeguards, though the necessity for some protection for minorities has been conceded by every speaker, including the Members for West Belfast and Longford, and in every Bill for the Government of Ireland, I think anyone who has had experience of municipal government will agree with me that restraints are always undesirable unless there is a supreme necessity for them. Safeguards have two disadvantages: In the first place, they may create friction; they may even be incitements to discontent; and so far from facilitating they may impede the transaction of public business. Another disadvantage of safeguards is that they are apt to prove artificial, and being so they are illusory and ineffective. Better rely on trust and a sense of public responsibility, on an improving public opinion, and so give Local Government a full and fair trial. I can conceive nothing more unfortunate for Ireland than that Irish country gentlemen—many of whom still live on their Irish estates and are respected—should rely on these safeguards, instead of being stimulated to take part in the government of their counties, as was done, and done successfully, by the English Act. Their own public activity will be their best safeguard. Now, Sir, there are one or two of these safeguards with which I will deal briefly. I take, first, that relating to the trial and dissolution of County Councils by petition of appeal. That is dissimilar from anything in the English Bill, and my wish is to proceed on the principle of similarity as far as possible. It is a new, and at the most a doubtful expedient, and I think the resources of the ordinary law—an armoury of mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, with the ultimate sanctions of fine and imprisonment—are not so limited as to make the introduction of a provision of that sort supremely necessary. Besides, I hope there is in Ireland an improving public opinion, which I believe will be furthered and educated by the transaction of local government, and result in putting an end to a great deal of that distrust which had been a source of great injury to that country in her industrial pursuits in an age of organised and collective trade. It has been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that as an alternative to this safeguard there is in England that of the imprisonment of the members of the County Councils under certiorari. Well, after all, it seems to me that the suppression of a Governing Body is a more serious matter than the imprisonment of an individual—it means the loss of an institution. And, Sir, I doubt the expediency of this safeguard because of the substitute provided in the Bill, which is that the Lord Lieutenant shall nominate a new Council. In that case you have absence of direct power in the Lord Lieutenant, coupled with full responsibility for the actions of the nominees, which is obviously undesirable and worse even than personal government, which at least combines power and responsibility; and such a nominated Council would not be even as representative as the present Presentment and Grand Jury system. I hope, therefore, that this clause will disappear from the Bill. I have now a word to say about the cumulative vote, which again is dissimilar from any thing in the English and Scotch Bills, and here again I am glad to observe that a disposition has been shown to consider some alternative proposal. It has been conceded by

hon. Members opposite that some protection for minorities is desirable, and I think some better proposal than this for carrying out the object in view could be devised. I doubt very much whether the proposal now in the Bill would be effective, because I am inclined to think, from my observation in Ireland, that in many cases the minorities are so small that they would not be able to make themselves felt. It may be that some other scheme would, therefore, be desirable, and the suggestion of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. Timothy Healy) points to a possible conclusion. At any rate, the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham) and the First Lord of the Treasury have expressed their readiness to consider other proposals, and if the principle of some protection for minorities is approved, it ought not to be impossible to carry it out in a satisfactory manner. Then I cannot think that this is an opportune moment for dealing with the question of illiteracy or for disfranchising any persons in Ireland. And this matter of illiteracy leads me to suggest whether such a complex franchise as the cumulative vote is suitable to the circumstances of Ireland, especially as the Bill does not apply to the boroughs, which will add to the confusion. The time is, indeed, not one in which to detract from household suffrage, but to make it as inclusive as possible, if the claim to adult voting is to be resisted. With respect to the Standing Joint Committees, there is a precedent in Scotland but not in England, and I cannot help feeling that the tendency is to unnecessarily restrict the powers of the Councils. I do not under-estimate the dangers of excessive local expenditure, but I should be the last to object to productive expenditure on public works; still the growth of local indebtedness is a serious matter, to which attention was called by Mr. Fawcett in his Political Economy. I think the powers of these Standing Committees are too restrictive, except on capital expenditure, and I believe their scope does give some ground for the remarks that have been made about the limitation of the powers of the Bill. The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Jackson) challenges what I say as to limitation, but there is no doubt of it, through the Standing Committee. The Bill contains frequent words of limitation, and of those words I do not see the necessity in some cases. In one or two instances there is even a double check--the check of the Standing Committees and the check of the Local Government Board. That is the case with respect to borrowing powers. In this country we have no check except the Local Government Board, and we find that check very stringent and ample for the purpose. Then there is the standing check of a public audit and the possibility of surcharge. All this is surely sufficient without limitations of powers which may prevent the best men undertaking such duties—a danger even in England. With respect to the Chairmanship of these Standing Committees, I find there is an impression that the Sheriff is to be the Chairman; that is not the case. He is an ex officio member of the Committee, but the Committee may appoint their own Chairman. The same provision exists in the Scotch Bill, but I admit that the two cases are not identical. The Scotch Sheriff is a really independent official, whereas the Irish Sheriff is supposed to be more a man of an order or class, and if he were necessarily the Chairman of the Standing Committee, it might undoubtedly cause friction and accentuate class differences, and destroy that unanimity of purpose which is so eminently desirable. But even the Bill gives a better alternative, and I hope that some further improvement will be made in this direction, as has been intimated by the Attorney General. With respect to compensation for malicious injuries, though I am thoroughly in sympathy with some of the remarks that have been made, and am prepared to vote for a Bill to transfer to a judicial and independent tribunal what is a judicial and not an administration matter, still I must say that I think that subject is beyond the purview of this Bill, and is calculated to distract us from the business of Local Government. The matter of county and divisional boundaries should, in my opinion, be entrusted, as in England, to a Commission, and not to the Lord Lieutenant, since in such questions it is important not only to be fair, but to seem fair, and we must allow even for prejudice and distrust, and do our best.

to reduce or remove them. On the subject of disqualification by absence, I think the same rule should apply to the Chairman and Vice Chairman as to the other members of the Committee, for absences have been the ruin of Ireland socially; and I do not see why the Chairmen of the Baronial Councils should not be on the Commission of the Peace. I sympathise with the desire of working men to have representatives of their own body on the Bench, and I have done what I can to assist in this matter in Hull and elsewhere. The Chairman of one of these Committees does not necessarily belong to one class, and I do not see why this office should not qualify him for a seat on the Bench, and so act as an incentive to the performance of public duty. I have made a critical examination of this Bill, and, taking it on the whole, I believe it has a foundation which is broad and wide. Its principle, as embodied in three clauses, does for Ireland all that was done for County Government in England, and in some respects even more. It is a Bill that is eminently capable of amendment, and Amendments will be required; they are also in some measure conceded; and if those Amendments are framed on wise and safe lines, by open minds, this Bill will be most valuable as extending the principle of local administration, as uniting not only the hearts, but the interests of both countries, and as conducing to both contentment and good government.

(7.37.) MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I rise with some reluctance to take part in this Debate, because it seems to me like beating the air for Members to discuss a Bill which it is perfectly well known will never go beyond the stage of the Second Reading. It seems to me a waste of time to discuss the details of the measure which the Government do not intend to press through this Session. If the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. A. J. Balfour) would give a straightforward opinion about this Bill, there might be some use in discussing it, but I think he must listen with some amusement to hon. Members discussing the details of the Bill, when he knows very well that it will never go into Committee at all. If he would only tell us whether he intended to pass the Bill or not, he would save a considerable amount of time, and Members would know how to deal with the Bill. The hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) has spoken on this Bill. He represents a certain portion of the Irish people, though he does not represent the whole of the Irish people. But it is nevertheless a fact, that on whatever else the Irish people are divided, there is no division amongst them as to the way in which they regard this Bill. They regard it as an absolute insult to the Irish people; and I, therefore, refuse to discuss it seriously, or to go into its provisions at all. If there were no other reason for opposing the Bill, I think the speech of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) was a sufficient justification. From beginning to end his speech was a cynical, cool, studied insult to Ireland. He sneered at the Irish people and the Irish representatives in every possible way, and he did not advance one single solid reason why this Bill should be accepted by the Irish people. A great many reasons have been urged why it should not be accepted, and I think they may be summed up in the words, "The Irish people do not want it." The great mistake that successive Governments have made in this House in legislating for Ireland is to imagine that English Ministers know so much better than the Irish people what is good for Ireland, and acting on that assumption measure after measure has been passed through this House, and naturally no beneficial effect has been seen. This Bill will not settle the question of Local Government. It will not settle the question of National Government; it will simply cause irritation and harm. Can anything be more absurd than the course taken by the Government in this Debate? In spite of the protests of the Irish representatives and the Irish people the Government are wasting the time of the House in passing a Bill that the Irish people do not want and are protesting against as an insult. If a distinguished foreigner were sitting in that gallery during this Debate, and heard the protests of the Irish people through their representatives, he would carry away an extraordinary idea of government in this country. Suppose the same thing had occurred with relation to the English or Scotch Local Government Bills. Suppose the Scotch Members had protested against the Scotch Bill in the way that we protest against this, the Government would have dropped it instead of insisting on passing it in the teeth of a national protest. I think there is nothing more absurd, ridiculous and grotesque than the position of the Government in relation to this Bill. The hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. Timothy Healy) spoke of the feeling of the Irish people with regard to what he called British faith, but I do not think the Irish people have any fault to find with the Government because of this Bill. They did not desire Local Government for Ireland from this Government or from previous Governments, and they will not require it from the next Government. They want National Government, which will enable them to settle the question of Local Government for themselves. It is like putting the cart before the horse to treat the question of Local Government and withhold the power of National Government. It is a question which you do not understand, and I venture to say that nine-tenths of the Gentlemen who sit on the opposite side could not pass the simplest possible examination in the most elementary features of Local Government in Ireland. You know very few of the circumstances in connection with Local Government in Ireland. For you Englishmen—many of whom have never been in Ireland—whose information is extremely limited, to sit there and waste the time of your country—simply because you think yourselves superior to Irishmen, and better able to judge what is good for them locally than they are themselves—in passing a Local Government Bill instead of letting the Irish people do it for themselves is to make yourselves the laughing stock of the whole world. We shall not be satisfied with this Local Government Bill or any other; we desire a full and free measure of national self-government, and we will then settle the details of local self-government ourselves. I put a question the other day to the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the Irish Education Bill, which is desired by every class and section of the Irish people. That is a Bill which would be welcome, and which, if it were properly amended, we would do our best

to help the Government to pass into law. But we are not allowed to discuss that, and instead we have forced on us this Local Government Bill, which scarcely a single person in Ireland desires. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to bring the sham and mockery of this Debate to a close, and if we must have a Division on the Bill—which is to be buried as soon as it is read a second time—let us take it at once, and devote the time which would be wasted on it to the Irish Education Bill. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) told us that the objection to the Bill was a merely electioneering objection. That is a strange remark to come from him, for everybody knows that the Bill itself is an electioneering measure of the most transparent kind. If you had five years of healthy life before you, we should not have had this Bill introduced. But after six years of coercion Government you are afraid to go to the constituencies at the General Election on coercion alone, and so in the last weeks of your existence you bring in an Irish Local Government Bill in order to pretend that if you have coerced the Irish people you have also offered them a fair and broad measure of liberty as well. Is it not absurd, on the face of it, that with the 86 Irish representatives absolutely united in opposition to this Bill we are having it forced down our throats by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? I do not know much about Birmingham, but I have no doubt there is much to be done there and many reforms to be made, and I say that the right hon. Gentleman might look after his own constituency and leave us in Ireland alone. If anybody imagines that any section of the Irish people are content to be "bull-dozed" from Birmingham they are very much mistaken; we do not want legislation forced down our throats by the right hon. Gentleman and his friends. I want to say one word more about guarantees. I am disgusted whenever I hear the subject mentioned. The hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. Timothy Healy) said he was willing to give guarantees for this, that, and the other; but the Irish people are doubly insulted when they are asked to give guarantees. The request means that you do not think they are sufficiently civilised and intelligent to govern themselves and mind their own business—unless you introduce a sort of inquisition in the country—and to abstain from driving from the country those of their fellow-countrymen who do not agree with them. It is impossible for any Protestant Member for Ireland to get up and say with truth that he believes that I and men like me in this House would think of interfering with the liberties or rights of any section of our countrymen, whatever their religion may be. We never introduced the religious element into the discussion, and nothing is more hateful to the Irish people and their representatives than that a question of religion should be introduced into that of national or local self-government for Ireland. I have never thought of giving any guarantee for my countrymen; I think too well of both my Roman Catholic and Protestant fellow-countrymen to believe that guarantees are needed. When we hear of these elaborate systems of guarantees and checks, it only shows us that the men who are proposing the Bill have not their heart in the work; it does not show that they believe them to be necessary, but it does show that they are obliged to do something to satisfy the bigotry and intolerance which exist in the minds of a certain section of their supporters in a certain part of Ireland. The Government know very well that the minority would not be oppressed in any County Council in Ireland, for we are far more tolerant in Ireland than you are in England. We hear of cases of intolerance at Eastbourne and other places, where the minority were brutally ill-treated; in Ireland no such scenes as that would ever occur. I represent a constituency in which there are Catholics as well as Protestants, and if they are allowed to live alone and are not interfered with by outsiders there will be no civil war and no interference with each other. This talk of guarantees is insulting to the Irish people to the last degree, and if guarantees are to be given at all they should be given by the Government to the effect that they will prevent their responsible Ministers making speeches in this country of the most inflammatory character and calculated to revive in the North of Ireland those scenes of riot and bloodshed which have disgraced its past history. If I were to make a speech in Ireland against the Orangemen of the same character as that of the Prime Minister against the Nationalists I should be tried for treason-felony, and probably sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. The Prime Minister is allowed to suggest, with perfect impunity, that it is the duty of Orangemen to take up arms against the authority of this House, and against an Act signed by the Queen, and to excite them to rebellion against the British Government and the Parliament which will sit in Ireland to manage Irish affairs. That speech is one of the most disgraceful incidents in the connection of the present Government with Ireland. Representing an Orange constituency—for my majority was small and the election was fought in July, when the Orangemen are most excited—and knowing that scenes of turmoil and bloodshed have occurred in the North of Ireland, for I have seen them; and knowing the feelings of the people, I say that if at the next General Election on the July celebration there should be turmoil and bloodshed it will be attributable to the conduct of the Prime Minister of this country and nothing else. It was outrageous and scandalous, and not enough has been made of the speech in this country. The English people do not understand the effect it will have on the minds of the Irish people. It will probably be reprinted and placarded in every Orange lodge, and every Orangeman will know it by heart, and it will be the war cry of the bigots in Ulster at the General Election and at their celebrations. We, however, will not refrain from trying to make the English people understand that whatever turmoil may occur will be the result of that speech of the Prime Minister which incited the people to rise in rebellion against the Queen. I am sorry to have spoken at such length on this point; but it is one in which I am deeply interested, as an Ulster Member, and knowing what I shall have to face at the General Election. Such a speech is calculated to make this talk of guarantees have some weight. If the Prime Minister did not make such speeches, if the Catholics and Protestants were allowed to live quietly without having these memories raked up, there would be no need to talk of guarantees.

in reference to the County Councils or any other Public Bodies in Ireland. The best guarantee that any man can have that under a Nationalist Government in Ireland or under the County Councils the minority will not be interfered with is to be found in the action of certain men in Ireland lately, who have shown that whether men are Protestants, or Catholics, or Presbyterians, or whatever their religion may be, so long as they are good Irishmen, they will not tolerate their being interfered with by ministers of any religion in the exercise of their political rights. If this Bill is passed it can do no good whatever, because it is a mockery, a sham, and a delusion. The Irish people have seen through it—they know it is only an electioneering dodge—it is thoroughly despised by them, and the sooner it is swept out of sight the better, so that the people of this country may see that nothing but National Self-Government, in every particular, will ever satisfy the Irish people and put an end to their agitation.

*(8.45.) MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): The attitude assumed by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House with reference to this Bill is rather peculiar; because, although it moves on the main lines of the English and Scotch Bills—which are at the present time said to be working very well—their attitude to it is one of uncompromising hostility. But it is to be remarked that through all their speeches they never kept to the Bill at all. They wandered away perpetually to the Home Rule question, and on that and that alone they spoke. The right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland distinctly stated that this Bill was no substitute for Home Rule for Ireland—that he had not that question in his mind at all. It was simply a Bill for Local Government which left the Home Rule question entirely untouched, and yet in spite of that declaration hon. Gentlemen hark back perpetually to the Home Rule question. Why is this? Simply, to my mind, because they know that this Bill will materially affect the Home Rule question. If the Bill does not pass, the reason will be owing to the hostility and obstruction of hon. Gentlemen opposite; and if the Bill is stopped by their obstruction and hostility it is very clear it will benefit the Unionist cause in this country, and will damage the Home Rule cause with the electorate of England. Hon. Gentlemen opposite know perfectly well that the battle of Home Rule is to be fought in the constituencies of England. In Ireland, Scotland, and Wales the mind of the electorate is very largely decided on this question, but the English electorate are still very open, and are very willing to be taught in a sensible and fair manner. That being so, hon. Gentlemen feel that if their obstruction is the cause of this Bill not passing, it will be a very strong point made against them with the electors of England. On the other hand, let us suppose that the Bill passes. Then it will either work well or it will work badly. If the County Councils work well, that will be an argument in favour of the Unionist Government that has passed a Bill which is working well. But if the County Councils work badly it will be proof to the electors of this country that the Irish people are not fit for the small measure of local self-government which this Bill gives them, and that, à fortiori, they are not fit for the wide and almost boundless powers which they are claiming under an Irish Parliament. Therefore hon. Members opposite thoroughly recognise that this Bill does affect the question of Home Rule. The indignation that has been poured out on this Bill is something very remarkable. If the Bill took anything whatever from those whom hon. Members are pleased to call the Irish people, then I could understand some measure of indignation. But the Bill does touch those whom hon. Members have ignored in all their speeches—namely, the Unionist minority, whose privileges will be taken away by this Bill, because we know that the Grand Jurors of Ireland are at the present moment nearly all Unionists. And why are the Grand Jurors Unionists? Because the Unionists are the people who possess property, and who are fit to be Grand Jurors. It has been said again and again in the course of this Debate that even the Unionists of Ireland are against this Bill. There never was a greater misstatement of fact than that. During the last twelve months I have travelled through the whole country; I have interviewed Grand Jurors in every county; and I think I can claim, owing to my last year's tour, to have met a larger number of Grand Jurors than any other Member of this House. I found that those who were to be disestablished by this measure were strongly in favour of passing a Local Government Bill. One of those with whom I spoke was a prominent Grand Juror in the County of Tipperary, who told me that by no possible qualification or franchise could any of the members of the Grand Jury of that county be returned to the County Councils. They fully expected that the powers they had exercised, and splendidly exercised, would pass away from them into other hands, and yet they supported the Bill. It has been said by hon. Members that the Bill is a bad Bill. Why, then, do they not help the Government to make it a good Bill? The Government do not claim to be infallible; but they do claim that the Bill is on the same lines as the English and Scotch Bills. How, then, can it be an insult to Ireland? We should like to know what hon. Members opposite really want. The selection of the hon. Member for West Belfast to move the rejection of the Bill was what I may call a bad cast, because it was necessary that the man who did that should be a man of great powers of vituperation and great willingness to use them. To the credit of the hon. Member, I say I do not think that his powers lie in that direction. He tried to grapple with the provisions of the Bill, but he failed to touch or shake any one of them. The gentlemanly instincts of the hon. Member prevented him from being a success at vituperation. His own success prevents him from posing as a martyr. His honesty prevents him from simulating what he does not in the least feel—namely, that he is a martyr, and his good nature prevents him from being indignant at nothing. I did not expect him to bless the Bill; but he ended by cursing it very mildly. The hon. Member said that the Government do not now attempt coercion, because they are afraid of the electors. The real reason is that there is no crime in Ireland to coerce. There have been fifty Coercion Acts in the present century, and thirty-eight of them have been passed by Liberal Governments. In Grattan's Parliament fifty-four were passed in eighteen years, or at the rate of three a year. But how this Bill raises the question of coercion I fail to see. We have been told that if the present Government are retained there will be more shooting down of men in the streets, and taking men to prison. But what would happen if a Liberal Government came into power? Reference has been made to Mitchelstown, where only one man was shot down.

AN hon. MEMBER: Three.

*MR. RENTOUL: Very well, three were shot down under a Conservative Government, but eighteen were shot dead in the streets of Belfast under the last Liberal Government. Then, again, I would point out, in reply to the hon. Member, that the awarding of compensation for malicious injury is not a fiscal business, and therefore it is left to the Grand Jury. It is certainly not a duty I should have cared to discharge when I was a member of the County Council. If the duty ought not to be left with the Grand Jury, a Bill could be brought in to provide another tribunal. This Bill simply takes fiscal business away from the Grand Jury, and leaves to them business which is not fiscal. It is uncharitable to say that Grand Jurymen are saturated with prejudices. It is an undeserved imputation on thousands of men, few of whom can be known to the hon. Member who made it. Nor is it rational to say that because 70,000 Roman Catholics in Belfast are unrepresented in the City Council, that they are, therefore, treated as civil outlaws, any more than it would be to say the same of Protestants living in counties to the South and West of Ireland, where all the representation is in the hands of Catholics.

DR. TANNER (Cork County, Mid): Give us a case.

*MR. RENTOUL: I mean Parliamentary representation. Then, again, as to the illiterate vote, if I were a Home Ruler I would gladly see the illiterate vote abolished. I know the wonderful intelligence of the Irish peasantry, and I am sure they could readily be taught how to mark a ballot paper. It is an insult to them to say that it is necessary for someone to go into the ballot box with them. In South Donegal there were more illiterate voters at the last election than in the whole of Scotland. Now, I know that county very well, and no one could make me believe that anything like a fraction of those who said they were illiterate were really so. I think it would be as well, therefore, to remove the suspicion attaching to the practice, for we believe—and everyone believes—that in Ireland thousands of men are forced to declare themselves illiterate—are made to do so—in order that it may be known how they vote. If a man is suspected of intending to vote for the Unionist, he is ordered to declare himself illiterate, so that thousands of men are forced to tell absolute falsehoods and to say they are illiterate, when they can both read and write perfectly well. The hon. Member for West Belfast does not object to any rational scheme of minority representation; what he objects to is the Tory Lord Lieutenant. But the Lord Lieutenant is not always a Tory, and hon. Members opposite themselves hope that there will not be another Tory Lord Lieutenant for some considerable time; and that the next Lord Lieutenant will be a Liberal; and if that be so, and if the Bill passes, he will probably be the one to apply it to the constituencies. Therefore the objection to the Tory official is not one of much weight. I am sure the hon. Member himself would not assume that a gentleman in the position of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, even if he be a Tory, would manipulate and tinker with the divisions for the County Councils in order to score a point for his Party. Then the hon. Member for West Belfast objects to the Standing Joint Committee, and says, "Why do not you trust us?" My answer is, "Why do not you trust us? How is it you invariably express the extremest distrust with regard to our Grand Juries and Sheriffs?" There is on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite a continual assumption that all Unionists in Ireland are Orangemen. There are only about fifty thousand of them in Ireland, and yet, in the face of that fact, you speak as if all Irish Unionists were Orangemen, and then allude to Orangemen as if they were the most rascally set of men that ever trod the earth. Why do you not trust the Orangemen? The hon. Member next proceeded to speak of the trial by two Judges, and he condemned that procedure. There has been condemnation of that method from both sides of the

Mr. Rentoul

House. I am somewhat surprised at that, and, indeed, I am entirely unable to follow it. The only objection I have to the trial by two Judges is the fear that it might be inoperative altogether—the fear that no twenty men can be got who will petition a Judge for leave to begin these legal proceedings against the County Council, seeing that they would have to give security for the costs. That is a great difficulty in the way of the full operation of this provision. Surely there is not much danger in a tribunal of that kind. In connection with this Bill we have had a speech from the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. Timothy Healy), who commenced with the statement that he had heard the speech of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) a hundred times. I would venture to suggest that there is some element of exaggeration in that statement, for I never heard a speech that kept more closely to the subject. The right hon. Gentleman dealt with the Bill almost page by page, and surely under those circumstances, the estimate of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford is rather strange. I take the hon. and learned Member's assertion as indicating the nature of the whole of the other statement he made. But while that statement carried its absurdity on its own face, there were many other statements made by the same hon. Member which did not show on their faces their own absurdity and incorrectness, because they had reference to a state of facts in Ireland not known to many Members of this House. He said, for example, that the landlord does not himself hold any land. Speaking from my own acquaintance, I say that of all the landlords I know there is not one who does not farm more land than the biggest tenant he has. Therefore the statement of the hon. and learned Member is not true so far as my experience goes. Then the hon. and learned Member said it would be reasonable to abolish Grand Juries altogether. But Grand Juries still exist in England, and, therefore, why should it be an objection to this Bill that it does not remove in Ireland a system which still exists in England? It is perfectly true that Grand Juries are, perhaps, not of much practical value as regards their criminal functions, and that there would be no material loss if they were abolished. Still, the summoning of the Grand Juries is a nice and pleasant ceremony, and such duties as Grand Jurors have to perform could not be performed better by any other body of men. The hon. and learned Member said that what was wanted in Ireland was a system to improve the land and the breeding of cattle. That is perfectly true, but one might just as well suggest that those matters should be brought within the scope of an Education Bill. They are subjects for distinct legislation. The hon. Member says it is the majority who pay the rates; but it is perfectly well known that in many cases the large proportion of the rates is paid by a few people. I was recently examining one barony in which there were 2,600 electors, and more than half of the rates were paid by thirty-five. In the case of the vast number of electors their rates were only something like fourpence or sixpence in the pound. And if the minority pay the rates they are, therefore, in need of protection against expenditure which would have no appreciable effect on the small ratepayers, but would be a considerable burden on the others. The hon. and learned Member finished his speech by saying that if Ireland is to be pacified we must give her a decent Bill without restrictions. Ireland is pacified, and there would remain no need for restrictions if this Government were to always remain in power. But if a Liberal Government were to come into power there might again be turbulence, and hence the necessity for restriction. The hon. Member for North Fermanagh (Mr. W. Redmond) said that the Irish people did not want this Bill; but I know that in the main the whole Unionist population of Ireland are more anxious about this Bill than about any other legislation for the past ten years, and in all the counties of Ireland I have only met one Grand Juror who was not in favour of it. The hon. Member said it was not wanted in his constituency; but it is a curious fact that that was the one constituency to which I was asked to go and speak in favour of Local Government last September, as most of the people were in favour of it. The one word that stood prominent in all the Opposition speeches was the word "insult"; but it has been used without in any case showing wherein the insult existed. The insults are the restrictions placed upon the full and complete liberty of the County Councils. Now, are there not the same kind of insults being shown to Members of this House, and are not these the result of certain actions of the Irish Nationalists? Is it not a fact that we cannot now bring a friend into the Member's Lobby without obtaining an order? That is an insult, and what has caused it? Dynamite in this House. Again, a gentleman comes to see me at the Law Courts, and he has a bag in his hands. He is stopped at the door, and a policeman examines it. That is a deep insult to my friend. What brought it about? Again I have to say—dynamite. These insults are being offered to people in this country because of scenes that have taken place in the past. Now, have not scenes taken place in Ireland in the past? Gentlemen opposite have been challenged to say they want a Bill without any restrictions or safeguards, but not one of them has done so. But they say, "We want you to show that you trust us." Personally, I do trust them and the Roman Catholics of Ireland, because I have never been a Gladstonian, and it is those who followed Mr. Gladstone who have never trusted the Roman Catholics. They have been taught not to trust them by two pamphlets called Vaticanism and The Vatican Decrees. I have never believed in those pamphlets, and I have only read small portions of them. If there is any distrust of Ireland at all, it is on the part of those who have been trained along the lines of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). The hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) said the other night that he trusted the Parnellites. Now, when he has got so far, it is possible, though difficult to conceive, that at some very remote date he might trust the Anti-Parnellites. But there is now a growing tendency among all sections in Ireland to trust one another, although sometimes things happen which make people a little distrustful for the time being. When I was in Sligo a short time ago I was told a story which no doubt some hon. Members opposite are familiar with. One night the pillars of the priest's house in Sligo were injured and his gate broken, and immediately the windows of all the Protestants in the town were broken, as well as those of a Roman Catholic doctor who was known to sympathise with the Protestants. The Catholics seemed to have jumped to the conclusion that it must have been a Protestant who did the injury; but the fact was, it was done by a Roman Catholic who was drunk, and he afterwards confessed that that was the case. When, however, the Catholics found that they were in the wrong, a contribution was levied among their own party to pay for the broken windows, and they made the Roman Catholic doctor, whose windows had also been smashed, contribute to the fund, but they did not repair his windows. As a Catholic he was obliged to subscribe, but not being a Protestant he could not have his windows repaired. This illustration will show how rapidly Roman Catholics jump to the conclusion that if anything bad is done a Protestant is the guilty party. You see they do not trust us in the manner they should do. Now, in the last place, I wish to refer to the speech of the hon. Member for South Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce). He condemned the Bill because it did not square with five tests that he applied to it. His first test is that it should be similar to the English and Scotch Bills. Now, I will venture to say that this Bill is as like to the Scotch Bill as the English Bill is. It cannot be similar to both the English and the Scotch, as they are different from each other. Therefore, his first test is an absurdity. The second test is that the Bill ought to satisfy Ireland. Well, if the hon. Member could produce a measure dealing with Local Government, or any other question in Ireland, which would satisfy anything more than a section of the Irish people, he would deserve a statue in brass to be erected to his memory in the Lobby of this House. The third test is that it should pacify Ireland. But you do not know whether it will or not until it is tried. His fourth test is that it should cause the Local Authorities to work in harmony with the Central Authorities. Well, we believe it will have that result if it becomes law. The hon. Member's last test is that it should be so framed as to teach the people to govern themselves. I think it is so framed, and that it is very likely, having local self-government, the Irish people would learn to govern themselves, not in a Parliament in Dublin, which they will never get, but in County Councils all over the country. I have the greatest possible desire to see this Bill passed into law, and I earnestly hope there is nothing whatever in the jokes made across the floor of this House that the Bill is going to be dropped. Speaking on behalf of a great number of Unionists in Ireland, I can safely say that they are more anxious for this Bill to be passed than they were for the Land Act of last year, and I think the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) was quite right when he said that the First Lord of the Treasury made too little of the Bill. I hope that hon. Members opposite will allow the Second Reading of this Bill to be speedily passed, and then set themselves seriously to work to make it a good Bill, and one that will be a benefit to Ireland.

(9.39.) MR. KNOX (Cavan. W.): The hon. Member considers, no doubt, that he has sufficient evidence to support the statement he has made with reference to the feeling of the Unionists in Ireland on this Bill. It may be the case that there are Unionists in Ireland who are in favour of the Bill, but all I can say is that they take great pains to conceal that feeling. Can hon. Members opposite produce one single resolution of any Public Body which, by the most liberal interpretation, could be said to give a welcome to the measure? The only resolutions I have seen passed by Ulster bodies about it seemed to condemn it. When hon. Members say that Ulster is in favour of this Bill, we must assume that, to some extent, their judgment is coloured by the interests of their Party in England, and by the feeling that, if this great crowning measure of Unionist administration is openly flouted by every Party in Ireland, the Unionist administration is not likely to be renewed. Nationalist Members who address the House on this Bill are open to the disadvantage of being sneered at by a handful of Members opposite, representing a section of Ulster, for their want of knowledge of the Grand Jury system. The hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) has sneered at the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), and has alleged that he has no sufficient knowledge of Local Government in Ireland to enable him to address this House on that subject. I ask the House if there could be a more sweeping and severe condemnation of the whole system of Local County Government in Ireland—as it has hitherto existed—than that allegation, if it were true? But instead of it being the case that the hon. Member for West Belfast has no knowledge of local administration in Ireland, he has great knowledge, because for several years in succession he practically managed the affairs of the Municipality of Dublin, which collects in rates every year as much as any six of the largest counties in Ireland, and my hon. Friend has also carried through—as head of the Corporation of Dublin—a large scheme for the consolidation of the debt of the city in a way that even Unionists in Dublin admit did him great credit. I think it is going too far when the hon. Member for South Antrim—because, owing to certain hereditary privileges, he has had the honour of sitting on a certain number of Grand Juries—comes here and discounts the statements of the Member for West Belfast. Now, we say that this Bill does not propose to establish a system of Local Government in Ireland which can by any possibility be made to work. What is the first necessity for a workable system of County Government? I apprehend that hon. Members on both sides of the House will acknowledge that any system to work satisfactorily must be simple. The areas must be simple and the bodies elected must not be too numerous. It would be idle to deny that there are great difficulties in the way of carrying out a system of popular County Government in Ireland. The leisured class are, for the most part, in opposition to the people. Distances also are great; and in spite of what we have heard about the light railways, I am sure the Chief Secretary would be the last man to deny that the difficulty of getting to many county towns in Ireland is considerable. Yet the Government appear to have deliberately designed a Bill which will give the greatest possible amount of trouble to all concerned. We have at the present time several local divisions in Ireland. The county is sub-divided into Baronies, and the Poor Law Unions are sub-divided into electoral divisions, and already there is a considerable amount of confusion. Yet the Government have proposed to set up electoral divisions, which may be carried out by the Lord Lieutenant without regard to the existing areas, and merely to suit the existing exigencies of the Unionist Party. Hon. Members opposite say we should not attribute these mean motives to high officials. But these mean things are done. As a case in point, I need only refer to County Cavan. For the election of a matron of one of the Unions in that county there was a tie, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland deliberately appointed several non-resident Justices as ex officio members in order to turn that election, and the result was that they put in a matron of their own way of thinking. We therefore know perfectly well that unless this House gives strict directions to the Lord Lieutenant he will divide up these divisions with regard to the electoral views of the agents of the Unionist Party. Fresh sanitary areas are also to be formed, for which I cannot see there is any necessity, and these may also be quite distinct from the Baronies and Unions. When all this is done we shall have several conflicting units of administration in Ireland, and there will also be a vast number of authorities. The Grand Jury, too, is still to exist as the fiscal authority for some purposes; it is still to deal with malicious injuries, and such matters as that. Then there is to be the County Council, and also the Standing Joint Committee, where representatives of the County Council and of the Grand Jury are to meet under the headship of that impartial man for whom we are all looking, and whom nobody has yet suggested—to fight out the questions about which the County Council and the Grand Jury differ. Fourthly, there are to be Baronial Councils; fifthly, Boards of Guardians; and, sixthly, Sanitary Committees, which are to be entirely distinct from the Boards of Guardians. Imagine the position of an unfortunate rural voter in Ireland. Here is a man whose illiteracy, if we may believe hon. Gentlemen opposite, is perfectly terrible, and who is so miserably poor that he ought not to be allowed any determining control over the affairs of the county, and yet he is expected to keep his eye on all these bodies who manage his affairs for him, and who may very possibly meet in different towns. If the Government had deliberately endeavoured to design a machinery which was most likely to produce jobbery, they could not have produced a measure more likely to secure that end. We know the difficulty of working any system of Local Government, and the Government seem to have set themselves deliberately to increase the difficulties of the situation. Take for instance the matter of building a bridge. If it falls down or is carried away it must be rebuilt, but before it can be rebuilt there has to be a tortuous procedure which commences with an application to the Baronial Council—a body which meets eight times in the year—by two cess-payers. The application must be considered and approved by the Baronial Council, and the County Surveyor is directed to prepare plans. After this the Council, have to meet and accept tenders. The fourth step is that the Finance Committee of the County Council has to consider the proposal. The fifth is the County Council has to consider the application, and the Standing Joint Committee come in for the sixth step. The whole proceedings so far can be traversed in the High Court in Dublin, as a Judge of Assize is not good enough to give a decision under the new system. The last step, number eight, is that the Local Government Board in London has to give its consent to the loan. I venture to say that that is not a simple and workable system. Next we have to discuss what are the powers which the various bodies will exercise and what are the safeguards. With respect to the safeguards which are imposed on the Standing Joint Committees, the Member for West Birmingham said, on the authority of a person whom he did not name, but who, I believe, was the Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney), that ninety-seven per cent. of the expenditure of the County Councils would be beyond the control of the Standing Joint Committees. That statement was absolutely preposterous, and one which ought not to have been made without an inquiry into the facts; and made as it was by the Member for West Birmingham, it was calculated to mislead the House. I think I can give the genesis of this peculiar fallacy. The Member for South Antrim, when he addressed the House, took the figures for the County of Tyrone, and stated—I dare say correctly—what was the amount spent on new roads and bridges in that county, and from that county he took an average for the whole of Ireland, and so arrived at the conclusion that the total amount spent was £19,000. Anyone who knows anything of Local Government anywhere must have seen that the statement was preposterous and absurd on the face of it, and one would not have supposed that the Member for West Birmingham would have been so easily gulled. Indeed, I do not suppose he would have been gulled if he had desired to inquire very accurately into the facts. But there was no difficulty in getting at the actual figures, which have been published in a Parliamentary Return. I may say that the amount spent on roads and bridges has been less in recent years owing to the fact that the landlords have ceased to take an interest in the improvement in their property, even at the expense of some one else; but last year the amount spent, according to the Parliamentary Return, on roads and bridges was £50,000. These figures were accessible to the Members for South Antrim and West Birmingham, but instead of taking them they preferred to mislead the House by striking an average from a single county. The amount levied in the form of county cess is £1,172,000 a year, and of that £284,000 is absolutely peremptory, including the payments for prisons and lunatic asylums and repayments of debt. That leaves a balance of something like £888,000. Of that £50,000 is expenditure on roads and bridges, and that is not all capital expenditure, because it may include amounts for altering and widening as well as for building. Further, there is a sum of £99,000 a year spent in salaries, and this I contend is clearly beyond the control of the County Council, because that body will not have the power to raise the salary of a single official. Then it is difficult to trace all the expenditure of the Grand Juries, but I think at the very lowest estimate, after giving every doubtful point to the friends of this Bill, there will be about thirty per cent. of the expenditure over which the County Council will have no control, and which will be entirely in the hands of the Standing Joint Committee, and it is perhaps needless to add that that thirty per cent. includes all the expenditure with reference to which there would be any difference of opinion. When any new work is proposed with reference to which there can be any discretion, the control of the Standing Joint Committee comes in. The hon. Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit) has seen the absurdity of the proposal, and if he had been on the Treasury Bench, and had drawn up this Bill, I daresay we should have been found voting in favour of it. Can you imagine a more fruitful source of friction than this question of the control of capital expenditure? If I were a member of the Irish Bar I should be strongly tempted to support this Bill, and if this Bill passes I congratulate my brethren of the Irish Bar on the prospect of a large harvest of fees which will undoubtedly come to them as the result of litigation on this subject. At the same time that the Standing Joint Committees have these enormous powers the Grand Juries keep the powers with respect to malicious injuries. At Presentment Sessions they are discussed in the presence of the associated cesspayers, and though a Grand Jury does sometimes pass a presentment for malicious injury in spite of it not having been approved by the Baronial Session, that is an unusual course. The Government have entirely removed this preliminary inquiry from the control of the cesspayers, and the only inquiry is that before the Grand Jury, and that is beyond the power of question except by traverse. You have a certain amount of popular control in the Presentment Session, but so objectionable is popular control to the right hon. Gentleman that he has entirely abolished it. I think it would have been better to abolish presentment for malicious injury altogether. The Government has been careful to preserve the power to the wealthy and intelligent of getting large sums for the cesspayers by fraud and perjury by reserving the power of compensation for malicious injury mainly in the hands of the landed gentry. As to the cumulative vote, I do not object to it from its Party effect, but because I believe it will introduce bad government in Ireland. The rural ratepayer will have to go in and choose ten, or, in the case of Baronial Council, fifteen members at a time, many of whom will be unknown to him even by name, and to distribute his ten or fifteen votes among them. The right hon. Gentleman could not have devised a better system by which rural affairs could be put into the hands of a clique wire-pullers. Twenty years' experience of School Board elections show that very careful management is required to prevent the majority being outvoted by a better organised minority, and the same careful management will be required in Ireland. Under the ordinary law in Ireland there would be all the safeguards that exist in England—certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, the control of the Local Government Board, and of the auditors. There would also be the safeguards which exist in the Irish law—the right of traverse, and the peculiar Irish law as to valuation, which puts it out of the power of any Local Authority to change the valuation at all. But, with all these, the Government has deliberately designed other unnecessary safeguards in order to render the scheme unworkable, to render it abortive as a Bill for the good government of Ireland, to introduce friction into every county, and to set class against class. If the Bill were amended by the acceptance of all the Amendments which have been suggested by the hon. Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit) and others of more liberal thought on either side of the House it might make a fairly good measure; but though the hope of amendment may be held out on the Second Reading, that hope would be disappointed if ever the Bill came to Committee. It never will get into Committee. We object to the Bill because it is bad, it is unworkable, and because it is an attempt to delude the voters of England and Ireland into thinking that the promises of the Government have been carried into effect; while as a matter of fact, if the Bill were passed, it would only increase the difficulties of government in Ireland, and do no manner of good to any single human being from North to South or East to West.

(10.12.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): There is one thing I am glad to have noticed during the course of the Debate—that no attempt has been made to prove that during the past Irish Grand Juries have in any sense misappropriated public money. Allegations have been made that they have recklessly expended public money by the hon. Member who has just sat down, but he took care not to offer any proof of the statement. Having acted as foreman of the Grand Jury of my county for many years, I most distinctly state that the allegations are absolutely devoid of any shadow of foundation.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I will give proofs if you like.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I was struck during the Debate by the number of different points of view from which Irishmen view the same question. The speeches of the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) and of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) may be taken as specimen speeches of those delivered on the opposite side of the House. I regret that my absence prevented me hearing the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast; I am sorry that my presence in the House enabled me to hear that of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, whom I cannot congratulate on his attack on the Government Bill. He, however, made one remarkable statement. Among the many accusations he brought against the Bill he said—

"This Bill was an unhappy effort on the part of the Government to satisfy fifteen million Irishmen in all parts of the world."

I am at a loss to know when it became a habit of Governments in this country to try to satisfy those who are not subjects of the Crown. I know that speeches have been made by distinguished Members opposite pointing out the grave effects of offending Irishmen on the other side of the Atlantic, but I do not believe that line of argument—which is the argument of a craven—will ever be popular with any political party in Great Britain, whether Radical or Tory. The hon. Gentleman suggested that the Government should have considered the feelings of gentlemen on the other side of the Atlantic, at which I do not wonder. These Irishmen have ceased to be subjects of the Crown, or never were subjects of the Crown, and have openly avowed their hostility to this country, and have been the main source of the sinews of war to hon. Gentlemen opposite, but the source is now

dried up. Therefore, no doubt, in considering a Bill of this kind, brought in by the Government with a view to doing justice to the Irish people, it is the duty of hon. Gentlemen opposite to consider what effect the acceptance of such a Bill would have on their supporters in America and elsewhere. But I do not see that it is an objection to the Bill that in the mind of the hon. Member for North-East Cork it fails in that direction. I should say it is rather one of the beauties of the Bill that it utterly ignores everybody except those whom it is intended to benefit by it. It has been asserted that this Bill is a substitute for a Home Rule Bill. It is no more a substitute for a Home Rule Bill than is the Bann Drainage Bill. The Bill is brought in by the Government, and I hope will be passed by the Government—it may not be this Session, but that depends on the action of hon. Gentlemen opposite—but no doubt the Leader of the House will consider the statement of the hon. Member for North East Cork that he would let the Bill pass if the Government would give a Dissolution. I hope the Government will take him at his word, pass the Bill, and then go to the country, and I have no doubt the Government would then return to carry on the government of this country in the future. It is dangerous to be certain on this point. Hon. Gentlemen opposite believe the tide has turned, but it has not yet set in with such alarming velocity as they would have us believe. But if the Bill does not pass—and I earnestly hope it will—it will indicate to the country the kind of Bill the next Unionist Government will bring in and pass for the benefit of Ireland. I read the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast carefully, for I knew, from his ability and eloquence, he would place before the House very clearly what he thought to be the main weaknesses of the Bill and why it should be rejected. But when I read the speech of the hon. Member I thought he must have been dreaming. He made this remarkable statement—

"The state of Ireland was on all fundamental points exactly the same as it was when the Coercion Act was passed."

If I thought that was true I should join with hon. Gentlemen opposite in opposing the Bill, for I believe, Sir, that one point we should take into consideration—quite apart from the details of the Bill—is: Is Ireland in a fit state to benefit by the Bill? If Ireland is in the same state as it was five or six years ago, I should say Ireland is the most unfit country in Europe for the Bill. I may say I thought the hon. Gentleman must have been dreaming. He must have thought that the Land League was in full force. Where is the Land League, I should like to know; this organisation which was to destroy all before it, and smash down all opposition? It is gone; it has become a thing of the past, and no longer exists. He must have thought that the Plan of Campaign was in existence. What has happened to the Plan of Campaign? What has happened to the O'Brien Arcade? All these things have vanished and disappeared. The O'Brien Arcade at present belongs to my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Smith Barry). I believe also the hon. Member for West Belfast must have thought that he was still speaking for a united Party? Where is the union of that Party? Buried in the grave of Mr. Parnell. The hon. Member must have believed that the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon)—I do not know whether he is on speaking terms with the hon. Member for East Mayo—but, at any rate, he must have thought that the hon. Member for East Mayo is still going about the country inciting the Irish people to deeds of violence, as he did on former occasions. Well, perhaps that may be thought a strong statement for me to make, that the hon. Member for East Mayo incited the Irish people to deeds of violence; and if I am corrected for saying so, I can only justify myself by saying that I am using the exact language that the hon. Member for East Mayo used the other day in speaking of an hon. Gentleman who used to be his friend, the Member for Waterford. He accused the hon. Member for Waterford of “inciting to deeds of violence,” because, as a leader, he had failed to condemn those deeds of violence; and, therefore, he was guilty of every one of them. Now, that is exactly what we always said of the hon. Member for East Mayo. And if the hon. Member for East Mayo could go about the country, just as he did, inciting the Irish people to deeds of violence and intimidation, I should join with hon. Members opposite in opposing this Bill. I should say that a Bill of this kind, which was brought in under those conditions, would be an unmitigated curse to Ireland. I consider that a Local Government Bill in my mind would be far more dangerous under those circumstances than a Home Rule Bill. And I think so for this reason: It would be harder to destroy a Local Government Bill, no matter how bad it might be; and the very points which the hon. Member for West Belfast singled out as defects, and which caused him to condemn the Bill, are the very points which cause me to defend and accept it. I think it was the hon. Member for North Longford, or perhaps it was the hon. Member for North East Cork—yes, it was the hon. Member for North East Cork—who challenged any Ulster Member to get up and say that he really supported this Bill. And he went on to say after that that the Ulster minority differed very much on many of these grave points. That is true. I quite admit that there is the same amount of difference between the Ulster Loyalists as there is between the Tories in this country. They differ very often on the land question; they differ on other points; but there is one good thing, at any rate, that hon. Gentlemen opposite have involuntarily done for our country, and it is this: that they have welded into one solid whole the Ulster Loyalists. Although we may differ on some grave political points, we are absolutely at one upon the great point, and that is that we should never permit hon. Gentlemen opposite to rule over us. We are quite at one in favour of this Bill. My constituents have spoken to me often on this subject, and they are as much in favour of a County Government Bill as British electors have been in favour of it in England and Scotland; but what they impressed upon me is this, that however much they desired a County Government for the sake of themselves and the administration of their county affairs, they never would consent voluntarily to accept a County Government Bill which would injure their brethren in the South and West of Ireland. There is one thing which they are determined on, at any rate in Ulster, and that is to stand by every Loyalist between Cape Clear and the Giant's Causeway. I support this Bill because I think the Government in framing this measure have successfully fulfilled a very difficult task. The task they had to perform, and that they have fulfilled, was this: they had to give popular control over county affairs without giving Ireland a Bill which might be used as an engine by the majority to oppress the Unionist minority. One reason why the hon. Member for West Belfast opposes this Bill is that it takes away the power of presentment for malicious injuries from the County Councils, and gives it to the Grand Jury.

MR. SEXTON: You could not take away from them what they never had.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Well, perhaps I dropped an inaccurate phrase. I mean to say that the hon. Member complains that the Bill does not propose to give that power to the County Councils.

MR. SEXTON: I do not complain that it does not give that power to the County Councils, but that it has been left to the Grand Jury.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I venture to point out that if the power of presentment for malicious injuries was left to the County Councils in Ireland the position of the minority in the South and West would be absolutely untenable. We know perfectly well what was meant, when the Land League was in full force, by making a man uncomfortable, as the hon. Member for East Mayo phrased it. One of the ways employed was to maim and destroy his cattle; that was the ordinary way by which the Land League enforced its laws. The only safeguard they had in the South and West was that they could recover for malicious injuries before the Grand Jury; and undoubtedly that had a great effect in preventing the recurrence of these crimes, and rendering them at any rate less common. If the power of presentment for malicious injuries were granted to popular bodies in Ireland, especially if hon. Gentlemen opposite had the misfortune to have that power, with the "village ruffian" again upon the scene, when the Land League had again been put in force, and if the County Councils were under popular government and under the control of the Nationalist Party, there might be at any moment a general massacre of all the cattle in the South and West of Ireland. (Laughter.) It is not a laughing matter, but it may be a laughing matter to hon. Members opposite because they do not possess any cattle. I venture to say it would place the Irish Loyalists, the Irish minority, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant—for we make no difference in point of religion—it would place them absolutely at the mercy of the majority; and I say that this is one of the best things about this Bill. One of the good things about it is that it takes away, or will take away when it is passed, the power of presentment for malicious injuries from the County Councils. That is one of the reasons why the hon. Member for West Belfast objected to this Bill. There was another reason, and perhaps this was his greatest reason, because this Bill takes away the control of the police from the County Councils. It does not propose to confer on the County Councils the control of the police. The control of the police will remain as it is at present. I venture to point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite that if the County Councils in Ireland had got control of the police, the people who would suffer most would be the hon. Gentlemen themselves. I venture to ask the hon. Member for Mid Cork who visited Cork the other day, what would have happened in that city if the police in Cork had been under the control of the Local Authority. The hon. Members never would have escaped with their lives out of the City of Cork, and they only did escape with their lives under the protection of the police and the soldiers.

DR. TANNER: And the Tory High Sheriff.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I would ask the House to remember the election in Waterford. If the police had been under the control of the hon. Member for Waterford, what would have happened to the hon. Member for North-East Cork, the hon. Member for East Mayo, and their friend Mr. Davitt? If the Bill were so framed that the police were to be under the control of the County Councils, I venture to say that there is not a constituency in Ireland in which the hon. Member for North Longford could make a speech without danger to his life. I do not think the hon. Member for North Longford would be safe anywhere except on the English side of the Kish Light. Therefore, I think that one of the reasons why the hon. Member for West Belfast condemns the Bill is one of the virtues of the Bill, and one of those parts of the Bill that in their own interest, I believe, hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to think twice before they rejected. Each of the leaders of the Party would want to get command of the police; but how would it be with the others? In supporting this Bill, I say that the defects which the hon. Member has discovered in this Bill are, to my mind, its chief virtues. I speak, I think, in the name—in fact, I do speak in the name of the most powerful section of the Irish people. I have the right, without arrogance, to say that at the present moment there is no Irishman in this House who speaks in the name of as powerful a section of the Irish people as I do myself. I will test it. I venture to say there is no hon. Member below the Gangway who dare get up—who has the audacity to get up—and say that he speaks in the name of the Irish people, because he would at once run the certain danger of being contradicted by the Gentleman who sits beside him. I speak in the name of a minority, but at any rate it is an absolutely united minority. We do not spend our time in fighting for the plunder of journals in Dublin. When my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham expressed the hope that they might be able to find a Chairman of a dispassionate mind, he was at once received by signs of amazement from hon. Gentlemen from Ireland below the Gangway. Why, Sir, they have spent a week in Ireland trying to get a Chairman, and the Member for East Mayo, when a Chairman was proposed, said, “Fair play from a man who is under the direct influence of Mr. Healy!” The idea of fair play from a Chairman who is a sympathiser with the Member for Longford was a thing that the hon. Member for East Mayo absolutely derided. No wonder hon. Gentlemen opposite treated with derision the idea of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, that it was possible in Ireland to obtain a dispassionate Chairman. I support this Bill because I do not despair at all of the future of Ireland. I believe that without Home Rule, which I believe in our time we shall never see, there are all the elements of future prosperity in Ireland. I think the most sanguine Unionist six years ago never could have imagined in his wildest dreams that Ireland would be as peaceful, as prosperous, and as contented as she is now. The hon. Member for West Belfast in his speech said if the Government were returned we would have a repetition of all the horrors of the past—of Mitchelstown and Tullamore. There are no signs of it now. There is not a single patriot in gaol.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: It is you who have changed.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: We hear nothing of coercion, with which hon. Gentlemen tried to arouse the feelings and sympathies of the English people.

AN HON. MEMBER: We succeeded.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I do not know whether you have or not; the next Election will test that. We hear no more about coercion now. If it existed then it exists still; but it rests with a light hand upon the Irish people that there is at the present moment under the Act not one single subject of Her Majesty in prison. In view of the condition of Ireland under the present resolute government of the Unionist Party, I say we have every confidence that the Irish people are not incorrigibly hostile to British rule, and that they will be able to appreciate the effort which Her Majesty's Government are now making in this Bill to give them the same measure of justice which they have given to England and to Scotland. And I earnestly hope that at the next Election the British people will reply by sending back a Unionist majority; and having learned from six years of resolute government how Ireland has been made a peaceful and happy country will enable Lord Salisbury and his colleagues to finish the other fourteen.

*(10.40.) SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I do not know whether the Government attach very much value to the defence of their Bill made by the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh. The hon. and gallant Member on this occasion has made very much the same speech as he has made upon every Irish question that has been before the House during the last six years. The taunts which he has directed at hon. Gentlemen who are immediately opposite him are precisely those which have been his sermon on whatever text was before the House at the time. But when I pass from what he said about the state of Ireland to what he said about the Bill, I doubt whether the Government could have been very well satisfied with the defence he made. I took down very carefully the substance of all that he said with regard to the Bill; and what were the arguments he used? In the first place, he began with a panegyric on Grand Juries as they are at present constituted, very much as we remember some county Members in the Debate on the English County Government Bill began by praising Quarter Sessions; and then, after a prolonged interval that was taken up entirely by attacks upon hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite him, he again referred to the Bill, and praised it for two reasons, and two reasons only. One was that the Bill did not give the power of dealing with malicious injuries to the new County Councils; the other, that the Bill did not give the control of the police to these new bodies. I ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman whether it would not have been a cheaper and a shorter way if the Government, in order to earn his panegyrics, had brought in no Bill at all, because then the control of the police would equally have rested outside the County Councils, and malicious injuries would still have been dealt with by Grand Juries. The hon. and gallant Member, even, could not give any animation to this Debate. It is a Debate on a foregone conclusion. I suppose there is no Member in this House, on either side, who believes that the first clause of this Bill will ever pass through Committee. Now, during this Session the Government have largely taken the time of Private Members. ("No!") Well, I think they have; at any rate, they have taken it tolerably freely. The consequence is, that Private Members are obliged to allow their abstract Resolutions to give way to Public Business; but here we have a Bill which is nothing more or less than an abstract Resolution, with this difference: that whereas an abstract Resolution brought forward by a Private Member takes a night or half a night, this Bill must in decency take four nights, because it is the great measure of the Session, and whereas at the worst Private Members waste a night here or a night there, the Government have wasted a Session. But we are bound to take this Bill of the Government just as seriously as if it was a serious measure. Towards this the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has brought a very valuable contribution. Nobody can deny, who listened to his speech, that it was a speech of very great power; and when I say that it did everything but raise the debating reputation of the right hon. Gentleman, I think I am paying the greatest compliment in my power. But in the whole course of that speech there was nothing that surprised me more than that he was able to keep his countenance so very well. There is one reason for discussing this measure as a reality. This is not a Debate for the House of Commons, but for the country at the General Election. The object is to enable the Government to say that, having carried through their Irish policy, having given us the Criminal Law Amendment Act, the Irish Purchase Bill, the Light Railways Bill, and the Drainage Bills, they are now putting the crown on their policy by giving a broad and generous measure of self-government to Ireland. On the other hand, it will be said that those whom the measure was intended to benefit have captiously, and fractionously, and ungratefully thrown it back in the teeth of the Government, and that they have been supported by the Liberal Party. As regards those whom the measure was intended to benefit—that is to say, the Irish Members—they have, I think, been able to hold their own in this Debate. No one who listened to the speech in which the hon. Member for West Belfast battered and pulverised the position that this was a real concession to Ireland will need anything more to explain to him why Irishmen vote as they are going to vote. But it is necessary that something should be said by Liberals on this side of the Channel likewise in order to prove—which I think it will be very easy to prove—that we look on this Bill as a measure of a fatal and most dangerous sort, a measure which professes to make a final and complete settlement of a great question; but which really leaves it in such an unsatisfactory state, and deals with it in such a partial manner, as only to offer us disappointment in the present, and, if it is passed, disturbance and disorder in the future. I go at once to the contested question of Clause 5. It is very curious, indeed, to see how the Member for West Birmingham would treat this clause, and it was with a certain amount of surprise that I found that he went in heartily to defend it. I want to say a few words on the speech made two days ago by the hon. and learned Gentleman whom I see opposite. The Attorney General, if he will remember his speech, endeavoured to enlist all of us who sat upon this Bench in support of this clause by quoting certain passages from our previous speeches. I will only deal with the passage which he quoted from mine, and if he will allow me I will read it again. It is quite true that in April, 1886, I used the words which the Attorney General quoted, and I used other words as well. This was on the subject of the Local Government Bill which I shadowed forth as what ought to be given to Ireland—

“In the interests both of Ireland and of the British taxpayer,” I said, “I would make freely-elected Irish Local Bodies responsible for education—higher, middle, and lower; for the superintendence of Local Government; for poor relief, and for what is called the development of the resources of Ireland in every respect.”

That, I think, is a pretty large allowance of Local Government. Then I went on to say—

“To all these bodies I would allot with a generous hand, once for all, their share of the produce of taxation, so as to make them responsible for the local finances of Ireland; and what is required over and above should be raised by local taxation. To these bodies should be given full power over local taxation, but they should have no executive power over the incidence of local taxation, or over valuation or assessment, in order that injustice should not be done indirectly between class and class.”

Well, Sir, on this ground the right hon. and learned Gentleman claimed my support in favour of Clause 5; but how can he claim any such thing? In the first place, there is no fear whatever of County Councils doing any injustice with regard to valuation, because they have no power over it. The valuation in Ireland is not under this Bill, nor in any previous Act, committed, as it is in England, to Assessment Committees and to Boards of Justices. It is managed entirely by the Government Office in Dublin. The valuation of a county, as everyone knows, is entirely the business of the Central Government; and as for assessment, the new County Councils will be surrounded by the most ample safeguards, which will give the cess-payers full power of appeal to the Quarter Sessions, and eventually to the High Court in case of injustice being done. But by Clause 5 of this Bill on the top of these safeguards a new provision is superinduced, and the County Councils may be brought before a tribunal in case they are charged with corruption, malversation, or oppression. I am not speaking as a lawyer, but as a layman; but I am satisfied that what I am now saying is just. Where penalties are to be inflicted, the law does not deal in generalities; it requires certain definite charges to be made against the accused parties. No man in this country is sent to prison on a general charge of dishonesty, but because he has obtained goods or money on fraudulent pretences. No man is sent to prison for cruelty, but for assaulting with intent to injure. But under Clause 5 a man, representing the views of the majority of the people of Ireland, may be brought before a tribunal composed of Judges, not a single one of whom holds the opinion of that majority, on a general charge of malversation, of dishonesty or oppression, which may be brought against him for political reasons. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham has spoken of the oppression and the personal injustice that have been charged against various Local Bodies in Ireland, and he has asserted that no fewer than ten Boards of Guardians were dissolved in Ireland during the time I held the office of Chief Secretary. I have not inquired into the matter, but I think that the right hon. Gentleman has considerably exaggerated the number. But, at any rate, the Boards of Guardians referred to were dissolved on quite different charges. They were dissolved because they did not carry out duties that were imposed upon them by Statute, which says that if the regular meetings of Boards of Guardians are not held at the times fixed, and the duties of such Boards are not effectually discharged as required, the Local Government may have power to dissolve them. They cannot be dissolved for any other reason. It is the same with School Boards in this country, to which the right hon. Gentleman did not refer. If such Boards refuse to levy a rate, and refuse to build schools, then they can be pronounced to be in default, and may be dissolved. It is a very different matter, however, when you come to these vague political charges against the County Councils in the future. Some hon. Members have said that we ought at once to dismiss the Bill because it is not accepted by the majority of the Irish Representatives. That may be so or not, but it is rather high doctrine. I prefer to say that I should like to see what the Irish people ask for from a Local Government Bill. I think that they ask for two things: first, free and full management of their local affairs; and, secondly, that they should be able to get rid of every shred of the old system of ascendancy in local affairs. But this Bill is an ascendancy Bill in almost every line. It does not give free admission to all people—irrespective of class, of creed, or of politics—to the management of their local affairs. In proof of that I may mention the cumulative vote, which has been introduced into this Bill for the very purpose of protecting minorities.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Hear, hear!

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: The cumulative vote, however, is applied to the counties, not to boroughs. Why is it not applied to the boroughs? Not on account of the Protestant minority. The Protestant minorities want no protection in the towns of Ireland, for in those towns in which there is a majority of Roman Catholics the Protestants have their fair share of representation on the Town Councils and of posts in the borough administration. This is, however, not the case in one or two places where there is a Protestant majority, and notably in Belfast, where the system of religious ascendancy is continued, and where the Roman Catholics, though forming a large proportion of the population, are excluded from all local representation and control. Then there is the question of the municipal vote; for while the broadest franchise has been generously extended to the boroughs of Ireland, one great exception has been made in the case of the City of Dublin, where the old ascendancy is still maintained in the municipal vote in the interests of one class. What reason has been given for this exception? It is that Dublin has a special Act of its own. That is a lawyer's reason; it is not a House of Commons' reason. It is not a political reason, and it is not a reason which the people can understand for the purpose of retaining the state of things under which, in the Municipality of Dublin, a few thousands vote at the municipal elections, whereas some 40,000 voters take part in the Parliamentary election. Then we have the question of the illiterate votes. The abolition of the illiterate vote is made quite confessedly. I heard the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Barton), and on this subject he was very full and frank. It is unquestionably meant to injure one party only, and that party is not the party of ascendancy. I am not here to defend or attack the illiterate vote on its own merits. I have read the old Debates in this House on the subject. I was present during the Debates to which I refer. To whom does the illiterate vote owe its origin? To the late Leader in this House of the Conservative Party, who brought forward the question of the illiterate vote on 29th April, 1872, and if he did not carry it that very day, yet the next time the House met to consider the Ballot Act it was carried by the Conservative Party and the Irish Members. Now that Party, which justly reveres its late Leader, will have to say why they supported him on that occasion and why they go against his views now. I myself say nothing about the illiterate vote except this—that when the question comes on it must be considered as a whole, and that I am not going to vote for a special Bill abolishing the illiterate vote in a country which values it, and which was always in favour of it. ("No!") Well, the great majority of the Irish Members were always in favour of it. The illiterate vote must be considered on its merits, and not merely as a question of inflicting on Ireland something which you have spared to England. The question of ascendancy is not only involved in what the Bill enacts, you also see it in its omissions; and I consider a very serious omission in this Bill is the failure to deal with the question of the Justices of the Peace in Ireland. I cannot understand how a Local Government Bill that can really be supposed to satisfy the Irish people can be complete when you leave untouched the state of things at present existing. Talk of ascendancy! Why, in the County of Tyrone according to the last census more than half of the population is Catholic, and out of the one hundred and thirty-eight Justices of the Peace only nine are Catholics. In Wicklow five-sixths of the population are Catholics, and out of one hundred and four Justices of the Peace only five are Catholics. In Fermanagh more than half the population is Catholic, and out of one hundred and seventy-four Justices of the Peace only one is Catholic. We Scotch Members and the great majority of the English Members on this side have voted in favour of a measure for the purpose of improving our Local Government, by giving to the County and Municipal Councils a voice in the choice of Justices. Perhaps the best governed towns in the island are the Scotch towns, and there the Justices are elected. I say it is indeed very meagre fare to the Irish people to offer a Local Government Bill which does not do something towards bringing the Justices of the Peace in some degree in accordance with the opinions and religion of the people. Of course the strongest point of all is the Joint Committee. It is quite idle to refer Irish Members to Scotland. Scotch Members protested most vigorously against the appointment of the Joint Committee, but they protested in vain, and the same occurred in the case of the English measure. But the case of Scotland and the case of Ireland are entirely different, because in Scotland the Joint Committee is kept solely for the purpose of capital expenditure, and that capital expenditure in the old days was entirely defrayed by the landlord and half of the county rates also by the landlord. But in Ireland almost the whole of the county cess is paid not by the landlord but by the occupier, and yet this Joint Committee is being composed of landlords—it is idle to talk about great cesspayers—and of men interested in the landlord class. This body will have the County Council in leading strings, for the County Council without the consent of the Joint Committee is unable to make any capital expenditure—to construct any roads, bridges, water supply, or to acquire land. They cannot do anything towards supplying houses for the working classes, towards carrying out the Labourers Act, all of which cost money. They cannot even borrow money for the purpose of consolidating the debt, so that the splendid operations of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) as Mayor of Dublin could not have been carried out if he had been the Chairman of the County Council. The majority of gentlemen were so little in sympathy with these elected bodies that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has been obliged to create a number of protective clauses. Again, the principal officers of the County Council are not chosen by the County Council. The two principal officers are chosen by the Joint Committee. I suppose there is no one thing for which Irishmen more desire Local Government than as a means of stopping what some of them call jobbery, and which all of them call patronage. And yet the most important posts in the hierarchy of the County Council officers are retained in the hands of a close body. In Scotland, where there is a Joint Committee, the appointment of the Clerk of the Peace and of the County Surveyor is given over absolutely to the County Council, and the result is increased satisfaction. In Scotland, too, the servants of the County Council are its servants, whereas in England these servants were appointed by the Joint Committee, and often prove the masters. One more point. The Joint Committee has the power of hindering the County Council from discharging any officer whom they find in existence at the time of their creation. A high scale of compensation practically debarred the County Council from dismissing its own officers, and yet in Clause 73, sub-section 4, there is absolutely put forward an invitation to appoint baronial constables and other officers up to the Assize before the passing of the Act, in order that when the new County Council comes in it may find a complete set of these officials provided. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh said this Bill included safeguards which would protect his opponents, and not his supporters. He said that Ulstermen wanted to remove the ascendancy. How does this Joint Committee protect the opponents of the hon. Member? It surely is almost a farce to say that the seven Grand Jurymen and the Sheriff, whom we were told by the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) is the youngest and probably the most dependent member of the band of country gentlemen, will be a protection for the minority of Catholics and Nationalists in Ulster against the majority of the County Council, which is elected by those who agree with the hon. Member. This provision is retained simply for the purpose of preserving as much of the ascendancy as can be preserved in those counties where the people opposed to ascendancy are quite sure of getting a majority. Before I sit down I just want to say one word about the comparison of this Bill to that of Scotland. We have been asked to-day in very pointed words whether we want anything broader than the Scotch and English Bills. In the first place, this Bill is not so broad as the Scotch Bill; I doubt if it is as broad as the English Bill. The Scotch Bill was large and broad enough for this Parliament, but if that Bill had come—I will not say from a Scotch Parliament—from a Select Committee entirely composed of Scotch Members it would have been more an example and precedent for Ireland. But large or small, it is idle to offer to Ireland a scheme of government founded upon the lines of countries with whose political history, with whose social and economical condition Ireland has nothing in common. The scheme of Local Government for Ireland should, therefore, instead of being smaller, be larger and broader, in order that it may make amends for the past; and in order that it may work well for the future it ought to be full, bold, fearless, comprehensive, and, above all, it ought to please Irishmen and satisfy them. But, as far as I can see, this scheme of the Government has nothing Irish about it except certain provisions dictated by the bad old central spirit of Irish Government, and which have been put in for the purpose of thwarting Irish aspirations; and the blots of this Bill are not Irish merely.

Sir George Trevelyan

The Statute-books have been ransacked to find in Education Bills, Poor Law Bills, and Local Government Bills precedents which can be brought to bear against the will of the majority of the Irish people. Sir, the Government might have done one of two things. They might have said that they would not stir in the question as long as it was necessary to govern Ireland under exceptional criminal laws, and in that case I venture to say they would have been supported by the whole of their Party on both sides of the House. On the other hand, they might have brought in a thorough, comprehensive, generous Local Government Bill; and in that case that Bill would by this time have been well on its way to the House of Lords. But they have done neither the one nor the other. They have brought in a Bill which cannot pass, which is not meant to pass, and which, if it is passed, cannot possibly set up a scheme of government which would endure. Ireland will lose nothing, and the sincerity of the deliberations in this House will gain a great deal if this Bill, which has been five years in the pigeon-hole and three months lately on the shelf, is now consigned to the waste-paper basket by the most summary process that Parliament can devise.

MR. JACKSON: The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Trevelyan) has travelled over a good deal of ground, and he has, at all events, accomplished one object—that is, he has completely answered two of the speeches which have been made from the Benches opposite, complaining that the Bill now before the House was a bad Bill, because it did not follow on similar lines to the English and Scotch measures. The right hon. Gentleman has laboured the point for some time to prove to his own satisfaction and the satisfaction of others that no Bill based on the lines of the measures for England and Scotland could possibly satisfy the Irish people. Sir, my right hon. Friend has had some experience of Ireland, and he lays down the proposition that a Bill, to be satisfactory to the House, ought to satisfy everything Irishmen may desire. I do not know whether his experience in endeavouring to satisfy Irishmen on Irish questions has led him to be sanguine that, even if he occupied the position I have the honour to fill to-day he would be able to achieve success in that direction. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has referred in some detail to the Bill, and I propose to deal with one or two of the points as they arise in their order. Before, however, coming to the merits of the Bill itself, I should like to say one or two words upon the more general questions that have been referred to by hon. Members. The hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has given a very amusing, and I may perhaps say a very imaginative, description of the Bill. I think anyone who has read the Bill would fail to recognise in his criticisms any portion of it. The hon. Member for West Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone), whose intervention in the Debate I gladly welcomed, practically followed the criticisms of the hon. Member for West Belfast; but my hon. Colleague went a little further and devoted a large portion of his speech to a criticism of the action of the Government, and made charges, which have since been echoed, of broken pledges on the part of the Government. I desire to make some reference to that point. Well, Sir, it is true, as has been said, that the Government, in a speech from the Throne, promised Local Government for Ireland on the same lines, and practically at the same time, as the measures for England and Scotland. But it should be remembered that it is not in the power of a Government to dispose entirely of the time of the House in the manner they may desire. I should like to remind the House of what has been done during the period in which it is said we should have kept our promise. In 1888 the Government dealt with Local Government for England, and in 1889 with Local Government for Scotland. Therefore it may be said the Government might have dealt in 1890 with Local Government for Ireland. Well, the House is very well aware that during that time Ireland was not neglected by the Government. A large portion of the time of the House was devoted to legislation for Ireland, and I should be surprised if any hon. Member were to get up and charge the Government with having passed legislation during that period of less importance than a Local Government Bill. In the years 1890 and 1891 the Government were busily engaged in passing the important and beneficial Land Act for Ireland and the measure dealing with light railways, which I believe will confer upon Ireland enormous advantages. They passed measures dealing with the relief of distress in Ireland, and also an important measure dealing with the congested districts of Ireland. The hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. Timothy Healy) has spoken to-night with some force, and with some apparent sincerity, as to his desire to see certain powers extended to the Irish representative authorities which this Bill does not provide for. He spoke of improving the breed of poultry, horses, and cattle, of improving agriculture, and of several other matters affecting the welfare and prosperity of Ireland. But the hon. Member did not remind the House that, by the measures passed during the period I have already referred to, every one of these subjects is now being dealt with by the Congested Districts Board.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I do not wish to say anything disrespectful of the Congested Districts Board, but I believe it to be a humbug, pure and simple.

MR. JACKSON: Of course the hon. Member is entitled to hold his own opinion as to the Congested Districts Board, but I hope that when the result of the work done by that Board is put before the House he will have the opportunity of convincing himself that the efforts of that Board to remedy defects and to benefit the people in the congested districts in Ireland is not a sham at all but a reality.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Why did you put Horace Plunkett on the Board?

MR. JACKSON: Although the Government might have brought in a Local Government Bill in 1890, yet it cannot be said that the time was not devoted to Ireland and to measures which will confer upon that country benefits no less than those conferred by any Local Government Bill. While I contend that the Government have fulfilled their pledges, given both at the Election and in the Queen's Speeches, I would point out that there have been previous occasions when Governments, even with the best intentions, have not been able to fulfil their hearts' desire as regards legislation for Ireland. In 1880 there was a Queen's Speech in which the House was told there was to be no more coercion. In 1881 a promise of a Local Government Bill for Ireland was made, and in 1882 the Queen's Speech promised a County Government Bill for London, and Ireland was to be reserved. But instead of the Local Government Bill promised in the previous year there was substituted what I think I may describe as the most severe coercion measure that was ever passed in this House. In 1883 there was again another promise of Local Government for the Metropolis, which was repeated in 1884, but not a single one of these measures was passed into law. I do not blame the Government of that day, but I mention these facts to show that perhaps a Queen's Speech is sometimes rather the measure of the hopes of the Government as regards legislation than of any certainty that the promised legislation will be passed. However, I deny that the Government have broken their pledges; on the contrary, I assert that the Government have fulfilled their pledges as regards legislation for Ireland, and are now endeavouring to fulfil the last in this Bill for Local Government in Ireland. There has been a good deal of criticism of the Bill, and I will deal with two or three of these criticisms only, because I feel that, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), my task is made much easier. I think anyone who listened to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), and who had not read the Bill, would hardly have realised the enormous exaggeration the hon. Member has given to the restrictions contained in the Bill. These exaggerations have been exposed, and, I think, most effectually disposed of in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to-night. But there are one or two charges made by the hon. Member (Mr. Sexton) to which I desire to refer. The Bill, he said, is founded on mistrust of the people; and in order to test that question, it is desirable that we should consider—first, the form of the measure itself and the basis on which it is founded, and then the peculiar circumstances of the country to which it refers. I venture to submit to the House that, so far is the Bill from evidencing any distrust of the people on the part of the Government, it shows that the Government are willing to trust the people to the largest extent, and I submit that the Bill in this respect is much more far-reaching than the English or the Scotch Bill. I have heard it stated that, speaking broadly, England may be described as three-fourths urban and one-fourth rural; and practically in the urban districts of England Local Government existed already, when the Bill was introduced, throughout the length and breadth of the land. But the conditions in Ireland are practically the reverse of those in England. I shall not be very wide of the fact in stating broadly that the urban population of Ireland is one-fourth and the rural population three-fourths of the whole. Therefore, while the English Bill brought Local Government by popularly-elected bodies to a fourth of the population, the Irish Government Bill applies to three-fourths of the Irish population. In other words, it gives for the first time to three and half millions of the people of Ireland, out of 4,700,000, local self-government. There is another view of the question I should like to present to the House. There are some remarkable figures contained in a Return which tell us how great a change this Bill will introduce. It must be borne in mind that county government in Ireland has hitherto been in the hands of the Grand Juries. It is now proposed to transfer the whole administration of county government not only as regards County Councils but as regards Baronial or District Councils entirely to popularly-elected bodies. ("No!") I assert it as a fact, and the Bill bears out my statement. In the Return of Ratings in Ireland the figures come out showing that out of a total of 1,184,234 ratings in Ireland 46 per cent. are under £4 a year, and the ratings under £10 are 72 per cent. of the whole. Speaking generally, I say these figures show that the majority of those who will be called upon to elect the Councils will be ratepayers rated at £5 and under.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to ask, does this include urban ratings?

MR. JACKSON: Yes; but I think the hon. and learned Gentleman quite overlooks the fact that this makes my case still stronger, inasmuch as urban ratings, which are included in the average, are much higher than rural ratings.

MR. MATTHEW KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): No, it might be a single room in a house in Dublin separately rated.

MR. JACKSON: I think it strengthens my case because, so far as I can see, urban ratings are generally much higher than rural ratings. There are further figures showing that, out of 760,000 inhabited houses in Ireland, 435,000 are rated at £1 per annum or under, and 226,000 rated at between £1 and £4. Therefore, you have nearly nine-tenths of the inhabited houses in Ireland rated under £4 per annum. I mention these figures to show the enormous change which will be made by the Bill in placing the power of managing the whole of the affairs connected with County Government in the hands of bodies elected by these rate-payers. ("No!") These figures go to show that the measure is well described as a broad and generous measure, and that it shows no distrust of the people. I wish I could think there is no distrust of the people on the part of hon. Members opposite. There is another Bill before the House at this time—the Irish Education Bill—and this Bill proposes to entrust to Committees to be appointed by popularly-elected bodies the important work of ensuring attendance of children at school. I hope I have mistaken indications; I hope I may be wrong in anticipating opposition from certain quarters; but unless I am much mistaken, the only Members who have shown mistrust of the people in regard to this important duty, which is certainly not less in importance for the welfare and prosperity of Ireland than these duties of Local Government, are the hon. Member for West Belfast and his political friends. However, I may be wrong in my anticipations, and it may be that hon. Members will not show that mistrust of popularly-elected bodies in regard to the Education Bill. Now a word on the protection of minorities. Reference was made by the hon. Member for West Belfast, and repeated by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, to the Government not having dealt with this Local Government Bill with the franchise connected with Dublin and Belfast. I can assure hon. Gentlemen they never were under a greater mistake than in supposing there is any intention on the part of the Government of leaving out Dublin and Belfast from this Bill to obtain some political advantage. There are no such cities as Dublin and Belfast dealt with in the English and Scotch Acts. ("How about London?") They are entirely outside the scope of the Bill.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Did the right hon. Gentleman omit Dublin and Belfast from his rating figures just now?

MR. JACKSON: They do not affect the average in reference to my point. I say that it never was intended for these. The Bill is intended to transfer the powers hitherto exercised by the Grand Juries in the administration of fiscal affairs of counties to these County Councils and Baronial Councils just as the Act for England has transferred to County Councils the powers heretofore exercised by Quarter Sessions. Now, as regards protection to minorities, I think I may take it that the principle is practically admitted. It has been recommended strongly by the hon. Member for West Belfast and by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Knox), in the case of the Belfast Corporation Bill. When the Belfast Corporation Bill was before the House, the hon. Member denounced the Protestant majority for their treatment of Roman Catholics in Belfast, and contended for protection for the minority.

MR. KNOX: I advocated protection by a redistribution of wards. I said if cumulative voting were allowed at all it should be in Belfast.

MR. JACKSON: I was speaking of the principle, and I said the hon. Member contended strongly for the principle when the Belfast Corporation Bill was before the House. The hon. Member said he objected to the Bill

"Because it sets up a religious tyranny over the Catholic electors in the City of Belfast."

The hon. Member went on to say—

"As a Protestant I deplore with sincere regret that the Corporation of Belfast cannot be persuaded to give fair play to the members of the Catholic religion."

MR. KNOX: Hear, hear!

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member cheers that statement, and, therefore, he contends for the principle of protection to minorities. I maintain it was his intention and desire to secure for the minority a protection the Bill did not give.

Mr. KNOX : In Belfast.

Mr. JACKSON : Does the hon. Member, speaking, as he said, as a Protestant, only desire it in Belfast? Has he no sympathy for a minority in any other part of Ireland than Belfast?

Mr. KNOX : My contention was that there was no majority in any other part of Ireland which would act as the majority in Belfast have acted.

Mr. JACKSON : I think that statement hardly requires refutation. The hon. Member stands up here and says that in his opinion the only people likely to exercise oppression or undue influence are the people of Belfast. He is of opinion that in every other part of Ireland Protestant minorities will suffer no inconvenience. He carries his criticism still further, for he states that in Belfast it would be a political advantage to the minority, and he would give representation to the minority in Belfast but not elsewhere. Now, something has been said about the proposal to leave the fixing of boundaries to the Lord Lieutenant. I should have thought the hon. Member for West Belfast would have taken no objection to this, because in a Bill which bears his name on the back the very same provision was made only so short a time ago as 1888. What we have endeavoured is to find some plan, believing it to be the general wish of Members on both sides of the House, for the representation of minorities insuring some representation however small for a minority. There are only two ways by which this can be done, so far as I know—by single Member constituencies or by the cumulative vote. It is not possible to find single Member constituencies in Ireland that would give minority representation in certain counties to every minority that exists. What has been done is this: We have had maps prepared by the Ordnance Survey Department, which I need hardly say is a Department altogether apart from any Party influences, the instructions given being that they should not cut any baronial boundaries, and should divide constituencies into the most convenient form both for working and for representation. It is the intention of the Government to put these maps in the Library during the Committee stage of the Bill; and if hon. Members should desire it, thinking the arrangement is not the best that can be adopted, we shall have no objection to the appointment of a Commission to report and devise some better plan. There is no idea of jerry-mandering constituencies or making arrangement with a view to political advantage. Now, I have not time to deal with other questions which are certainly of some importance; but I would venture to point out that, as regards the question of safeguards and of Joint Committees, there has been, I think, a great deal of exaggeration. Full effect has been given to the question of Joint Committees by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. He has clearly shown that the Joint Committee will have no power or voice in control of or interference with the ordinary administration of the county. I go further, and say as regards administration, the Joint Committee has no power or authority as regards current income, or even as regards capital expenditure. The Joint Committee has no power of interference, and is never brought into contact with the County Council in its administration, and I, for one, rather regret this is so, because I do not agree with those who would seek to continue the separation of class from class. I would like to see them working together for the good of the whole. The bodies to be elected for localities may be entirely inexperienced, and, in my opinion, it would be an enormous advantage if it were possible to bring to bear the accumulated experience of Grand Juries in county administration in combination with the energy of the bodies to be elected under the Bill.

Mr. TIMOTHY HEALY : Why is it not in the English Bill?

Mr. JACKSON : The question was dealt with, and there was found no necessity in the English Bill. It is justified for Scotland on the ground that landlords pay a portion of the rates, and it can easily be justified for Ireland by the fact that landlords pay a large portion of the cess directly and a larger portion indirectly. It is perfectly well-known that in fixing fair rents the amount of the cess paid by landlord and tenant is taken into account. My time is exhausted and I am sorry I cannot deal at greater length with the subject. All I need say, in conclusion, is, the Government have introduced a Bill which they believe to be wider in its application as regards Ireland than the Acts passed for England and Scotland. They believe that if the Bill is passed it will confer great benefit on Ireland, and will instruct the people in the art of self-government, and will tend to break down the divisions between classes. The Bill has been honestly introduced with the intention to benefit Ireland, and if Ireland has to wait for the Bill it will not be the fault of the Government, the responsibility must be with right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House.

GALWAY INFIRMARY BILL.—(No. 350.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

(12.2.) MR. JACKSON: I think there is a general opinion in favour of the Bill. The circumstances are known. The Bill has been reported upon by the Examiners.

(12.2.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I do not object to the ~~Second~~ Reading of the Bill, but I do complain of the way in which the Government have dealt with this question. It should be dealt with as a whole. The Attorney General must know the miserable plight in which Infirmarys are throughout Ireland. Here in the case of Galway the Government propose a different system, not an ideal system by any means, but a decent system, by which Galway will get rid of the prevailing influence of the parsons in the management of the Infirmary, but in the South of Ireland we are crowded out by parsons on the Boards, because it is held that a section of the Church Act of 1869 does not affect the right of parsons to sit on these Boards. This decision was arrived at by the Irish Court of Appeal, three Judges reversing the decision of six Judges, four of the Queen's Bench Division, and two Judges who sit in the Court of Appeal. It is a great anomaly and a great evil that under an old statute of the Irish Parliament parsons should have this right which is denied to ministers of other religious denominations, Catholics, Presbyterians, or Methodists. There is an example in the Cork South Infirmary of this appropriation of the power by parsons on the Board, where reform is needed quite as much as in Galway. Why do not the Government make the alteration general? The Protestant Church, for good or ill, is disestablished in Ireland, and for good or ill all religious denominations are put upon an equality. Why, then, should a system be allowed to continue under which clergymen of the Protestant Church in Ireland are ex officio members of Infirmary Boards, while Catholics, Presbyterians and Salvation Army captains are excluded? It is a well-known scandal. I do not know that I should be in order in attempting to give the Bill a general application, but I must protest against the Government dealing with the matter in this partial manner.

MR. JOHNSTON: I must object to discussion being taken at this hour.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not object to Galway getting the advantage now; but it is a strange thing that the Government should leave the evil untouched in the rest of Ireland.

(12.7.) MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I trust my hon. Friends will put some restraint on their rhetorical powers, and not prevent this Bill being passed for Galway. It is not possible upon this Bill to extend the provisions to the rest of Ireland.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(12.8.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to agree to report Progress. There is a matter of great importance desire to raise, and which I have expressed my intention to raise—namely, the question of differential rates of Income Tax on incomes derived from industry and spontaneous incomes. It is a question upon which there is keen public interest. I refrained from raising the subject on the Resolutions in the hope and expectation that the Committee stage would be taken early in the sitting, and afford a more convenient opportunity for discussion. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will now consent to a Motion to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Bartley.)

(12.9.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I hope my hon. Friend will not press this Motion. The question to which he refers is no doubt of importance, but I am quite sure the Committee will be prepared to listen to the hon. Member, and I have not heard there is any desire for a prolonged discussion. The question is important, and is so surrounded with complications and difficulties that we cannot hope to take any action in the direction my hon. Friend wishes in this Session. I hope he will allow us now to make progress with the Committee, and it will be generally admitted it is desirable we should do so.

(12.10.) SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): The subject my hon. Friend desires to raise is of very great importance, and I do not think opportunity is given for its discussion commensurate with its importance. It is of vital concern to a large portion of the taxpayers of this country, and I think there is a general consensus of opinion in favour of some distinction being made in the assessment on incomes derived from personal and individual industry and incomes arising from capital. I do trust an opportunity will be afforded for the discussion, an opportunity which does not present itself at this hour.

(12.11.) MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): There is another question arising on Clause 4—the system under which small properties are charged on the gross instead of the net rental, whereas repairs are exceedingly heavy and owners are most unfairly charged upon incomes they do not receive. This is a question it is desirable we should discuss in Committee, and I hope a convenient opportunity will be afforded for the purpose.

(12.12.) MR. BARTLEY: May I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that we should dispose of the first two clauses? If I am compelled to introduce the subject to-night, I am afraid I should reluctantly be compelled to detain the Committee to a late hour.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): I think it would have been more fair to Members if the hon. Gentleman had put his notice on the Paper. I do not think it is fair to detain us here now. Committee work is not its power or voice in control of or interference with the ordinary administration of the county. I go further, and subject regards administration has given no formal notice.

(12.13.) MR. BARTLEY: I regret that my notice is not on the Paper; but I may explain that I could not give notice until after the Second Reading, and I was out of the House when that stage was taken, and was not aware until it was too late to put down a notice that it was intended to take the Committee to-night. That is partly the reason why I ask that the working stage should be deferred for the whole. The (12.14.) MR. GOSCHEN: Localities may it right to put experienced, and, in this evening that my hon. Friend might not lose the chance of bringing forward his Motion. I do not wish to force the Committee now if there is any general desire that we should report Progress; but I do certainly desire to make progress with the Bill. I do not know what may be the view of hon. Members, but I am perfectly prepared to give the hon. Member his opportunity now, even though we sit a little longer than usual.

(12.15.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I think the compromise suggested by the hon. Member might be accepted, though I am not sure that it is quite fair to the newly and a larger present, among what it is perfectly well understood that fixing fair rents the night would be paid by landlord and The Chancellor of the Exchequer to account. My time be aware that I am sorry I cannot arise in reference to the maintenance of the Tea Duty, and the change proposed in the duty on sparkling wines. Perhaps, all things considered, it would be the wiser course to report Progress now.

Question put.

Ayes 29; Noes 84.—(Div. List, No. 138.)

(12.25.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I think we might agree to report Progress having disposed of Clauses 1 and 2; that I think would be a reasonable concession for the right hon. Gentleman to make.

*(12.25.) MR. GOSCHEN: If we pass Clauses 1 and 2 I shall be willing to ~~move~~ <sup>to report Progress</sup>, provided that it "That the Debate be now ~~on~~ <sup>the</sup> Bill on (Colonel Nolan.) may not Motion agreed to. the Vote

11.50 Debate further ad's possible on Thursday I would suggest that we might dispose of the Vote on Account, and take this Bill about eleven o'clock, but we must take our chance of that.

(12.2.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Several hon. Members went to the Secretary's strong disapprobation of keeping this Tea Duty, and I am very sorry not to see the hon. Baronet connected with the total abstinence business in his place. He has frequently raised his voice in favour of Local Option, and would, I am sure, join with the hon. Member for Leicester and others in condemning the maintenance of this duty on tea. I would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he might raise the hopes of his Party at the next General Election by a remission or reduction of this Tea Duty. Seeing that in the next clause the duty on sparkling wine is to be raised, I think this would be of policy for the Church Act of 1865 of policy for the right of parsons to sit the passage of the Prime Minister's speech at Hastings in reference to retaliatory tariffs to contrast it with the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in repealing the Customs Wine Duties of 1888. That Act of 1888 had an important bearing on the policy of retaliatory tariffs, but you are now proposing to sweep away the power of reprisal. You do this because you are unable to rely on the word of the importer. At a time when Her Majesty's Government are talking of going back to the days of retaliatory tariffs, and of compelling merchants to show their invoices and things of that kind, here they are abandoning the principles established so recently as 1888. The Act of 1888 was to some extent in favour of the poor man, while the present proposal is in favour of the rich.

(12.30.) DR. TANNER: I think we ought to have some answer from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, else it may become our duty to move an Amendment reducing the duty to one shilling from two shillings.

*(12.31.) MR. GOSCHEN: I do not know that the hon. and learned Member meant more than a protest. I do not understand that he asked me any question. I referred to this matter in my Budget statement when I pointed out that some slight friction arose in carrying out the arrangement by which the higher class wines paid an additional duty. I do not agree that the lighter sparkling wines are largely used by the poorer classes in the community, and certainly we have no intention to benefit the more wealthy consumers, or to introduce any general system of ad valorem duties.

(12.32.) DR. TANNER: I may take some satisfaction to myself, inasmuch as in 1888 I pointed out the bad policy of giving an advantage to these cheap sparkling wines, which were often of a very deleterious nature.

(12.33.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will say, for I do not recollect his Budget speech, how much he anticipates will be the increase in the Revenue from this change?

(12.33.) MR. GOSCHEN: I stated that the increase would be extremely small; the turn will be just in favour of the Revenue to some £10,000.

YEOMANRY CAVALRY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*VISCOUNT GALWAY: My Lords, I need scarcely say that it is very gratifying to the Yeomanry to find that at last their complaints have been brought before the War Office and the public in a proper manner. For many years we have been doing our best to get certain questions brought before the War Office, and at last I hope we shall succeed in getting a satisfactory reply and shall be put in a satisfactory position. For a great many years past it has been the fashion with several military and civilian critics to think that the Yeomanry have not improved; but, my Lords, the old yeoman of portly form, who was a very good fellow in every way except as a light Cavalry soldier, no longer exists in the ranks; we have now a great many young men capable of doing their work well. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, when he visited them lately, was kind enough to express his approval of them, and all the Inspecting Officers after the various inspections have reported every year that great improvements have taken place. Your Lordships will be glad indeed, I am sure, that at last the Yeomanry are to be put upon the mobilisation scheme, and to have their share in the defence of the country. But, to come more to the details of this Report, I think myself that the question of the reduction of sergeants may be met in a fairly satisfactory manner. Whether the reduction of adjutants will be equally successfully worked without friction there is some doubt, because I think it will be found very difficult for any man to be in two places at once and to serve two masters, as the adjutant must if he is to serve two large regiments at different quarters. But there are three points to which I should like to ask the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War particularly to direct his attention. The first is that in this Report of the Committee on the Yeomanry Cavalry it is proposed to make the whole of the contingent allowance depend upon a standard of musketry. When a man is recruited the Yeomanry have to equip him with his full uniform, and he may be a very good horseman and swordsman and a good Cavalry soldier in every respect; but perhaps, because he lives a long distance from butts, and is unable, therefore, to have practice, or perhaps has not naturally great talent for shooting, he is not a very fair marksman. It seems very hard, therefore, that the whole of the contingent allowance should depend upon the accident of his being a good shot. I hope, therefore, the noble Earl will be able to say that some modification will be made in that portion of the Report. Another point is this. At the present moment the Yeomanry are about the cheapest force that the country can have: they cost little more than £7 per man, for which you have a man ready equipped with his uniform, saddle and horse, and ready to turn out at any moment. As this Report seems to me a little like robbing Peter to pay Paul, I hope sincerely that we shall clearly understand that there is no proposal to reduce the sum total of the Yeomanry Vote, but that whatever is saved from one portion of it will be given back to the Yeomanry in some way to promote their efficiency. The third point is that, if the brigading system is thoroughly carried out, heavy expense will be thrown upon the regiments during the year in which they have to brigade; and I hope that that expense will not fall on the Contingent Fund, but that some other fund will be forthcoming. Then there is another point which, perhaps, the noble Earl will not care to answer at once. It seems to me that the maximum number is very much too near what we have been actually turning out in the last two years, and that it will act as a damper in recruiting. Moreover, it seems to me that with the new Cavalry drill the numbers fixed will not be found to work well, and I hope that some modification may be made with respect to that number. I should like, therefore, to ask the noble Earl what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government in regard to carrying out the Report, and I hope he will kindly take notice of the three points which I have brought to his notice.

*LORD BELPER: Before the noble Earl answers the remarks which have just been made, having had the honour of commanding a Yeomanry regiment for some years I should like to refer to one or two points in the Report of the Yeomanry Committee. In the first place I should wish entirely to concur in the remarks made by the noble Viscount with regard to the fact that for the first time the Yeomanry are given a position in the mobilisation scheme of the country, and that they have now a definite place as part of the defensive forces of the country; and in connection with that I am very glad to see the proposal for occasionally, once in three years, brigading two or three Yeomanry regiments together, not only on paper, but also in the field. I would only venture to ask whether in those cases it would not be desirable that the Yeomanry regiments when they are going out to work in brigade should be allowed to be called out for a rather longer period than at present; because it will clearly be most important that they should have an opportunity of learning their ordinary work before two or three regiments are called upon to work together in brigade—most of them for the first time. With regard to the increase in the Contingent Fund, that is a point which the Yeomanry Commanding Officers will accept with the greatest pleasure. It has been clearly proved that the amount now paid is not sufficient to cover the expenses of the force; and, although that money comes out of the Yeomanry themselves, I think they will be pleased at the change. With regard to the diminution of staff sergeants I think there probably will be some difference of opinion amongst officers commanding different Yeomanry regiments; but I should like to say, speaking solely for my own regiment, that, although there will be some inconvenience at first in altering the headquarters of different troops, yet I believe it can be carried out without diminishing in any way the efficiency of the regiment. My Lords, there are two points which have not been referred to to which I should like to call the attention of the noble Earl. The first is that in paragraph 9 with regard to the working of the squadron. It is pointed out that the strength of one hundred is a good working strength for the field, and though inferior to a squadron of regular Cavalry it is perhaps as large as is desirable for the Yeomanry. I should like to point out that included in that hundred will be a considerable number of the band, and I rather think this point must have been overlooked by the Committee. The band of the Yeomanry is sworn in and attached to the different troops, and therefore, if every man in the field was efficient, the maximum of the squadron would be about 92 or 93 instead of one hundred. Besides this, I think if the Report is accepted as it stands that would necessitate the band going through a course of musketry; and I am sure that any gentleman who knows what Yeomanry bands are will not think probably that that would be a very desirable thing to do. I do not think you could get men to join the band and also to shoot; and I think, if you were to insist upon it probably the result would be very much more dangerous to themselves

than to any enemy they might have to meet. The question of musketry has already been referred to by the noble Viscount who introduced the question. As my regiment has a great difficulty in getting ranges, particularly up to a sufficient distance, I hope that the qualification in musketry will not be made a sine qua non for the contingent allowance. I think if it is to depend upon anything it would be far better to make some of the pay of the yeoman depend upon his shooting his course, thereby proving to him that his shooting is an essential part of a Cavalry soldier's duties at the present time. The only other point to which I should like to call the noble Earl's attention is the question of the numbers. In the schedule the strength of the Yeomanry regiments for the last three years has been taken as an average. Any one who knows the great difficulties that Yeomanry regiments have had to meet, owing to the agricultural depression, will understand that even in the last year and the year before, those difficulties have not been finally overcome, and the losses we suffered four or five years before have not been completely filled up. To take the case of my own regiment, which happens to be a somewhat peculiar one, I find that in the last years mentioned in the Report it has increased by nearly sixty: from 208 in 1889 to 263 in 1891; and I have every reason to suppose that it will be something like 290 when it is called out this year. Therefore, under the scale which has been given by this Report, it would be impossible for me after this year to try to increase the strength of the regiment at all. The old strength of the regiment was four hundred maximum including officers. For a regiment of four squadrons under the new scheme the four hundred would be a stronger regiment, because that is exclusive of officers and staff; at the same time I think it would be rather hard upon a regiment, while pulling up their numbers considerably, and now for the first time getting over the difficulties of the agricultural depression, that they should be stopped from recruiting if they find they can get an efficient number of men which would bring them over the number which has been laid down in the schedule of this Report. I hope the noble Earl will at all events consider, if he cannot answer now, the two or three points which I have brought forward. I am sure that, although there is a considerable difference of opinion with regard to various details amongst officers commanding the force, they will all accept the general regulations laid down in this Report, and will strive in future, as they have in the past, to make the Yeomanry an efficient part of the Reserve Forces of the country.

*EARL COWPER: My Lords, though I have nothing to do with any Yeomanry regiment myself, yet, in common with all your Lordships, I take a great interest in the whole subject of our national defences, particularly those which may be classed under the general head of Volunteers. I am sure it is not at all too soon that the Government have turned their attention to the subject of the Yeomanry, and I think that anybody who has glanced over the Report must feel that the Yeomanry force are not in a satisfactory condition. On the very first page we have it that out of a maximum of thirteen thousand there are only about eight thousand efficient. That I think is not nearly so many as there ought to be. I also think they are rather backward compared with the other forces. Some thirty years ago no doubt the Yeomanry were considered a very fine body of men, even though I am quite willing to admit, as the noble Viscount who brought forward the subject says, they were really not so good actually then as they are now. But in these days when the Volunteers during the last ten years have come so tremendously forward, and have become so very efficient, I think the Yeomanry require to be brought up to the standard. Now of course the Yeomanry were originally intended very much for the sake of assisting the civil power in preserving law and order and in acting against mobs and rioters. This was never a very popular or very satisfactory employment for them. I think always in case of a riot or a difficulty it is far better, when unfortunately you must have recourse to force, to employ police or regular soldiers whom you can keep in hand and who will stand a certain amount of insult or throwing stones without being provoked into what may end in indiscriminate slaughter. Therefore I do not think the Yeomanry are likely to be much employed in this way in the future. Certainly, in former days, both in England and Ireland, their employment in this way was not attended with good results. Besides, as has been pointed out in this Report, in these days of increased railway communication, when you can always concentrate a certain number of soldiers or police upon a given spot in a very short time, the Yeomanry are less likely than ever to be called upon to do this work. If they are to continue to exist they must simply and solely be considered as part of the national defence; and they must be in such a position that in case of invasion they would be reliable for employment there and then as part of the efficient forces of the country. Now there is no doubt that if they are to do this they must improve very much upon what they are; they must not only learn to shoot, which has been pointed out in the Report as a very necessary thing, and a thing which is very much neglected; but I think they must be able to make a better appearance in the field than they can now. In many regiments I think it is wonderful how much they do, considering that they only come out one week in the year; that one day is employed in arriving, and another in going away; another in a field day, and another is Sunday; so that they only have four days' drill in the year. But I think if they are to be an efficient force they must have more drills than they have now. I do not know that the Government can be called upon to give more towards them than they do now. As compared with the regular forces, they are very cheap, no doubt; but as compared with the Volunteers, I think they cost about twice as much per man. But I think they would be very glad to do something for themselves, I think they come from a class who would be glad to meet the Government and pay part of their own expenses if they were encouraged. All I think they want is encouragement. and more to be required of them before they can be passed as efficient. I think, considering what they have in their favour, considering the admirable men both in this House and in other positions who are willing to come forward and take command of these forces and officer them, considering the general spirit among the youth of the country, and the patriotism and love of military service, which is undoubted, it is quite true that they only want encouragement to be induced to do more than they do now. If they can once know that they belong, not to a merely ornamental force as in bygone days, but to a really efficient force, capable in case of invasion of forming an efficient part of the defences of the country, they will take a greater pride in the force than they do now; and, instead of there being only eight thousand out of a maximum of thirteen thousand, that maximum would constantly be kept to its full strength, and a demand would be made to increase it. My Lords, I am glad the Government have taken the matter up. I think every step they have taken has been in the right direction, in the interest of the Yeomanry themselves; and the more they are considered a permanent force in the country the more will they command men than they do now.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWLOW): My Lords, there are two points which have been from time to time urged upon the Secretary of State for War by commanding officers—one is a complaint that the Military Authorities have never yet seen their way to utilise them for the purposes of mobilisation; the other is that the contingent allowance which they now draw, £2 per man, is insufficient for the purposes for which it is intended. To remedy this state of things, if possible, is the problem that was placed before the Committee. When the Committee began to make inquiries they were immediately struck by the very small size of the units of the Yeomanry. This is an old story. As long ago as 1875 a Committee appointed to inquire into this very question reported in favour of disbanding all regiments that fell below two hundred in two consecutive years.

This recommendation was embodied in the Yeomanry regulations, where it is laid down that any regiment which falls in two consecutive years below two hundred may be disbanded without further notice, and there the regulation has remained up to this time as a dead letter—it has never been acted upon. But when the Committee came to inquire into the number they were astonished to find that no less than sixteen out of the thirty-nine Yeomanry regiments had this sword of Damocles hanging over their heads which might fall and destroy them at any moment. The Committee, therefore, considered in what way they might get over the difficulty of not having to disband small regiments and yet being able to keep these small regiments and enable then to preserve their individuality. The method they hit upon was the system of brigading. By joining two or more small regiments into brigades this difficulty of very small units is immediately got rid of. It is hoped that these brigades will be somewhat similar in number to the Regular Cavalry regiments, and yet that each small unit may retain its own individuality. In forming these brigades it is considered that the present regimental adjutants, some of whom have very small numbers of men to look after, may be gradually, as they die out, abolished, and brigade adjutants substituted in their stead. And, as a matter of detail, it is proposed by the Committee that the brigade adjutant should have some extra allowance in the way of another horse, because he will be required to do more travelling. The next point to which the Committee devoted their attention was the size of the troops. The Committee found that in some regiments of average size the troops consisted of twenty-two men, some of these troops being of a less number than twenty-two, and to every one of these troops the Government supplies a staff sergeant. We have it in evidence that many of the staff sergeants are not fully employed, and eke out their time with the permission of the commanding officer by taking civil employment. There was nothing in the evidence to prove that a staff sergeant was not perfectly capable of taking care of a whole squadron; but it was pointed out by one or two commanding officers that if this reduction was made suddenly there would be a great deal of difficulty in maintaining the regiments in a proper state of efficiency. It is therefore proposed by the Committee that one staff sergeant should be allowed to each squadron, and that in addition one more sergeant should be allowed to be at the disposal of the commanding officer for what I may call general purposes. It was further pointed out that some further assistance might be wanted at times of the year when there is a good deal of pressure for exercising the men in carbine practice and sword exercise, and it was considered that that assistance might be found in the regiment in the non-commissioned officers of the Yeomanry; and of course it is always open to the commanding officer of the regiment, if he has nobody in the regiment who is competent to teach these things, to find somebody in the district who is competent, and he can enrol him in his regiment and employ him in that way; but it is proposed that he should be paid by arrangement between the commanding officer and this sergeant out of the increased contingent allowance, which I will come to presently. The next point to which the Committee turned their attention was the question of shooting. Now, my Lords, we have often been told that the Yeomanry shoot badly,—the only wonder is that they shoot at all. No encouragement has ever been offered to the Yeomanry to shoot, and the only possible incentive to them has come out of the pockets of the officers. It was pointed out to the Committee that the men lost time in going to and from the ranges, and therefore it has been recommended that every man who passes through his course should be given 3s. 6d. pay for the day that he spends upon the ranges. The numbers which the Committee recommend for brigades are either a maximum of 400 and a minimum of 280 for a four-squadron regiment, or a maximum of 300 enrolled and a minimum of 210 efficient for a three-squadron regiment, or for a two-squadron regiment a maximum of 200 and a minimum of 140. But my Lords, it is supposed that there may be some cases—I hope they will be exceedingly few—will be found impossible in a county to raise up even this minimum number of 100. In those cases sooner than entirely disband the corps it is proposed that the Secretary of State shall have the power when he sees fit, to allow a single squadron to be maintained in the county but with no regimental staff. I may perhaps here deal with the question that was put by my noble Friend opposite (Lord Belper) on the subject of maximum and minimum numbers. The reason why these numbers were fixed by the Committee was because the maximum number of a squadron having been fixed by them at the convenient number of 100 it naturally follows that a two-squadron regiment would have two hundred, a three-squadron regiment three hundred, and so on; but the Committee also considered the present state of the number of Yeomanry regiments, and they thought four hundred would be a sufficiently large maximum, looking to the state of the Yeomanry regiments. But I would point out that there is a way of getting over the difficulty. If a regiment is full and desires to enlist more men, it is quite in the power of the Secretary of State to allow them to enlist a certain number of supernumeraries, and if they kept on increasing, the Secretary of State could give a larger easement, and, if he wished it, could create a regiment of five squadrons.

EARL BROWNLOW: Yes, they would be paid if they were allowed to be taken on. Then the question of the band comes in here. The Committee certainly did not go very deeply into the question of the band because they found that the regulations already laid down with regard to the band that two bandsmen per troop are allowed, and I find they are excused certain exercises; but if there are any more bandsmen in the troop they are not excused. The Committee considered that these regulations would probably go on, and that the two bandsmen would still be allowed per troop. But then comes another point—whether they are to be obliged to shoot in order to obtain the contingent allowance. That is a

required of them before they can be passed as efficient. I think, considering what they have in their favour, considering the admirable men both in this House and in other positions there willing to come forward and command of these forces and question, considering the general when the youth of the the adjutant the patriotism and love £5,013, the saving, which is un-sergeants if carried out, that they only be £8,306, the total saving. If they £13,300, and it is proposed, not to that saving in the following way. In the first place it has been pointed out that the contingent allowance is not meet the purposes for which it was intended, and that the considerable expense is very often thrown upon the officers. To meet this difficulty it is proposed that the contingent allowance shall be raised from £2 as it is at present up to £3, giving £1 per man more than at present. But the Committee report in favour of making the whole of this contingent allowance depend upon the shooting of the yeoman—that is to say, that if he does not come up to a certain moderate standard of shooting, which shall be laid down hereafter, the whole of this £3 shall be forfeited. Now my noble Friend behind me (Viscount Galway) has called my attention to this point, and I may say that the Secretary of State for War has given this point his very best consideration. He considers that the Committee are a little hard upon the yeomen in this respect, and he would be prepared to make only the extra £1 which it is proposed to add, depend upon the shooting of the yeoman; but of course if the yeoman does not pass through that course, besides losing the £1, he would also lose the day's 3s. 6d. for attending the range. That increase of £1 would amount to £8,500; then the day's pay for target practice would amount to £1,467; and it is further proposed in order to encourage shooting, to give twenty rounds per man of extra ammunition which would amount to £630, and the allowance to brigade adjutants for the additional horse will amount to £760, making a total of £11,357. That £11,357 will go against the saving of £13,300. It will be easily

This recommendation was embodied in the Yeomanry regulations, where it is laid down that any regiment which falls in two consecutive years below two hundred may be disbanded without further notice, and there the regulation has remained up to this time as a pro letter—it has never been acted upon. But when the Committee agree, that the quire into the number of contingent astonished to find that in next year. In sixteen out of the thirty result will be a slight hanging over the third year there will fall and disappear in the third year there will be a saving; and after that there will continue to be a saving. But it is proposed that that saving shall be a base on the Yeomanry Vote. On the contrary the Committee point out that there will be expenses connected with the regading, probably travelling expenses and other expenses; and this small balance will be available to meet those expenses, and that answers the question of my noble Friend behind me. My Lords, in taking evidence and making inquiries the Committee were very much struck by the anxiety of all connected with the Yeomanry to make the Yeomanry as efficient as possible, and to raise them to their proper place amongst the Forces of the country; and the Committee in their Report use these words—

“There is we are satisfied plenty of patriotic sentiment and a good soldierly material in the Yeomanry both as regards officers and men, and if the process of evolution in our military system has kept the force somewhat behind-hand it has been its misfortune rather than its fault.”

My Lords, I am convinced that there is plenty of energy, there is plenty of patriotism, there is plenty of soldier-like bearing in the Yeomanry, and if these recommendations of the Committee, which I may say have already as a whole been approved by the Secretary of State, and are now under the consideration of the Treasury, are carried out, I have no hesitation in saying that the Yeomanry will be able in the future to hold the same dignified position among the Forces of the country, and will be of the same value as they have proved themselves in the past.

NAVAL SURVEY.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: My Lords, I wish to ask my noble Friend who represents the Admiralty in this House whether it is the intention of the Board to permanently station a surveying vessel in the Mediterranean. I anticipate the answer that he will give me. He will most likely tell me that there is already a vessel, the Stork stationed there; but the Stork as I understand—my noble Friend will correct me if I am mistaken—is not in the same position as the former surveying vessels used to be; and in former days, as my noble Friend remembers, there was a permanent staff of surveying vessels stationed in the Mediterranean; they never left the station, they were not under the orders of the Commander in Chief except in a general way, and they had a complete staff of scientific officers with all the usual appliances for survey, which I very much doubt are to be found in the same value on board the Stork and other surveying vessels. And the whole duty of these ships was to survey in all parts of the Mediterranean during the summer, and during the winter they did not go home, but they mostly went to Malta, where they were employed in correcting the charts and preparing for the next summer's cruise. My Lords, we shall be told I have no doubt that for the ports of the Mediterranean there existed excellent charts from foreign nations. Well, my Lords, I do not think it is quite becoming a great country like ours to be dependent for charts upon other Naval Powers, and in the event of war it would be quite within the power of any neutral country to withhold its charts from both the belligerents; and if an objection should be taken that we should be offending Foreign Powers by surveying on their shores, I can only say that during the long period when I knew the Mediterranean where the vessels to which I allude used to traverse the coast all along, and at some parts of the Mediterranean where there was most likely to be a sensitive feeling, they were not interfered with; and I have no doubt in the present instance the diplomatic ability of the noble Marquess would remove any difficulty of that sort that would be likely to arise. Another reason why I think the survey of the Mediterranean should be very exact is that the large vessels we employ there draw a great deal more water than flag ships and line of battle ships of former days; and I need hardly ask the House to remember that the two most recent and most disastrous accidents which have arisen in the Navy have been due—I will not say to the absence of proper surveying precautions, but certainly to the existence of rocks where they were least suspected. In addition to this your Lordships must remember—I do not venture to impugn the action of the Admiralty—but it is by direction of the Board of Admiralty that all torpedo experiments are to be carried on in shallow waters, and our ships now visit portions of the Mediterranean for that purpose which used not to be visited, and I think were excepted from the surveys of former days. I allude principally to the Adriatic and some portions of the coast of Spain, and the northern part of the coast of Africa, in the neighbourhood of Morocco. My noble Friend will correct me if I am wrong, but I think I am right in saying that there is no thorough elemental survey of any of those portions of the Mediterranean waters; and that we are certainly dependent upon the survey of foreign Powers for the knowledge we possess of those coasts. I venture to ask my noble Friend whether the Admiralty will consider the great importance of the question and will station, as was formerly done, permanent surveying vessels in the Mediterranean such as are I believe at present stationed in other parts of the globe, and such as formerly existed there; such also as were employed by the East India Company permanently in the East Indies and the Persian Gulf, of which we have a most complete survey. Let me just say before I sit down that from personal knowledge I am aware that charts do require frequent correction. Some years ago I was supplied with a series of charts by one of the most distinguished officers in the Service—they were old charts, and, sailing by them I was enabled to observe—I am speaking of a yacht—the great difference that there is between those charts and some of more recent compilation. My Lords, I wish to say no more upon the subject; but I hope my noble Friend will give a satisfactory answer upon the point.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: I cannot help thinking, my Lords, that my noble Friend is under some misapprehension in this matter. The question he asks is whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to restore the Surveying Department of the Navy formerly stationed in the Mediterranean. Now we never have had a Surveying Department of the Navy formerly stationed in the Mediterranean or in any other station. The only Surveying Department is the Hydrographer's Department of the Admiralty. We have surveying ships—we have seven at present belonging to the Government and three others that are hired; but we send our surveying ships wherever the circumstances of the moment require them to be sent. It is perfectly true that we have had no surveying ships in the Mediterranean for some years. The general surveys of the Mediterranean extend over a period of about fifty-six or fifty-eight years, and during the last four years we have had no surveying ships there at all. The Stork, to which the noble Viscount refers, has been surveying on the East India Station—she is expected now in the Mediterranean in the course of a few days, and her first duty will be to re-survey the Maltese Islands; after that it is possible she may be sent to the Greek Archipelago; but we have to obtain the sanction of the Greek Government to make any survey there. We have already asked permission, but have not yet received their authority. Then the noble Viscount refers to foreign coasts. He is perhaps not aware that we cannot send our surveying ships either to the coast of France, the coast of Italy, or the coast of Spain; they all make their own surveys. The Turkish Government do not allow us to go anywhere near their coast for the purposes of survey. The consequence is that a very large portion of the Mediterranean is unsurveyed at the present time. The coast of Asia Minor is unsurveyed, but we are not allowed to go there, and cannot send our ships there. With regard to the torpedo arrangements, the Admiralty never interfere with that matter. The whole of the local arrangements with regard to where torpedoes are to be run is left entirely in the hands of the commanding officers at the different stations. The general instructions are not to run torpedoes in deeper water than twenty fathoms—that is in the event of a torpedo being lost, to enable a diver if possible to recover it, twenty fathoms being the extreme limit in which diving operations can be carried on. Under some circumstances we do allow torpedo practice to be carried on in deep waters, but then again it is only under exceptional circumstances, where we are not able to carry it on in shallow water; but there again every precaution is ordered to be taken for the recovery of a stray torpedo. I do not know whether the noble Lord has seen the Hydrographer's Report which is presented to Parliament every year; it contains very interesting information. I have here the Report for 1890, if it is of any use to him. The Report for 1891 was laid on the Table of the two Houses of Parliament two or three days ago, giving all information as to what ships there are, what they are doing, and where they are.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: Do I rightly understand my noble Friend to say that there is a positive prohibition on the part of the Turkish Government against our surveying ships visiting the coast?

LORD ELPHINSTONE: On the part of the Turkish Government, yes; on the part of the others they have all of them intimated that they do not expect us to go about surveying.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes past Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 24th May, 1892.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

PROCURATORS FISCAL AND CROFTER CASES.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, as lately promised, he has communicated with the Sheriff of Argyllshire with reference to the expediency of Mr. W. Sproat, Procurator Fiscal, Tobermory, acting for landlords in crofter cases, and what was the purport of the reply; and whether his attention has been called to the report of a case in the Oban Sheriff Court on 13th instant, wherein it is stated that a Mr. Lawrence appeared on behalf of "Mr. Sproat, Procurator Fiscal, Tobermory, and agent for the Duke of Argyll," in a suit against crofters at the instance of His Grace?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I have made the communication referred to in the question. Mr. Sproat is entitled to carry on private practice, and I have no power to prevent him from doing so. I am, however, informed that he is willing to sacrifice his private practice so far as regards cases before the Crofters' Commission; but he is naturally disinclined to give up acting as agent for landowners, merely because in this capacity he may be obliged occasionally to act against crofters. I would remind the hon. Member that as often as a vacancy occurs in the office of Procurator Fiscal, the question of restriction from private practice is considered. I am informed that the statement in the second part of the question is correct.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT AND THE ENNISKILLEN GUARDIANS.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland with regard to the fact that the Board of Guardians of the Enniskillen Union has applied to the Local Government Board by unanimous resolution five different times, the last application the 3rd May this year, for an official inquiry into the administration of the Public Health Act, 1878, in that Union, mainly in its villages and rural districts, which has been refused by the Local Government Board, if he will take steps to ascertain on what grounds the Local Government Board refused an application so often and so unanimously made by such a Board of Guardians, and have the matter rectified?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I understand it is the case that the Guardians of the Enniskillen Union have made application for official inquiry into the administration of the Public Health Act, 1878, in that Union; but notwithstanding repeated applications have not made known the specific grounds upon which they ask for inquiry.

THE PERSIAN TOBACCO CONCESSION.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can now communicate to the House the names of the members of the Eastern Concessions Syndicate?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The Foreign Office were informed by the Imperial Tobacco Corporation that they had purchased the concession originally granted to Major Talbot by the State, from the Eastern Concessions Syndicate; but I am not informed, nor have I any knowledge, as to the names of the gentlemen who composed that Association.

REMOVAL TERMS IN SCOTLAND.

SIR D. CURRIE (Perthshire, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, in view of the great inconvenience felt by Scottish farmers owing to the want of uniformity in the periods of entry into and removal from farms and buildings in Scotland, which has been submitted to him, he can now see his way to introduce an amending Act which will secure the application of the Terms Removal (Scotland) Act, 1886, to existing leases?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: From the information which the hon. Member has been good enough to send me, there appears to be considerable inconvenience for want of a uniform rule as to removal terms. I would gladly do anything in my power to further a satisfactory solution of the difficulty, though of course the area of the inconvenience is always narrowing as leases fall in, and there may be objections which have not occurred to me to the proposed interference with contracts.

If the hon. Member will introduce a Bill on the subject it will afford a means of ascertaining whether the change proposed meets with general assent.

THE HURRICANE IN THE MAURITIUS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is able to state from official sources the number of lives lost, the number of persons wounded, and the value of the property destroyed by the hurricane in Mauritius, and if it is the intention of the Government to propose any Parliamentary grant in aid of the colony; and having regard to the fact that nearly three weeks elapsed between the catastrophe and the receipt of the information in this country, a state of affairs which might be most disastrous in the case of war, steps will be taken to assist from State resources the establishment of telegraphic communication with Mauritius?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): In answer to the first paragraph of the question, I have to say that the only information as yet received from the officer administering government is that contained in the telegram which I communicated to the House on Friday; and until despatches are received it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to form any opinion on the point referred to. In answer to the second paragraph, I may say that negotiations are nearly concluded for the establishment of telegraphic communication with Seychelles and Mauritius, the greater part of the cost of which will be borne by this country and India, the rest being contributed by Mauritius and Seychelles.

THE MADRAS PRESIDENCY.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will present to the House the Memorandum on the Economic Condition of the Madras Presidency, which has been recently compiled by a native gentleman, Mr. D. B. S. S. Sriuivasa Aiyangar?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): Only one copy of the Memorandum has yet reached the India Office, and that only during the past week. It is now under the consideration of the Secretary of State, who is not yet in a position to say whether it can be presented to Parliament.

MRS. MAYBRICK.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in reference to the convict Mrs. Florence Elizabeth Maybrick, he is aware that four eminent counsel—namely, Sir Charles Russell, J. Fletcher Moulton, H. B. Poland, and Reginald J. Smith—in giving their opinion upon a full statement of her case prepared by Messrs. Lumley and Lumley, used the following words:—

“We think it right to add that there are many matters stated in the case, not merely with reference to the evidence at, and the incidents of the trial, but suggesting new facts”; and will he be prepared to give his careful consideration to any statement of the case containing the new facts referred to?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied): The Secretary of State has received no such information as that mentioned in the first part of the question, and no such document has reached the Home Office. The Secretary of State in every case, and therefore in Mrs. Maybrick's, is prepared to give careful consideration to any new material facts which can be shown to exist.

THE WATERFORD CONSTABULARY.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a number of sergeants of the County Waterford force have been pronounced incompetent by the new County Inspector, Mr. T. Hayes; how many of these sergeants are on probation, to be reported on in three months by their officers as to their fitness to hold their present rank; how many of them are men of long service and good character, who have passed creditably the inspections of their superior officers; whether he is aware that the measures of the present County Inspector have produced discontent and insecurity among all ranks under him; and whether one of the sergeants affected, Sergeant Cleary, of Callaghans, has already claimed his discharge from the Service on a reduced pension?

MR. JACKSON: This question refers to some details of administration, and I do not think that I can, with advantage to discipline or to the Public Service, answer the questions. It must not be supposed that any action taken implies censure or discredit on the members of the force.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: The object of my question is to allay discontent prevailing in the ranks of the force in consequence of the action of the County Inspector, and surely I am entitled to an answer.

MR. JACKSON: I cannot add to my answer. It must be quite obvious that to accept the assumption that discontent prevails would act prejudicially to the discipline of the force.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say is it the fact that Sergeant Cleary, in consequence of the action taken, has been obliged to claim his discharge at a reduced pension?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that is not the fact. It is not in consequence of any charge against him that he has been obliged to retire. He applied to be allowed to retire.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Yes; but why did he not remain a little time longer, when he could have claimed the higher scale of pension?

MR. JACKSON: His retirement was entirely from his own action, and was in no way due to the action of the officer mentioned.

TULLAMORE GAOL.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, before the Prisons Vote is taken, he would have any objection to print the correspondence between Mr. John Cullinan of Bansha and the Prisons Board relative to the typhoid outbreak in Tullamore Gaol, and also such medical and sanitary reports as are germane to the matter?

*MR. JACKSON: It is not the practice to lay correspondence of this nature on the Table. The hon. Member has perhaps seen the report made by the experts as to the insanitary condition of the gaol? If he has not, I shall be glad to furnish him with a copy.

THE CHARGES AGAINST SERGEANT SEABROOKE, R.I.C.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the report of a Constabulary inquiry in the North Antrim Standard of 31st March, whereby it appears that Sergeant Seabrooke was found guilty of drunkenness, and having made on oath false charges against a comrade to screen himself; and also to the judgment of the Inspector General, as follows:—

“Arising out of the charges preferred against Constable Lynch, very serious matters against Sergeant Seabrooke and other constables have come to light, and the line of action adopted by them was deceitful and indiscreet, and if persisted in would have compelled their expulsion from the force. But inasmuch as they now admit the allegations against them, this course of action would not be adopted, but in lieu of it the following penalties would be inflicted: Sergeant Seabrooke is reduced to the rank of constable, and transferred at his own expense to the County Leitrim”;

whether the Executive have sanctioned this retention in the force of a constable who is found to have confessed himself guilty of perjury to avert a sentence of dismissal; whether Seabrooke is the same policeman who was promoted after giving evidence against the Crossmaglen prisoners, sentenced in 1883, for alleged conspiracy to murder, to seven and ten years' penal servitude; and why, after the Inspector General's decision and the findings of the official tribunal, Seabrooke is not now prosecuted for perjury on his own confession?

*MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary authorities report that it is the case that the sergeant mentioned was punished for drunkenness, but it is not the case that he has been found guilty of making false charges against a comrade or that he has been guilty of perjury as alleged. He did give evidence in the case mentioned, but he did not receive promotion after giving that evidence.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what is the meaning of the Inspector's words: that the sergeant had been deceitful and indiscreet, and had pursued a line of conduct that, if persisted in, would have compelled expulsion from the force? Does it not mean that, though guilty of this conduct, he was after confession permitted to remain in the force? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that such a man should be allowed to remain in the force?

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Gentleman has been misinformed or has misunderstood the Report of the Inspector. It is not true that Sergeant Seabrooke had been found to have committed perjury, or that he was guilty of making false charges against a comrade.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Not technically so.

*MR. JACKSON: I will explain if the hon. member will permit me. Two charges made by him against the constable were found to be proved, but in regard to other allegations the Court found his conduct had not been straightforward. He admitted certain charges made against him which in the first instance he denied. There was no reference in the Report as to his having made false charges on oath against a comrade.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: But was it not a sworn inquiry, and did not the Inspector say that the line of conduct if persisted in would have led to expulsion? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that such a man should be allowed to remain in the force and to give evidence as a policeman against Her Majesty's subjects?

*MR. JACKSON: The whole question was carefully considered by the Court, and there does not appear to be any reason to interfere with the decision arrived at.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: As a warning to the public, will the right hon. Gentleman say where this man Seabrooke is now on duty?

*MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member will put down a question I will endeavour to answer it.

Mr. Timothy Healy

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I will do so, and will, if necessary, again and again call attention to the man's conduct.

RICHMOND PRISON, DUBLIN.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will grant the Return relating to the transfer of Richmond Prison to the War Office, and the sums expended on the prison by the Dublin Corporation?

*MR. JACKSON: This is a question which should be addressed to the War Office rather than to the Irish Government. The promise made to the hon. Member when the Dublin Barracks Bill was before the House was made by the War Office. The Irish Government do not see any connection between the expenditure on Mountjoy Prison and Richmond Prison. The expenditure on the one was not in consequence of the removal from the other. But the War Office will give the hon. Member the information he desires.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Surely I am entitled to ask for the information which I should have thought the right hon. Gentleman would have been better able to supply than the War Office. But I do not care whence it comes.

*MR. JACKSON: The question only appeared this morning, and I have not been able to communicate with the War Office in reference to it.

FATHER HUMPHREYS OF TIPPERARY.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Reverend Father Humphreys, of Tipperary, was accosted by Sergeant Fogarty at the gate of the Catholic Church on Saturday last, and that the constable produced a warrant against the reverend gentleman; was the warrant issued in connection with civil proceedings; and, if so, why were not the proceedings usual in civil cases adopted by the policeman on this occasion?

MR. JACKSON: I have not yet been able to obtain the information, and I shall be glad if the hon. Gentleman will postpone his question.

THE VICAR'S RATE AT COVENTRY.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it has been brought to the knowledge of the Crown, as patron of the living of St. Michael's, Coventry, that the vicar has exercised powers given him by a local Act, namely, 19 Geo. III., c. 60, to levy a rate upon the parish, that distraints have been made upon the goods of a large number of the parishioners in consequence of their refusal to pay the rate, and that grave disorder is apprehended when the goods seized are offered for sale by public auction; and whether the action of the vicar in putting this Act into force was instigated by instructions from the Crown as patron of the living?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): From causes of a personal nature there have been disputes for some years between the vicar of St. Michael's, Coventry, and the parishioners. I am not aware that any instructions from the Crown would be necessary to enable Dr. Mills to enforce the payment of the rate, to which he is entitled by the Act quoted by the hon. Member; nor am I aware that any such instructions were given.

THE CHANNEL SQUADRON.

MR. MAGUIRE (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Channel Squadron intend visiting Lough Swilly in June or July this year, as is now reported; whether he is aware that it is about eight years since any number of Her Majesty's ships have visited Lough Foyle; and whether having regard to the importance of that station on account of it including a port where trans-Atlantic mails are embarked and delivered weekly he will cause the Squadron to visit it on this occasion?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Orders have been given for the Channel Squadron to assemble early in June, but the subsequent movements of the squadron have not been decided upon, as they will depend upon the arrangements for the Naval Manœuvres in which the squadron will take part. I cannot, therefore, state definitely at present whether Lough Swilly will be visited by the Fleet this summer.

THE ALLEGED DISTURBANCES AT BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Since the answer was given to me yesterday with regard to the disturbances at Belfast, I have received information which in my judgment would entitle me to move the Adjournment of the House. I wish, however, to avoid that course, and I would ask your leave to make a brief statement, with a view of avoiding a discussion. I asked yesterday whether it was true that a number of boys had taken part in an attack on another boy, whose name I gave, and the Irish Attorney General replied in the following terms:—

"I am informed that the report in the newspaper to which the hon. Gentleman has referred is wholly unfounded."

"There does not appear to have been any incident to suggest it beyond the fact of a trifling quarrel between two young boys of about fourteen years of age, such as might occur in any place and at any time."

The boy referred to has been seen. His name is Longman, and he lives at 4, Waugh's Court, off North Road. He has made the following statement:—

"I went to Queen's Island about a week before the Easter holidays to look for a job. I was there two days when the boys working at the different boats threatened that if I would come back into the yard after the holidays that I would not go out of it alive."

What reason did these boys give for threatening you in this manner?—Because I was a Catholic.

How did they know you were a Catholic?—There was a boy who lives not far from me, a Protestant, who knew me, and he must have told them what I was. I know that boy's name. I worked on well enough until Thursday evening last. When I was leaving my work at half-past five o'clock, the boys started at me on the Queen's Road and knocked me down. The men coming from work pulled away the boys who were beating me. When I got up I walked on to the Queen's Bridge, where there were some policemen, and the boys were afraid to touch me there. When I went on to my home on North Street they followed me, and when I went into my own house, No. 13, Waugh's Court, off North Street, they gathered round the Court and were shouting at me to come out again, and said what they would do if I came to work in the morning. The police, after a while, came up and chased them away.

Did you go to your work on Friday morning?—Yes, about six o'clock, and I was lighting the fire for heating the rivets, when about fifty of the boys came up, some of them with pieces of sticks which they got lying about the yard. Two or three of them hit me together with sticks and called me a Fenian b—— and other names, and one fellow drew something like a pistol or revolver, and said in the course of a month they would not leave a Fenian in the yard, that that (meaning the revolver) was for shooting them down.

Do you know any of the boys who beat you?—Yes; I could point out about a dozen of them.

What did they do after you were knocked down?—They kicked me and beat me about, and they wanted to shove me in the river."

The House will remember that a man was shoved into the river in the same place only a few months ago.

"I thought they were going to throw me into the river, and was trying to save my face with my hands when the horn blew for them to start their work again after breakfast, and they all went off the boat to go to their work again. They broke my can which was full of tea for my dinner and kicked it about, and then threw it into the water. When I was going up the yard to go to my work two or three of the men told me to go to the hospital or go home and get my face bathed, as it was in a dreadful state and all covered with blood. I went home then, as my face was swollen and bleeding, and got it bathed. I was afraid they would beat me again at dinner time. I was afraid to go for my money at half-past five o'clock, and my brother came with me at three to Mr. Wright, the head manager, and he paid me and told me to come back to work on Saturday and he would have the boys who beat me found out. I did not go to work on Saturday, as I was afraid of being attacked again."

Did you tell the police the way you had been treated?—Yes; on Friday I told a constable in Royal Avenue, and he said if I knew any of the boys to point them out to the police, who would take their names.

Did you tell any other policeman about the occurrence?—Yes; on Saturday morning a head constable came up to my bed, and I told him all about it.

Did you give the head constable the name of any of the parties?—Yes; I gave him one name; that was all I could remember at the time. When another policeman came later on I gave him all the other names I remembered.

Do you know how many were in the crowd at the time you were beaten?—There was a big crowd; I could not say how many was in it. Many of the boys were big fellows, nearly men."

That is the boy's statement, and remembering that the Belfast riots broke out in this very same place, and that they were produced by speeches made by persons who were not then, but are now, Ministers of the Crown, I have to ask the Government two questions. In those Belfast riots thirty lives were lost, many houses were wrecked, and the disturbances continued for several months. What I want to ask is, What are the Government going to do? and how it came to pass that the Irish Attorney General, yesterday, having telegraphed to the police of Belfast, told us that there was no incident to suggest the question, beyond a trifling quarrel between two young boys, which might have occurred at any time and in any place?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to let me have the report which he has read to the House, I shall be glad to have a full inquiry made, and give a complete answer to all the statements made in the report. The Attorney General answered the question on the information supplied by the police of Belfast, and I am quite prepared to admit that we must have some further inquiry. But I do not gather from the report which has been read by the hon. Member—and that is the only opportunity I have had of hearing the facts—that there is much discrepancy between that statement and the statement made by my right hon. Friend from the information of the police. I do not think it would be an inconsistent conclusion to arrive at that the boy had had a quarrel with another boy, whose name he mentioned, when it is borne in mind that when the head constable went to see the boy only one name was given.

MR. SEXTON: Another policeman came later on.

MR. JACKSON: I do not know the date of the second policeman's visit, but it is quite possible that the other names were given after the information was supplied on which my right hon. Friend made his statement yesterday. However, there is no difficulty, and if the hon. Gentleman will give me the materials, I will make inquiries and furnish him with full and complete information, so far as the facts are submitted to us. I do not, however, find any complaint that the police failed in their duty, because it appears from the report that has been read that at certain points they protected this boy from violence. I do not see that the police neglected their duty, and the hon. Member may rest assured that we shall enforce protection of all classes by the authorities.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Do we then understand that the right hon. Gentleman, without further communication from this quarter of the House, will make inquiries as to what really took place?

MR. JACKSON: Certainly. Will the hon. Member tell me the name of the paper from which he read the extract just now?

MR. SEXTON: The Belfast Irish News.

MR. J. MORLEY: What the House wants to know—and knowing as I know what took place in Belfast in 1886, I appreciate the importance of the inquiry—is whether the Government is fully and accurately informed on this transaction, because unfortunately in Belfast there are now and again outbursts of a very serious kind, and this is a very serious matter.

MR. JACKSON: I do not underestimate the importance of this matter, and I ask that the report should be furnished to me to enable me to give a complete and categorical answer to all the allegations. At the same time, that report does not make any specific allegations against the police.

MR. SEXTON: I shall want the explanation on Thursday, and on that day on the Vote on Account I shall call the attention of the House to the origin of the Belfast riots in 1886, and the conduct of all concerned, and by all concerned I mean everyone from the police who gave the information to the Irish Attorney General up to the Prime Minister.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST MERCANTILE MARINE OFFICIALS.

MR. DALZIEL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the grave charges that have been made by the Sailors' and Firemen's Union with reference to the conduct of the Mercantile Marine officials at Sunderland and South Shields, and also as to the conduct of the boarding masters, who have been illegally supplying seamen, he will at once direct a full inquiry to be made by some responsible officer of the Board; and whether he is aware that the conduct of the Superintendent of the Mercantile Marine at Sunderland has been called into question on four different occasions, for the unfair way he has acted in encouraging the shipment of men at reduced wages and for the conveyance of such men from other ports to Sunderland?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): If any grave charge supported by adequate evidence that the Merchant Shipping Acts have been infringed, either by the Mercantile Marine officials or by the boarding masters at Sunderland and Shields, should be laid before the Board of Trade, I should certainly have it carefully investigated; but nothing has come before me at present which seems to demand such an inquiry as the hon. Member suggests. With regard to the boarding masters, I understand that prosecutions have been instituted and punishment inflicted in some cases. It is the duty of the Board of Trade officers to give every proper facility for the engagement of seamen at whatever rate of wages they may have agreed to serve; and the officers are expected to act with complete neutrality in cases of disputes between employers and employed.

MR. DALZIEL: I should like to ask whether, as a matter of fact, considerable discontent prevails with regard to the action of the Mercantile officers; and whether it is not the case that complaint has been made to the Board of Trade representing that the officers have in cases of dispute interfered on behalf of the employers against the men?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: One complaint has been made with respect to which the hon. Gentleman asked me a question the other day. I investigated it, and I found no reason to take any action.

SANITARY CONDITION OF GRANDBOROUGH.

MR. LEON (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the insanitary condition of the village of Grandborough in Bucks, and to the fact that the death rate during the last four months has been at the rate of fifty per one thousand per annum, and that there is no water fit to drink; and whether he will at once communicate with the Rural Sanitary Authority in order to improve the sanitary condition of the village?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I will answer the question on behalf of my right hon. Friend. The attention of the Local Government Board had not been called to the insanitary condition of the village of Grandborough, but since notice was given of the question they have communicated with the Sanitary Authority. They are informed, in reply, that the population of the village is three hundred and one, and that during the first four months of the present year there were five deaths, one from bronchitis, another from drowning, one from peritonitis, a fourth from pneumonia, and one from enteric fever. The Report of the Medical Officer of Health as to the water supply, given verbatim, is—

“I must tell you that the only water considered unfit for drinking purposes was closed last week. Another well is being closed outside the village. With that exception I believe the quality and quantity of water are good.”

The Local Government Board are also informed that notices under the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, have been served by the Sanitary Authority upon the owners of insanitary and overcrowded houses.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can give us any information with respect to the business of the Grand Committee on Trade? About a month since we received the usual notice, but as yet no business has been sent to the Committee. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the Government to send any Bills to that Committee; and, if so, what Bills will be sent?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have had the subject in my mind, and if the hon. Gentleman will put a notice on the paper I will make inquiries. I think, however, that I may say that no Bill of any importance will be sent to the Committee on Trade this Session. It may, perhaps, be convenient if I give notice that at the commencement of business to-morrow I shall move a Resolution having for its effect that the Grand Committee on Law do report the Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill by the 31st inst.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he could not defer that Motion to some day not taken up by such an important Bill as the Electors' Qualification and Registration Bill, to which everyone has been looking forward. Could he not make his Motion on Thursday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The business on Thursday is even more important than the business on Wednesday. I have no reason to believe that it will take very long, and it will leave ample time for an abstract discussion. I think, on the whole, it would be better to take it to-morrow than on Thursday.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he intends to move the Closure to-night at ten minutes to seven?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say anything with respect to the Irish Education Bill?

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to proceed with the Ordnance Factory Vote this Session, or will the Vote on Account cover it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. The Vote on Account is for Civil Service Estimates only, whereas the Ordnance Vote comes under the Army Estimates. In answer to the hon. Member for Waterford, I cannot mention a day for the Second Reading of the Irish Education Bill, but I hope it will not be long before we are able to take it.

MR. WEBB: Not before Monday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it can be taken before Monday.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will say whether the Government intend to support the Motion if made for Adjournment over the Derby Day, or whether they intend to sit?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This is an independent Motion in which the Government, as a Government, take no part one way or the other. I myself shall vote for the Adjournment.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND)

BILL—(No. 174.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [19th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(2.48.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The Chief Secretary in his speech last night devoted most of his time to showing why this Bill had not been introduced before; but he had to admit that after five years and nine months of office, and after having passed a Local Government Bill for England and a Local Government Bill for Scotland, the Government had still waited until Lord Salisbury had gone on the stump, and had been ably seconded in the country by the Leader of the House of Commons. They have thought the time good enough to bring in this Bill, when we are under the shadow of an immediate Dissolution. This is not merely the case with Local Government in Ireland; it is also the case with free education. Free Education Bills have been passed for England and Scotland, but we are in the same state of chaos. In fact, Irish Business is jostled and hustled and put off till the last moment till it becomes mixed up with the Dissolution. The Chief Secretary did not say much about the details of the measure, but seemed rather disposed to support himself by the speech of the Member for Wes

Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). He said that speech was a complete defence of the Bill and of all the details, and he endorsed that speech. Therefore, he said that the Government had put a good Bill before the House, and we ought to accept it as a good Bill and a satisfactory solution of the question. I allow that the Irish Members have to show that this is a bad Bill, or a Bill not sufficiently good for us to accept, and I think the manner in which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) dealt with the Bill was the proper one, to go through it step by step, and detail by detail, and that that course should be followed. The right hon. Gentleman is a shrewd tactician, and he put his best leg forward in this matter. He started by challenging us on the franchise, and asked us if it was not good. I admit it to be a good franchise. He then expressed his own dislike to the cumulative vote, but pointed out that that was not sufficient reason for refusing to accept the Bill. I will give him that point also. It is a somewhat dangerous experiment for Ireland, but you have it in England and Scotland, and it is not a sufficient reason for throwing out the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman also said the Bill was excellent, as it made the illiterate voter vote the same as any other man. His contention was that he did not desire to disfranchise any man, but would compel every illiterate voter to avail himself of the cloak of secrecy. With that I am entirely content, and I do not think there are many Irishmen in this House who oppose it. On the committee on the Ballot Act, at the request of the Chairman, I moved a Motion that the illiterate voter should vote like everybody else. That was for Parliamentary purposes, but it should be extended to County Council elections. There are three ways of voting in Ireland. There is the open voting for Poor Law Guardians, and that is shocking, for the result is that people are set against each other for years, and their votes are objects of contention. Then there is the man who cannot read. Nobody in the booth can ask him if he can read, and, unless he says he cannot, he votes like any other man, and in ninety-five per cent of the cases he could vote as he wished to do. I have spoken to many men on the subject, and they desire that the illiterate voter should not have the privileges he now possesses, but should have the greater privilege that nobody should make him disclose his vote. The illiterate vote at present is practically secret, though the voter does not think so. He only tells his vote to three persons. The presiding officer forgets all about it, the agent is his friend, and the personating agent takes an oath of secrecy, which, if he broke would be raked up against him years afterwards, and if he appeared in a Court of Law it would be said that he had committed legal perjury, so that I think the voter is practically safe. I approve of this secret illiterate vote. But here I part company with the right hon. Gentleman and hardly agree with him in anything else. He declared that the control of the police is not a question of great importance in Ireland, and asked why the County Councils should want it in Clare or Galway, when they had not got it in London. The cases are not analogous. We should be compared with a county like Devonshire in England, or Pembrokeshire in Wales, and there, I believe, the police are under the control of the County Council or a Joint Committee. If this Bill put us on the same footing as England on the question, it would cease to be a grievance. The right hon. Gentleman said the County Councils would have control of all the business managed by the County Councils in England, and in addition the control of woods and forests, county infirmaries, the working of the Factory Acts, and sanitary legislation. Under the Bill the control of woods and forests is absolutely illusory, as any proposal for purchase will have to go before the Joint Committee of the Grand Jury and County Council. As far as the infirmaries are concerned, it will be a slight improvement to have them under the control of some County Authority. As to the control of the working of the Factory Acts, that would be useless in many counties; we have very few factories, but we want to create them, and we would rather watch how you control them in England, and then follow your example. I attach no importance to that part of the Bill. There is some use in sanitary legislation. The right hon. Gentleman said that was the most important part of Local Government. It may be so in a large town like Birmingham, where it affects the health of the whole of the inhabitants; but it is not so important where the people are scattered over a large extent of country. The right hon. Gentleman has a proposal to spend ten millions on sanitary matters in Birmingham, but such things do not occur in Ireland, and we have a fair system of sanitary administration at present by the Poor Law Guardians, who have done their work very satisfactorily. Water has been brought to some of the small towns, and the burial grounds have been walled in; but, on the other hand, there has been a deal of money spent or wasted. If you transfer those duties to the County Council they will have to compensate the old officers and pay new ones; and I do not see how the County Councils would work the sanitary legislation, except through the present Poor Law Boards. The area would be too large for the County Councils, and the Baronial Councils do not sit so often as the Poor Law Boards. I do not, therefore, attach much importance to the question of sanitary legislation for the county districts. The right hon. Gentleman then found fault with us for being angry with the amount of security taken from the County Councils; he said we were wrong to call out and say that we were insulted by these securities, and that their effect was almost nil, and that under the Acts of 1882 and 1885 some similar securities were taken. Those securities exist now, and we do not much object to them. We do not object to the Councillors being sued if a legal action lies against them, but what we regard as an insult is the insertion of a certain clause providing for the trial of County Councillors; and it is not merely the clause, but the clause coupled with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. The First Lord of the Treasury is one of the most accomplished speakers and debaters in the House, but his speech on the introduction of the Bill was not a happy one. I do not know if he secretly dislikes the Bill. For an English Member to bring in a Bill containing a clause which is not in the English and Scotch Bills, and to state that if a County Council was found guilty they would be punished, was stating the case with a good deal of brutal frankness; and if we have used rather stronger words than necessary in speaking of the clause, the blame is due to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham tried to soften this down, and said it was quite certain the majority would change the wording of this portion of the Bill, and put another word in place of "oppression." There are a considerable number of Gentlemen who follow the right hon. Gentleman, and doubtless his promise would be effective; but I expect the new word would mean practically the same thing, and that if we proposed words with another meaning they would be rejected. It has been said that Poor Law Boards have been suspended, but they are not such important bodies as the County Councils would be. But, as a general rule, if a Board pays its way, and does not spend too much money, there is not much danger of its being suspended. We protest against the position of the County Council, for the Clerk to the Grand Jury acts as their Clerk, and they would have no control over him, could neither appoint nor dismiss him, and yet he would be there, constantly reminding them that they were acting illegally, and observing the whole of their actions. With this clause the Bill is absolutely useless, and the Councils will have nothing to do. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham declares that only three per cent. of the whole money administered would be out of the exclusive control of the County Council—that 97 per cent. would be in their hands. How on earth the right hon. Gentleman arrived at that conclusion I cannot possibly conceive. If he had reversed the proportions I think it would have been nearer the mark. My own impression is that about fifteen per cent. will be under the control of the County Councils. The right hon. Gentleman made the statement as an absolute fact, but gave no figures to prove it. I will take some of the figures and show that he is wrong. The right hon. Gentleman said—"You are going to appoint all the officers except two, the Secretary to the Grand Jury and the County Surveyor"—there are two Surveyors in some counties. There are only three classes of officers under the Bill. The Clerk is the legal adviser of the Council, keeps all the records, does all the writing, and has control of the general management of the Council. The County Surveyors manage the whole of the roads and bridges, and practically the Grand Jury, or their subordinate tribunals, the Presentment Sessions, control the Surveyors. The Baronial Council is a fine-sounding name, but the baronial constables do nothing except collect the rates; and, so far as I can make out the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, the County Councils are simply to be allowed the appointment of the officers who collect the rates. I am not even certain that they can appoint the baronial constables, because I do not find it in the Bill. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland will give me some information on this point. I believe they are appointed at present by the Presentment Sessions and the county at large, where all the magistrates are present, and the appointments are afterwards ratified by the Grand Jury. But if they can appoint them, that is all the power that is left to the County Councils; the whole management will be in the hands of an official. I have often presided at these Baronial Sessions, and assisted at them. A number of contracts are given out for the repair of roads. We always choose the cheapest tender, but the County Surveyor may object to the cheapest, and if we interfere he tells us he has the law on his side. Practically, we cannot interfere with his objection, and, so far as I can see, these Presentment Sessions have no power whatsoever. We can ask the County Surveyor, as a great favour, to make or repair the roads a little better, and he may say he would do so to oblige us. The Grand Jury have the power of dismissing him, but that power is not to be given to the new County Council, and therefore I say that the whole management of the roads and bridges is left in the hands of the Joint Committee. The County Councils will be entirely in the hands of the Surveyor for the ordinary repair of the roads and bridges. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) is generally very accurate in his facts and figures; but I think he made a mistake when he said that it did not appear to him that the representatives of the Grand Jury on the Joint Committee can fairly be described as landowners, and that they include a number of the largest cesspayers. Practically they are nothing else whatever but landowners. At the Baronial Sessions a number of the largest cesspayers are put on along with the magistrates, but on the Grand Jury there is nothing of the kind. I think the right hon. Gentleman mixed up the two things. The Sheriff has absolute control of the Grand Jury, and, to a great extent, he is limited by custom and precedent. What he practically does is to call the largest landowners. Where there is a titled Peer he calls his eldest son, and sometimes his agent, in his place. Sometimes he calls a Member of Parliament. But I think, on the whole, the Grand Jury is a fair working body. It is not a particularly dishonest body. I have heard that when certain appointments are to be made the Sheriff calls certain members of the Grand Jury who he thinks would be favourable to one side or another. I have heard that when large Railway Companies were likely to come into conflict with the Grand Jury they adopted the course of having some of the Directors belong to the Grand Jury. I believe it to be true, though there is a difficulty in proving it, that a Grand Jury was actually called to give one company a preference over another. People are not called on the Grand Jury because they are cesspayers, a very large number of the largest cesspayers in the country are left out, and the Grand Jury is essentially composed of the landowners. As to the question of the odd man in the Joint Committee, who is still in dispute, impartial men are not easily got even in England. At any rate, the Grand Jury will have a large representation on this Joint Committee, and under this Bill the County Council will be bound at every step, and in every movement it makes it will find itself stopped by this Joint Committee, and it will be able to take no independent action whatever, except to a trifling extent watching the repair of roads and bridges, but even that only through an officer whom the Joint Committee can dismiss. They will be able to appoint the baronial constables who collect the rates; they will have the collecting of the money, and the Joint Committee will have the spending of it. It may be said that what is proposed by the Bill is better than the present state of affairs. Well, I do not say it is not. There is a certain sort of election, and I do not say that it is not better than the Grand Jury system; but we must remember that we shall have to pay a large amount of hard cash for it. It will take a good deal of money to start it for four or five years. Any Bill, however, will cost money; but why should we go to that expense for a bad Bill at the fag end, I will not say of a Session, but of a Parliament? This Bill is so bad that no change would improve it satisfactorily, unless it were remodelled lock, stock, and barrel. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) said he represented the strongest Irish Party in this House, and that they supported this Bill. I have counted them, and I cannot make more than eighteen, including the right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the Universities, and I do not know exactly whether they are under the control of the hon. and gallant Gentleman or not. There are eighty-five Nationalist Members. He has pointed out that they are at present disunited. I am sorry to say that is so, but we are united in thinking that this is a perfectly bad Bill, and I believe that when a really good Bill is introduced we will be united again. This is such a very bad Bill that we could not possibly support it. The Members for Ireland were prepared to give this Bill a fair hearing, and if it had been acceptable to them they would have gone to their constituents and told them this was a good Bill they had got for them, and they would have supported it. But this Bill is so bad that it is quite out of the question. I do not think the Government could change the Bill so as to make it a good Bill. What I ask the Government to do is to make up their minds, when there are eighty-five Irish Members against and only eighteen Irish Members for this Local Government Bill, to pass the Irish Education Bill. Then they can do anything they like with this Local Government Bill. They can pass it or throw it up if they like, but I shall deny the manifestly unfair statement that it is a good measure, equal to those which were given to England or to Scotland.

*(3.31.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I have been rather unfortunate so far as this Debate is concerned, having been from necessity absent almost throughout the entire discussion. I am sorry the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) is not in the House at this moment. He said some unkind things about me which were perfectly gratuitous, for I had taken no part in the Debate; and, inasmuch as I am going to speak very plainly about that hon. Gentleman, I should have been very glad if he had now been in his place. The hon. Member appeared yesterday, so far as this Bill is concerned, in a somewhat new rôle. He professed to speak for the whole of the Nationalist Members, and for the Ulster Protestant farmers. He said that this Bill was rejected by the entire Nationalist Party in Ireland, and that it was despised and contemned by the Ulster Protestant farmers. Now, I am not going to challenge the hon. Member's right to speak for the Irish Nationalists—that is their business and not mine—but when he speaks in the name of the Protestant farmers of Ulster I must ask him where he got his mandate and his instructions? The last time that the hon. Member appeared before these Ulster farmers he was ruthlessly driven from the country, and I will now make this challenge to him. We are not far from a General Election, and I am glad of it, and if the hon. Member for North-East Cork has any love for the Ulster Protestant farmers, and thinks that he is their true Representative, I invite him to go back to his old constituency of South Tyrone, and I will undertake to prove not only to himself, but to the country, that the hon. Member never had, and has not now, the slightest title to speak for or to represent that body. He will not, if he goes there, require the protection of the Royal Irish Constabulary—he requires that in Cork—he will not require any protection whatever; the Protestant farmers will deal with him with other weapons; he will be killed with ridicule and with the contempt which he has so richly earned. Any verdict upon the Bill now before the House must depend, I believe, entirely upon what individual Members expected the Bill to be. I can quite understand the disappointment of those Members who thought the Government were going to introduce a Home Rule Bill under the guise of Local Government; and also of those Members who expected that instead of the reform of county administration the Bill was to deal with the administration of Dublin Castle. Such Members have a right to be disappointed with the Bill. It is not a Home Rule measure, or a Bill for the reform of Dublin Castle, but it is precisely according to the pledge given by the Government, namely, that they would introduce a Bill on the lines of the English and Scotch measures. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) thought that it would be a possible Bill if it had proposed to buy up the grass farms in Ireland.

COLONEL NOLAN: No, I did not say that.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: At any rate, if that provision had been within the four corners of the Bill, it would have commended itself somewhat to the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

COLONEL NOLAN: Hear, hear!

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes, but a Bill that proposed such powers would probably not have commended itself to this House, or to the taxpayers of the country; and I do not know what hon. Gentlemen sitting around me, who have almost sworn that they will never give another sixpence for such a purpose, would say to such a proposal as the buying up of the grass lands in Galway or all over Ireland. But what the Government undertook to do was to propose a reform in the county administration of Ireland, and the real question is whether the Bill redeems that pledge. I am bound to say that if the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) intended in his speech to burlesque the Bill then his speech was an exceedingly successful effort. But burlesque is hardly the thing for this House, and I prefer to look at the Bill and see what it really does. First of all, regarding the franchise, let me ask this question of any hon. Member. I do not care what part of the House he sits in. Has the Government redeemed its pledge so far as the franchise is concerned? I put it to this test. I will assume that this Bill passes into Committee. Would it be possible for any hon. Member on this side of the House to move an Amendment that would widen the franchise that is given by the Bill? That is a fair test. If this Bill passed into Committee hon. Members would not be able to propose an Amendment in Committee that would widen the franchise that the Government have given.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Certainly.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: If they did, they would take the franchise beyond the franchise that has been conferred either in England or in Scotland. This Bill gives a vote to every cesspayer. You cannot go deeper than that. The Bill gives every cesspayer, whether he lives in a cottage or in a castle, the same vote. I hold that, with such a franchise, it cannot reasonably or fairly be contended that the Bill is not "broad-based upon the people's will." Then, as to the functions of the new body. Let us see what the Government have done there—let us see if they have redeemed their pledge upon that point. In one respect the Bill is better than the English Act—I was going to say it was better than, but it is practically on the same lines as, the Scottish Act. It not only gives County Councils to administer county finance, but it creates District Councils, a thing which has been asked for almost every week by hon. Members sitting beside me. Therefore, upon that point, it is an improvement on the English Bill. As to the functions of the new bodies, I say unhesitatingly that all the fiscal business of the Grand Juries is handed over and transferred to these new bodies. In addition to that, they are at liberty to take over the sanitary work of the locality. They take over the powers relating to the Cattle Diseases Acts, and other Acts of that kind. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan) made light of some of that work. He talked about factories, and asked what was the use of conferring powers regarding factories on a country that had no factories. But the hon. and gallant Gentleman fell into the mistake of thinking that Galway is Ireland. I quite admit that there are no factories in Galway, and it is an exceedingly interesting question how it comes that there are no factories there. But there are factories elsewhere. There are factories in my own constituency, and I do not think it of no importance that the body which has the administration of county affairs should have the control of the laws regulating those factories. I say, so far as the functions of those bodies are concerned, that, roughly speaking, the same powers that were transferred under the English Bill from the English Justices, and under the Scottish Bill from the Scotch Commissioners of Supply, have been transferred to the Irish County Councils, plus this: that there are District Councils in this Bill as well as County Councils. There are four complaints made on this head. The first is that the Bill does not give powers over the police to the County Councils. My first answer to that is that the police were not under the control of the Grand Juries. This Bill proposes to transfer certain functions from the Grand Jury to the County Council. The Grand Jury never had any control, any power, over the Police Force of Ireland. Therefore, what they had not could not be transferred. Then, in the second place, the police, as everybody knows, is a centralised force in Ireland. It is not, and has not been, amenable to local control, and it is certainly a large order to ask that that force, which you refused to hand over to a Home Rule Parliament, should be handed over to a County Council. I say that is a wonderful growth in six years; it is a wonderful piece of procedure, but I do not think that any reasonable man, looking at the state of Ireland during the last thirteen years, can complain that the Government have not proposed to hand over to these Local Bodies the power of the Irish police when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) was not prepared, in 1886, to hand these policemen unreservedly over to an Irish Parliament. The London County Council has no power over the police. The English and Scotch County Councils have not complete control over their police. They have only the control of the police in conjunction with the Standing Joint Committee, and is it to be contended or argued that Ireland is to be the country where this first step is to be taken and where this tremendous experiment is to be made? Is it to be contended that Ireland offers precisely the field that is suitable for this great experiment. I think you cannot fairly ask that Ireland should be the theatre for the first experiment of the kind that you have withheld from the County Council in London, and that you have refused to do and have not done in any English county. The next point of objection is that the malicious injury presentments have not been transferred to the County Council. That is true, but the awarding of sums for malicious injury is not a matter of county administration. It is a judicial, or at least a quasi-judicial function. I do not think myself that the provision to leave that in the hands of the Grand Jury is a proper provision. I should like to see it changed. I should like it to be given to a judicial authority; but I say without the slightest hesitation that the worst possible authority you could give it to would be the County Council. If you handed this power over to the County Council every member of that body would be pecuniarily interested in throwing out every application. It would be to his own personal interest, apart from the interest of his constituents, to throw out every application. Another objection is that the Grand Jury is left at all. Hon. Members think that the Grand Jury ought to have been abolished. But Grand Juries have not been abolished in England; and if this Bill becomes law, the Grand Jury will practically be left only with judicial functions, and all the fiscal functions that they possessed will be transferred. Here, again, I repeat that we are not entitled to make such an experiment in Ireland first. The most important objection of all, however, is the objection dealing with the Standing Joint Committee. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) said if that provision and one or two others were out of the Bill he thought he could reconsider his decision to vote against it. I would like to deal with this question of the Joint Committee seriously. The hon. Member for West Belfast, in what I call a speech which burlesqued the Bill——

MR. SEXTON: In reference to that observation, I beg to say that I categorically and most precisely specified to the House several particulars in which the Standing Joint Committee controls the County Council, and I am prepared to affirm, prove, and justify my contention in every particular here or anywhere else.

*MR. RUSSELL: I have no doubt of that. I am only giving my opinion of the gist of the hon. Member's speech. In the first place, I would like to say that whatever objection may be taken to the Standing Joint Committee it is distinctly within the pledge given by the Government. It is in the Scotch Bill, and the Government proposed to introduce a Bill on the lines of the English and Scotch measures. Unquestionably the County Council, apart altogether from the question of the Standing Joint Committee, would be able to control the ordinary expenditure, which the Grand Jury now control. That is a great amount of the total expenditure, and the capital expenditure is small in comparison with the ordinary or current expenditure. It was only on the point of capital expenditure, roughly speaking, that the control of the Standing Joint Committee came in. I would ask hon. Members this question. Do they think, does this House think, that there ought to be no control in this matter? Just let us look at who pays the cess in Ireland. Surely taxation and representation ought to go together. We have been deliberately warned, on more than one occasion, that we may create these County Councils if we like, but that they will be captured and held as Nationalist positions. But let me take one instance from the West of Ireland—that of the barony of Castlerea. The total valuation of this barony is £40,534, and the total number of cesspayers in it is 2,600. Now, nine men out of the 2,600 pay one-fourth of the total county cess, and thirty-five more than half of the entire amount. These are precisely the class of men who have very little chance of being elected on the County Councils. Why? Because the Councils are to be captured and held as Nationalist positions. What hon. Members say is that the people who pay the greatest amount of county cess shall have absolutely no representation or control at all, and yet that the large majority of cesspayers who pay the smallest moiety shall have control over the entire cess. Now, I do not see how we can yield to such a demand as that. These people have a right to some reasonable control over the expenditure, but not to the entire control. It has been said that the real reason why the Standing Committee was appointed for Scotland was that the landlords pay half the rate. That is absolutely true; but I have given the case of one barony in Ireland, and that one is only a sample of the whole country.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Not as to the landlords.

*MR. RUSSELL: The hon. Member for North Cork is simply drawing a bow at a venture, and making an assertion without any ground whatever. It is true that in Scotland the landlords pay half the rate, but the House will see that in this case the landowners are occupiers as well, and I hold that such men have some right to protection at the hands of the House. I now come to another difficulty connected with the franchise, and it is one to which I should be glad to call the attention of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). When this Bill was read a first time I had some doubts as to the usefulness of the cumulative vote. My general idea at that time was that it would give a substantial representation to Catholic minorities in the North of Ireland, and a very unsubstantial representation to Protestant minorities in the South. I have since had reason to change my mind. Take the North of Ireland, for instance, and what do we find? In the County of Antrim, for example, out of a total population of 172,000, excluding Belfast, there are 36,000 Roman Catholics. If we take the County of Down we find that out of 173,000 inhabitants 73,000 are Catholics. There, again, the Catholics are in a great minority, and they would run the risk of not having a fair share of representation.

MR. SEXTON: In reply to the appeal of the hon. Member, I would say that, in my opinion, the Catholics in the Counties of Antrim and Down would have their share of representation.

*MR. RUSSELL: I am interested in the testimony of the hon. Member; but I think evidence has been given upstairs on this subject.

MR. SEXTON: No; the hon. Member must be aware that not a single witness has been called before the Committee.

*MR. RUSSELL: I will not contradict the hon. Gentleman in regard to evidence which has not yet been reported. My view is that, so far as the cumulative vote is concerned, it is one of the best features in the Bill. A right hon. Gentleman on the Opposition Front Bench seems to be very much amused in regard to that statement. I do not see why. I do not believe in the divine right of majority representation. It may commend itself to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), but I have parted company with it.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): The hon. Member must be referring to a statement of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain).

*MR. RUSSELL: I am not bound to agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham in everything. I say that, under the special circumstances of Ireland, the cumulative vote is a fair plan to adopt in a measure like this, and that it is not a new plan. In all the School Board elections in England you have adopted it in precisely the same way. Now I come to the question of the illiterate voter. Why should he be placed in such a position that when he goes into the polling booth another person has the power to intimidate him under the excuse that the voter is ignorant and unable to read and write? I do not take refuge in the fact that only a fortnight ago this House passed a Resolution approving of the principle of withdrawing the privilege which the illiterate voters now possess. I only point out that there is no proposal in this Bill for the disfranchisement of the illiterate voter. To disfranchise any man you must disqualify him, and strike his name off the list of voters. Neither of these things is done by this Bill. The illiterate voter is in the same position as other voters. He will be free to go into the polling booth and do what he likes in it. We may be very anxious to court the smiles of the people, but we need not bow down to ignorance. There is only one thing more about which I wish to say a few words. This Bill has been largely discussed on the Second Reading as if it had been in the Committee stage. I do not profess to agree with all its details—I do not care, for example, for the clause giving the Grand Jury the power of dealing with the question of malicious injury, nor for the provisions which make the Sheriff the Chairman of the Standing Committee.

An hon. MEMBER: He is not to be.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: He is suggested as the Chairman. As to the safeguards provided by the Bill, I repeat now what I said on the First Reading. I am not able—and if it comes to the vote I shall not be able—to vote in favour of the clause which enables the members of a County Council to be taken before a Judge. I have not changed my mind in the least in regard to that. I think that the present law is sufficient to deal with malversation and corruption, and I would not put the County Councils in such a position. But that is not of the essence of the Bill, and I set very small store indeed upon the declaration of hon. Members below the Gangway with regard to the hostility which they say exists to the measure. I heard such a declaration in the discussions on the Land Bill of 1890. The Leader of their Party then came down to the House and moved the rejection of that Bill, and the whole of the Party marched into the Lobby against it; but in the following year I saw them come back—all glad to get a worse Bill.

MR. SEXTON: Not glad.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Well, I may put my own interpretation upon it. I saw what happened in that case, and I now say that I believe that this Bill is a substantially good Bill in principle. I do not commit myself to all its details, but I shall certainly vote for its Second Reading.

(4.3.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): It is with some reluctance that I enter into this Debate. It is far more agreeable and satisfactory to me to meet what I may call the imperfect measures of the Government such as we have had in former Sessions and in the present, and to lend my humble efforts towards the improvement of those measures, than to take up the ground of objecting to the whole basis of a Bill and to appear as an opponent to a measure which, in the view of the Government, is calculated to be for the good of Ireland. It is remarkable that we are now debating the Second Reading of a measure with regard to which we have no means of forming a judgment whether it is intended to make a serious effort to pass it into law. However, having the Second Reading before us, and viewing the very important position that this measure holds in respect to the professions of parties, and to the whole policy of the Government, I do not feel that I can avoid taking part in the discussion. It has been said that this is a Bill of a limited scope for the improvement of—the hon. Member behind me said with perfect truth that it makes no profession to do more than to improve—the Local Government of Ireland by means of County Councils, and that it may be discussed upon that basis alone. However, we have to consider of what professions made at a former critical period when the Members of this House received their commission from their constituents this Bill is the solitary and lingering representative. It was not then intimated to us that we were to deal with Irish Local Government upon a basis—as we think we find it here—distinctly inferior to that which has been adopted for England and Scotland. It was not then told us that Local Government was all that the Party which obtained a majority at the General Election was able to offer to the country. Local Government for Ireland, put upon full equality with the Local Government of England and Scotland, was the minimum of the promises that were made by the leaders of Parties, and especially by the leaders of that Party which has made the minority of the Government into a majority, and which has effectively carried on the Government and made possible its existence for the last six years, and which went far beyond the promises of merely local institutions. I speak of the Duke of Devonshire and my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). These gentlemen were not content to say that they offered a good Local Government Bill for Ireland in lieu of the Home Rule Bill. They spoke of everything that was short of an independent Parliament; they spoke of provincial assemblies; they spoke of radically re-constituting the whole Irish administrative system. That was the promise of the new Government. They spoke of a large devolution even of national powers to an Irish Assembly. All these promises have dwindled away in the Bill which is now before us. Take their last—that is, their new—promise; because, by all that is known of it, we shall ultimately have to try this Bill. I take, as an instance as the minimum of what they offered to Ireland, the utterance of my right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. He said—

“Against a policy of separate and uncontrolled executive in Ireland the Unionists set up a policy—”

[At this point the right hon. Gentleman, being unable readily to decipher the manuscript from which he was quoting, turned to Mr. JOHN MORLEY, saying, “Will you kindly read it for me?” This Mr. MORLEY did, as follows:—

Mr. T. W. Russell

"Against the policy of separate and uncontrolled executive in Ireland the Unionists set up a policy of the extension of the power of self-government in Ireland on lines applicable—subject to necessary modification—to the people of England and Scotland as well."]

That was the declaration on the part of a right hon. Gentleman who certainly never has been distinguished by the liberality of his ideas with regard to Ireland. On the part of the Government of that day, we have the letter of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), in which much more was stated, because there the local institutions which were to be given to Ireland were to be not only equivalent, but contemporaneous, with the gift to England and to Scotland. And now, after six years, we are engaged in discussing as the entire result of those promises, and of the pledges made before the country in 1886, a Bill which, while undoubtedly it is confined to Local Government, starts from the very minimum of what the most parsimonious among those promisers offered to give, a Bill which in giving that minimum of Local Government, as we undertake to show, stamps Ireland all through with inequality and inferiority, and stamps the gift as less than that which has been awarded to counties in England and in Scotland, and falsifies even the last miserable and contracted relic of those engagements which were offered to the country, and which were taken by the country, as the condition on which the commission of 1886 was entrusted to the present majority in this House. Well, Sir, I must also consider not only what is the Bill offered, but who are those that offer it, and with what accompaniments. We were, at the period of 1886, much disposed to concur in opinions which had been delivered by Lord Salisbury as to the special dangers or difficulties that would attend the foundation of local institutions in a country like Ireland, apart from any source in a local Parliament which might be established in Ireland, and from the control which such a local Parliament could exercise. The people of Ireland have not been sighing and longing during these six arduous years for Local Government, but for something more than Local Government, and this Local Government with which they are now desired to be content—this Local Government is given them in lieu of that larger measure on which their hearts are set. And the very Minister, the head of this Government, who offers to them the Bill now before the House, warns them that if instead of accepting this Local Government Bill they prosecute the object dearest to their hearts, they prosecute it at the hazard, at the certain expense, of civil war, to which that Prime Minister holds the language of distinct encouragement. It is necessary, Sir, that this should be stated in this House, and that I should go so far, with your permission, as to give distinct and definite explanation of my meaning in order that we may know whether those opinions of Lord Salisbury are the opinions of the Ministry at large, or what defence is intended to be alleged or set up on behalf of the use of such language by persons holding such a position. It will be very easy to sustain at length the statement I have made, but I will only give the upshot of the declarations of Lord Salisbury on 6th May. I have with me now the speech reported in the Times on the 7th; and if the fairness of my statement is challenged, I will quote the words of Lord Salisbury and the actual passages of the report. The upshot of the statement was this—that to pass a Bill constituting a Parliament in Dublin, subject to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, is to place the people of Ulster under Dr. Walsh and his political friends; and that to place the people of Ulster under Dr. Walsh and his political friends was one of those excesses of power, one of those violations of understood principle by which all Parliaments and Governments are limited, which would throw the people back upon the rights which they exercised, according to Lord Salisbury, in the reign of James II.; and, finally, that if to maintain the law against rebellion it were necessary in such a case, after the passing of such a law in the Imperial Parliament—if it were necessary to use the Forces of the Crown to maintain such a law against rebellious disobedience—that would be such an outrage as would rend society in two. That, Sir, is the declaration of the Prime Minister—not a prophecy alone—but a distinct encouragement, if such a law should be passed, to the few misguided men who might be capable of imbibing the dangerous doctrines of the Prime Minister—a distinct encouragement to them to resort to the use of unlawful arms against the constituted Authority of this country and against its deliberate decision. What is the state of the law against which Lord Salisbury thinks such action might be adopted? What is the state of law which is now maintained? It is the state of law established by the Act of Union. What was the condition of Ireland before the Act of Union? It was that of a country governed by a Parliament as entirely separate and as entirely independent as is the Parliament sitting within these walls at the present day. The whole powers of that Parliament were given away; the national life and traditions were made over without even the previous process of a Dissolution—were made over by men who sat within its walls upon their own discretion to another land, to another body; and there indeed—if you can have an excess of power bringing into question the first principles of society—there is one of the most glaring instances of it to be found in the records of history. That offers no difficulty to Lord Salisbury; that was a perfectly regular proceeding, although the supreme power was given away. But should this House—this omnipotent Parliament—should this Institution think fit to exercise its discretion—in what sense?—not in the sense of giving back the supremacy to Ireland, not in the sense of altering the seat of the supreme power, but in the sense of investing Ireland with the control, and independent control of its own local affairs—then, indeed, the foundation of society will be broken in two! Sir, it is impossible to conceive a more perfect contempt for all history, for all political principle, or all practical wisdom or sagacity, than as it appears to me is contained in this declaration. And as I think we have a right to know from the Government whether, in case the Legislature should think fit to give back to Ireland a portion of what we took from it, that law will be a law which it will be the duty of the Government to support, and, in case of need, to enforce against disobedience and rebellion. Those are the conditions on which Irish Members, and on which this House have offered to them, the stinted gift that is supposed to be contained in the Bill now before the House. But surely, Sir, after such a reduction of promises, after the re-constitution of the administrative system has vanished into thin air, after the exhibition of Dublin Castle as an object suited to cast out the horrors of mankind has been entirely forgotten, after even Provincial Councils in Ireland are no more within the scope of the political horizon, at least we ought to expect that this County Government Bill would emulate the Bills for Scotland and for England in generosity and efficiency, and to that last test we have now to subject the provisions of the Bill. I will not go through all the points of controversy in a large and complicated Bill; but what I see in endeavouring to analyse it is this: that Her Majesty's Government have been hampered by the recollection that there was to be some relation or other between the Irish Local Government Bill and the Bills for England and for Scotland. Consequently, they had gone searching here and there, and everywhere for something in the nature of a precedent that might abet their aim in restricting the already dwarfed measure that they were about to produce to the House. Well, Sir, in these Local Government Bills for England and Scotland, and here and there in our legislation, there are of course a number of doubtful enactments, and there are some, in my opinion, of unquestionable unwisdom. Wherever that is the case it has been carefully adopted. Not only has it been made to do duty as a precedent; but in carrying it over to Ireland it has been magnified, it has been exaggerated, it has been applied to new subject-matter, it has been stripped of every limitation and safeguard that qualifies the mischief it might do in this country, and then it is offered to the Sister Island as the final boon of a generous Government, and as a fulfilment of the promise of 1886. Let us look at these cases and see how they stand, because it is better not to dwell upon a great number of instances. And the first case I take is the case of that provision of our law which has fixed the boundaries of electoral divisions by an authority extraneous to Parliament. So far as I recollect, in our various Reform Bills that has always been found necessary. Parliament has not absolutely fixed in the first instance—but it has been done by subsequent Act—the actual outlines of the several electoral divisions. There is a principle taken from English and Scotch law, from the Parliamentary law of the country, which enables us to say that we may give some discretion outside Parliament in fixing the divisions of the counties that are to exercise the franchise under the present Bill. Here I will make one reference to the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. T. W. Russell). He says, with perfect fairness, that the franchise is a very wide franchise; but let me say that the width of the franchise most essential to a good popular Constitution, where it is accompanied with other provisions, is worthless unless those other provisions are supplied to make sure that the franchise, when it has been exercised, shall lead to a well-organised system of proper and adequate results. You will find no more extended franchise, I believe, than the franchise which determined that Louis Napoleon should be Emperor; but upon that aye or no the whole virtue of the Franchise was exhausted; and though there can be no objection to it in point of width, there are great objections to it in point of efficacy. The efficacy of this franchise depends, first of all, upon the manner in which it is to be given, and the very first of all, upon the mode in which the counties are to be marshalled and to be divided for the purpose of electing County Councils. And what does the Bill say upon that subject? And how does it stand in connection with the English precedent? In the English precedent every electoral division is fixed by Parliament. Then for the determination of the boundaries strict rules are laid down, and, finally, the applying of those strict rules to the facts of the case is a task entrusted to an impartial and a non-political authority. How stands that function in the present Bill? It is handed over bodily to the absolutely unlimited and arbitrary discretion of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He is to divide up the counties—the Bill does not say into how many divisions, nor does it say that they are to be made relative to the population. He is under no restraint whatever as to the size of these divisions, as to the number of people they shall contain, or finally as to the number of representatives in a County Council, which it is in his power to commit to them. He may go through the five counties of Ulster where there is a Roman Catholic majority, and he may in any one of those counties so manipulate the divisions that a large number of the County Councils must be returned, I will not say hostile, but, at all events, opposed to that Roman Catholic majority. There is no limit to his discretion. He may make a division here of 50,000, with two representatives, and a division there of 5,000, with five representatives. The whole of this Bill, by that one provision as it now stands, absolutely places at the command of the Lord Lieutenant—for the purpose of enabling him, if pleases, to destroy the whole effect the Bill as a Bill enfranchising for the purposes of Local Government—the population of the counties of Ireland. So much for the case of the boundaries. It will be observed, then, that there is a precedent for calling in the aid of an extraneous authority; and while we invoke so far its countenance, we studiously cast aside and throw overboard all the limitations which make the exercise of that authority safe and convenient, and we constitute an absolutely unlimited power in a manner which cuts at the very root of this Bill, by enabling the Lord Lieutenant to defeat the whole purpose of the Legislature. Then, Sir, I take the next of the three precedents which I intended to touch upon—that is, the dissolution of an elected body by a non-elected authority. And here I must give myself the satisfaction of paying a just compliment to the speech of the hon. Member behind me (Mr. T. W. Russell), who has just sat down. He has shown by that speech and he has shown, I think, on other occasions, if he will forgive me for saying so, that he can stand a good deal, but there are some things which he cannot stand ; and it does him honour, as it gives me satisfaction to record that this provision for the dissolution of the County Councils upon the dictum of two Judges is more than he can endure, and he intends to offer to it a stout resistance. That provision, however, is a vital part of the Bill. In the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Irish Attorney General (Mr. Madden) I observed that the epithet "vital" was introduced, and, I think, repeated at the particular portion of his speech which immediately preceded the provisions about the Joint Committee and the provisions about the dissolution of the Councils, and I think the hon. Member will have to look out in order to see that he can with safety exercise the liberty which he has promised to himself to put in use, or he may find he is in the condition of disturbing the foundations of this great Administration and endangering the unity of the Empire. And how do we stand with regard to this principle of dissolving an elected body? It appears to me that this is a very serious affair indeed, and the precedents which exist are, in my opinion, open to some questioning in themselves. As far as I know there are two precedents—one of them in Ireland with regard to the Boards of Guardians, and the other in England with regard to the School Boards—where provisions are undoubtedly embodied in a law for the dissolution by an authority that is non-elective of a body which is elective. Well, Sir, how do these stand? In England a School Board may be dissolved at the discretion of the Education Department for certain offences, and likewise for failures of duty, which I must say are described in rather large and loose words, which I have difficulty in justifying. But when a dissolution of a School Board has been effected, what takes place? A re-election. But there is to be no re-election of a County Council in Ireland by the same constituency after it has been dissolved. The Government have before them the precedent of the School Board where the large and loose words of power to dissolve are accompanied by a stringent provision for re-election by the same popular constituency, yet here, as in every other case, they cast aside the good part of the enactment, and adopt the bad. They make the large and loose words far larger and looser still ; but they abandon the safe and salutary provisions of the Education Act of 1870, which requires the re-election of another School Board by the same constituency. Then take the case of the Boards of Guardians. Precedents in Ireland are not entitled, perhaps, to very great veneration in themselves. But what is the case of the Boards of Guardians in Ireland? They can be dissolved by the Local Government Board. I admit the Local Government Board cannot be considered as an impartial civil authority. It partakes of a political colour, because it is, I believe, under the control and discretion of the Chief Secretary. But that is not all. That power of dissolution, even of Boards of Guardians, must be exercised upon conditions that are rather strictly defined. They can only be dissolved either for not holding meetings which are recognised by the proper authority, or for default of the purposes contemplated by the Act. So that the meaning of that is that the Guardians are dissolved by summary process for not having conformed to the conditions of the Act of Parliament, instead of being subjected to the more cumbrous process of being dissolved by the Courts of Law. But what I want to point out is that in the case of the School Boards, where the words are large and loose, but are covered by the provision for re-election, the re-election is cut out and the large and loose words are retained. In the case of the Boards of Guardians where there is no re-election, where the Executive Authority steps in and appoints paid officers to discharge the business of the Poor Law, they perform exactly the same process in principle, with a complete inversion in form—that is to say, they retain the portion with regard to re-election, but they part with the loose words that confine within limits the exercise of the prerogative of the central authority. That, Sir, I affirm is the manner which all through, so far as I have been able to examine, the precedent is not used but abused. It is transformed, transplanted, misapplied. It is given to new subject-matter, and everything that keeps it within safe bounds and limits is dispensed with in order that provisions, really quite new, may be presented for the acceptance of the people of Ireland. I must say another word, apart from the question of precedent, on this dissolution of an elected body. In the first place, it appears to me as if these provisions had been devised by men who, strangely enough—I cannot account for it, I cannot and do not impute it—intended, and who have acted in such a way—a way that this must be the result—to deter every man with a grain of self-respect from entering the County Council. I should like to know how many gentlemen in this House, be they Irish, English, Scotch, or Welsh, would consent to enter into County Councils liable to be hauled up before two Judges, possibly two ex-Attorney Generals, who never said one word in all their political career except in antipathy to the interests and feelings of the people of Ireland. But apart from that, and granting that they were the best Attorney Generals, how many men would consent to sit on a body liable to be hauled up before such a tribunal? Would the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) or the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) sit upon such a body? Why, Sir, I think too well of them both to believe they would for a moment entertain such a proposal—a proposal which has never found its way within the precincts of this country, and which never in the whole vicissitudes of political affairs will be heard of in connection with the Government of Great Britain. Is it to be laid down as a general principle that the Judges outside the law are the persons best qualified to weigh the propriety or impropriety of the discharge of administrative offices. How did they acquire that capacity? Whence does it come to them? I heartily admire those efficient provisions of our system which are given to the Judges to compel every civil and administrative officer, however high his position, to conform to the requirements of the law; and therefore, with regard to the punishment of corruption on the part of a Council Council, my one observation is that I cannot conceive why a new provision is requisite. With regard to malversation, I am not quite sure what it means, but putting on it the most favourable construction, it means, of course, a departure from the fixed intentions of Acts of Parliament, and, if so, why is a new provision requisite? The whole pith of this new provision lies not in corruption and not in malversation, but in that undefined word “oppression,” which may be inflated, twisted, magnified, or tortured into anything and everything that prejudice may suggest. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) said in my hearing last night that it would be quite easy to provide a definition of oppression. Why has he not tried his hand at it?

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: We are not in Committee.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It would have been a great consolation if the right hon. Gentleman had shown us in what way he would define oppression, inasmuch as this is no Committee matter, but it goes to the root and heart of the Bill. I observed that the right hon. Gentleman came out yesterday as a man equipped with a large store of legal learning, because although he did not profess to give a legal opinion on his own part concerning the Bill, yet he told us what the lawyers would say, and he was able to do that because he is a better lawyer than they are, or at least quite as good. But I was astounded to hear him say he could define oppression quite easily. Why has no one done it? Is it not the first requisite of all conditions of freedom that the law shall be defined? Why are we to have a new form of Brehon Law introduced into the Bill, and why is not this most necessary definition of oppression to be supplied? The Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Madden), a very competent Gentleman, I need not say, was ready to supply a legal definition.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I was not. I was answering a speech addressed to the House by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), whose only observation on this provision was that he declined to argue the point. Therefore, I had nothing to answer in connection with this matter.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That is perfectly true. But the Attorney General's duty, as the organ of the Government explaining this Bill to the House, ought not to have been limited to a mere reply to particular points mentioned by an hon. Member. Besides, the right hon. and learned Gentleman cannot avail himself of that shelter, because he complained of the Member for West Belfast for having declined to impeach this provision, and he said that, although it was not impeached, he would proceed to define it. Why did he not do so with that which most of all wants defence—namely, the audacity—I hope that is not too violent a word—which has led to the introduction into an Act of Parliament in a country where, as we are told by the Government itself, excited feelings prevail, of a new word absolutely undefined, and capable of being applied, unless defined, to suit purposes of prejudice, passion, and malignant animosity in any and all the shapes which, in a distracted country, from time to time they may assume. So much on the subject of the dissolution of the Councils. Now, I come to the question of the Joint Committee, and here the old rule holds. Everything in the nature of a precedent, or what could be made to seem so in England or Scotland, has been adopted as far as it was bad, and has been set aside so far as it was good. I am not now going to enter a debate on the larger principles to be fought out on future occasions between the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). But it may be interesting for the right hon. Gentleman to know that in his absence to-day his computation respecting ninety-seven per cent. of the county expenditure being subject to control of the County Councils, and three per cent. being exempt from that control, has been by the hon. and gallant Member, with some detail and care, nearly turned inside out, and, as he contends, it will be far nearer the truth to say that three per cent. will be subject to the control of the County Councils, and ninety-seven per cent. not subject to their control. But I will not enter into that because I wish to come to the illustration of what I think is the main proposition in this Debate—namely, the manner in which the promise to apply equality of principles to Ireland as compared with England and Scotland has been, as I say, entirely disregarded and abandoned. The Government were determined to introduce into this measure the question of a Joint Committee. The hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. Timothy Healy) did not understand why there should have been a Joint Committee at all, and I certainly have not heard an adequate argument in favour of it. But still there are Joint Committees in England and Scotland. Let us see whether they afford any precedent or supply any real guidance for the constitution of Joint Committees in Ireland. I take the English Joint Committee, and I begin by complaining on the part of a very large minority of this House that in our view the Joint Committee in England is altogether bad. It was objected to and was resisted by us to the best of our ability, and I firmly hope and firmly believe that the time is removed from us by a very few months when there will be a House of Commons disposed to make a very short work indeed of these Joint Committees. I have no right to complain that the Government should have passed their Bill in that form, because they made a fair declaration of principle. But what is the English Joint Committee in England? It is limited to the single function of taking care of the police. That is not at all what we believe in, but it would have been a great deal too much to expect that the Government should offer us anything in the nature of a substantial attempt at decentralisation in Ireland. There is nothing in the nature of an attempt to invest the people with the control of their own local affairs in their own local centres, and I admit that would have been too much to expect of the Government. It would have shown that we do not at all understand the spirit of the majority with which we have to deal. But I observe that the Joint Committee is extended from one function to a vast range of functions.

of the most vital consequences. The Joint Committee in England has one good point, and that is that it is fairly constituted. Its balance is good. There are seven County Councillors and seven Magistrates, and there you have an example of a fair balance. They meet and fight it out and come to some arrangement or accommodation. Why do you not allow the Irish to do the same? No, the one feature in the English Joint Committee—namely, that of a fair balance of parties—is studiously thrown over, and the English precedent is upset before it is transplanted into Ireland. Then we have a Scotch precedent, and there the function is more extended. In Scotland the Joint Committee exercises a control not only over patronage, but over capital expenditure, which is a control nearly as extended, I suppose, as is proposed to be given to this Irish Joint Committee. Yes; but why? Because in Scotland the landlord has paid his rates as the occupier on the land that he has occupied, and has paid half the rates on the land that he does not occupy. And, therefore, he has a very large and direct interest and is recognised as a separate authority, and is entitled to separate representation. In Ireland he pays nothing, except in cases comparatively trifling. With the exception of a very small portion which is occupied by the landlord, the land is let and the landlord does not pay the county cess. In Scotland there is a preservative and a safeguard, for a judicial officer sits and holds the balance between the representatives of the landlords and the representatives of the County Council. That is a good provision, a safe and conservative provision, and as a matter of course it is thrown overboard in constructing the Bill of the present Government. So that as you go along from point to point whatever provision is against the people is adopted, and whatever secures the exercise of power in their favour, and the due and equal representation of the people is entirely cast aside. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and the Attorney General for Ireland, with the gracious assent of the First Lord of the Treasury, say that if we can find an impartial man the Government will be prepared to accept him. But it is not our business to amend the vital faults in the proposals of the Government. We must estimate the Bill by the provisions it contains, and not from appeals made by them to independent Members of this House to do what they ought to have done themselves. It is all very well, but what is the promise that has been made? What if we can find an impartial man, they will let him in. But are they bound to take as an impartial man the one whom we propose? No; objection will be taken to our impartial man by the majority, and no doubt the objection will be allowed to stand. And what is the arrangement as it stands? By dint of adopting what is bad, and excluding what is good in the Scotch and English precedents, you constitute a Joint Committee in Ireland, and that Joint Committee is provided with a standing majority to support the separate interests and class views of the landlords against the representative body that you are engaged in constituting. But there is one provision still more extraordinary in this Bill, touching on the business of the Joint Committee, as to which I can entertain no doubt as to the meaning of the words. Of course my construction as to the legal position may be wrong, because I have not the legal attainments of my right hon. Friend. What are the powers of this Joint Committee in respect to the overtures or proposals that it receives from the County Councils? Are they powers of simple assent or dissent? No, Sir. They may not merely assent or dissent; they may assent in whole or in part, and they may assent absolutely or conditionally. That is to say, the County Council may prepare provisional bye-laws or plans for the government of county affairs.

MR. JACKSON: Not bye-laws.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That is merely a question of name; call them what you will. What do you call them? Give me the right name. The plans or proposals—call them what you like—go from the County Council to the Joint Committee for their approval. What are the Joint Committee to do? Not merely to assent or dissent, but to amend them as they please, to cut out what they please, to put in what they please. They may alter the whole financial conditions, and when they have done it what happens? As I read the Bill, the plan or scheme so altered takes effect and becomes law. (Mr. JACKSON expressed dissent.) It is very well to shake the head, but the words you will find are these—

"That without the assent of the Joint Committee the plan of the County Council shall not take effect."

MR. JACKSON (reading):

"The capital expenditure of the County Council, if not assented to, shall be invalid."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon. Those are not the words at all; they are not near the words. The assent of the Joint Committee is necessary in the sense that the proposals shall be invalid without it. But if they are invalid without it, I presume they are valid with it. Is not that so? They are valid when they have got that assent, and what is that assent? It is not an assent simply affirming the plan or simply rejecting it. It is an assent which may alter the plan, which may take one part of the plan and throw aside another, which may insert in the plan what conditions the Joint Committee please, and then, forsooth, the plan becomes valid. And this is the splendid and munificent gift of a liberal, popular, and local institution which is to give the Irish people control over their own affairs. Then it is said there ought to be protection for the minorities in Ireland. The Attorney General has read some words from a speech of mine in 1886. I adhere to those words, but their whole relevancy depends upon the provisions in reference to which they are spoken. What is the meaning of a Government when they say that minorities ought to be protected? The meaning of the Government is that minorities ought to be protected by having the majorities delivered into their hands. By providing for that minority you set up a standing majority in behalf of that minority to put down the majority, to whom you profess to be giving this emancipating Bill. That is not what we mean by protecting the minority. Then it is said it is necessary to protect the large cess payers. If you want to protect the large cess payers, then why do you not say so? Are they not the grazing farmers? What common interests have they with the landlords? Though we have no such provision in this country, if you think there is a necessity to protect the large cess payers, protect them, protect them by putting power in their hands, and not by enabling the Sheriff of the county to nominate a group of landlords who are to look after their own interests and the interests of their own class, under the pretence of being the representatives of the large cess payers. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken must have felt that there was a vital flaw in his argument when he referred to the great cess payers. It might, perhaps, be equitable to make a special provision on their behalf, but this is not that provision. This is not a provision for large tenants, but for landlords, and the position of the landlords is just as distinct from that of the large tenants as their traditions, their class, are distinct from the case of the smaller tenants. Then, Sir, the most plausible argument, I think, that has been made on this part of the Bill is that the control of the Joint Committee only applies to new expenditure. Well, Sir, what I am afraid is that in Ireland almost the only expenditure that we care about is new expenditure. The essence of the Irish complaint is that the legitimate wants of the country have been systematically neglected. Grand Juries, and if that is so, it is vital to a good plan of Local Government that popular influence should have fair scope, even in regard to new expenditure. No; you establish a standing majority of landlords against the whole popular influence. You have no such provision in England. In England the whole of the property of the landlord is dealt with by the County Councils, freely, without limitation. You introduce not only limitation, but a nullifying limitation in Ireland, and then you say you are giving Ireland the same institutions as to England, subject to necessary modifications in detail. It is not difficult to make intelligible the nature of my general objections to the Bill, and I shall spare the House further discussion of details, though I must confess I am very much tempted to enter upon one of those particulars, namely, that of compensation for malicious injuries. It was a singularly infelicitous reference by the right hon. Gentleman to a very distinguished man—he meant Lord Melbourne—when he said that the quotation was the remark of a serious statesman. Lord Melbourne was a man of very great weight, and, in my opinion, in some important and vital respects, was a model of what a Prime Minister ought to be. But, considered as a practical reformer, the right hon. Gentleman ought to know Lord Melbourne had been educated under another system, and had grown up and acquired the habits of his mind before there had found its way into representative institutions any fit sense at all of the needs, wishes, or rights of the people of the country. Considered from that point of view, Lord Melbourne was one of the worst instances the right hon. Gentleman could have quoted. He said Lord Melbourne made use of that unhappy expression in regard to one of the greatest measures of the century, in which the interests of humanity and justice were more than almost ever before concerned, and the right hon. Gentleman quotes that as his reason and authority for leaving alone the present established arbitrary provision for compensation for malicious injuries which has been, in my opinion, most grossly misapplied. Well, Sir, this is my complaint. This Bill purports to be the redemption of a pledge for giving to Ireland local institutions substantially equivalent to those of England and Scotland. Professing to redeem that pledge, it has a number of points in which there is an apparent or avowed reference to English and Scotch precedents. I think I have shown in each of those cases which I have quoted, and they are all vital cases, that what is good in the precedent is left out, and what is bad in the precedent is maintained, aggravated, and misapplied. And this refuse of legislation is a great boon, to signify the generosity of Parliament, its adequate sense of Irish wants, and its disposition to outbid Nationalism and Home Rule by professing to give Ireland something more acceptable and beneficial! With regard to the use made of these precedents the Government might as well do this. A man who is to give an entertainment might send round to every house in the neighbourhood and ask for the bones, the waste, the refuse, and the washings, and put them altogether and serve them up to his guests as the banquet on which they were to feed. That is a jest in this country, but according to this Bill it is no jest in Ireland. It is the reality of the case that is before us. What I feel is that this Bill has conferred on the Liberal Party in this country one obligation—a great obligation—it tends to clear the issue. It gives the people the power of measuring and determining exactly what was the value of the great and splendid promises of 1887. If they are misled with evidence like this before them, it is their own fault; but they will not be misled. They have arrived, and have shown that they have arrived, at a tolerably fair estimate of these proceedings, and if anything is needed to complete the process this Bill undoubtedly will supply it. What I find, Sir, is that this measure in all its provisions is everywhere marked from one end to the other with the stamp of inequalities—inequalities adverse to Ireland, whether it is a large question or a small one, an old question or a new one. Go back with me to the period of the Union and to the arguments then used. The opponents of the Union entreated the ruling party not to do away with the ancient historical institutions of Ireland, not to sacrifice its national life, but to give some scope to the action of freedom within the limits of the country; and what was the answer made? The answer made by the more candid supporters of the Union was: It is true you are losing much, you are sacrificing your Parliament; you are surrendering your traditions; you are losing much of that which you cherish in your heart's core; but look at the enormous advantage that you are going to attain. You are going to attain a position in which you will have, and have for ever, and have irrevocably, under the seal and stamp of the greatest and the most upright country in the world, absolute equality of laws with Great Britain.

It entered into the famous quotation of Mr. Pitt—

"Paribus se legibus ambæ

Invictæ gentes æterna in foedera mittant."

The equality of laws was the soul and essence of the speech of Mr. Pitt. It was the one, and as he thought the only, adequate compensation that he tendered to Ireland for the sacrifices she was called upon to make. Where is that equality of laws now? How is it represented by the present Bill? Are we to say that Ireland is wrong in rejecting this Bill? No, Sir, the stamp of inequality for the people is the brand of degradation, and if Ireland were capable of accepting as a redemption of pledges made to her a measure bearing that stamp, she would be unworthy of the high hopes and aspirations she so long has cherished; she would be unworthy of the great men who have led her in times of adversity, and she would be unworthy of the happier and better destiny which, as we trust, believe, and, so far as the future is open to us, are convinced and know, she is about to accomplish.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down excels those who have spoken on the same side of this question in this Debate in authority, in vigour, and in eloquence, but he excels them also in one other peculiarity, which is, that he has thought fit to drag into a controversy that should by right have been confined to the discussion of a particular measure of Local Government for Ireland, considerations wholly alien to that measure. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman began his speech by offering a challenge, in form, to the Members of the Government by asking them whether they did or did not agree with Lord Salisbury in certain observations the Prime Minister made in a recent speech in regard to Ulster. The right hon. Gentleman himself was pleased to denounce those observations; he described them as incitements to rebellion, and as observations, not only that no Member of the Crown should give utterance to, but as unworthy even of a law-abiding citizen. I have a good deal to say about the Bill, and shall not long detain the House on this point, but I will briefly respond to the challenge the right hon. Gentleman has thrown down. I have sent for the extract of the speech of the Prime Minister to which reference has been made. I find that Lord Salisbury advanced three propositions. The first proposition was that it would be a gross act of public immorality to place Ulster under the heel of the rest of Ireland. With that proposition I beg to associate myself in the fullest manner. The second proposition advanced by Lord Salisbury was that if an attempt was made to put Ulster under the heel of the rest of Ireland, Ulster might not improbably resist by force. Sir, that is a question of what is likely to occur. Lord Salisbury thought it likely to occur; I think it likely to occur. But he offered it, and I offer it, merely as our own forecast of what might probably happen. The third proposition of Lord Salisbury was that if Ulster did resist, and that if an attempt was made to put down the resistance of Ulster by the British standing Army, then, in Lord Salisbury's own words, "an outrage would be perpetrated which would rend society in two." With that proposition also I associate myself. I note that right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who conceive that they are shortly to be sent back to power for the purpose of passing a Home Rule Bill which would put Ulster under the heel of the rest of Ireland, contemplate as a probability that has to be faced that Ulster will have to be coerced by the British Army. It is no abstract or academic question in their minds. It is a question of practical politics. It is a question of what will probably occur, and I note that in the opinion of right hon. Gentlemen the result will—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman says that that is my opinion. I have not said one syllable to that effect. I deny it. The words that I used were that I believed the very few foolish people whom Lord Salisbury might act upon would not resort to force.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the right hon. Gentleman was of opinion that under no circumstances would the British Army be required to put down

Ulster, I cannot conceive why he got into such a fury of righteous indignation on a purely abstract question. It is easy enough to see through the protestations of right hon. Gentlemen opposite the uneasiness which possesses their souls. They know well enough that this question of Ulster cannot be lightly set aside, and their vehement expression of indignation is merely the external sign of that interior disquietude which naturally assails them whenever they contemplate face to face the problem with which the Prime Minister was dealing in the speech to which reference has been made. I pass from this question—which I frankly admit appears to me, if connected at all, to be connected only by the remotest links with the Local Government Bill—to the criticism which the right hon. Gentleman was pleased to pass upon that Bill. Now his first attack upon us—and, in fact, the special attack of all those who have spoken against the Bill—was this, that we have not carried out the pledges that we gave with regard to Local Government in Ireland. I entirely deny that statement. I maintain that this Bill fully carries out every pledge that has ever been given on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman quoted—and quoted perfectly accurately—various utterances which had for their object to show that when we dealt with the question of Local Government in Ireland we should deal with it on the same general principles which had been adopted in England and in Scotland; but I say that we never—that no Minister that I ever heard of pretended for a moment that the Bill to be applied to Ireland should be identical with either the Bill applied to England or to Scotland. Identical with both it could not be. But surely every statement upon a broad question of that kind must be qualified by the view that the Bill must be suited to the particular circumstances of the people with whom it has to deal; and you cannot transfer bodily from one condition of things to a wholly different condition of things a long and elaborate statute. I have already touched on this policy of the Government more than once since I have been Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I believe that on every single occasion on which I had to deal with it, I foreshadowed the fact of the difference that there must be between the two Bills, which undoubtedly arises from the condition of Irish society when compared with the condition of society in England and Scotland. Perhaps the House will pardon me, and I may be permitted to read from a speech which I made on 5th June, 1889, at Portsmouth. I then said:

“ I am in favour of extending Local Government to Ireland. I hope to bring in a Bill to extend Local Government to Ireland; and I say you must follow with regard to Ireland the same course of action as must be followed when you are dealing with other countries. You must fit your Local Government to the needs and necessities of the country with which you are dealing.”

My noble Friend the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) has been quoted over and over again in this Debate as having announced that Ireland was to be dealt with on the principles of similarity and simultaneity. He did announce that, and he announced it with the authority of the Cabinet, of which I was not then a Member.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Equality?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, equality. But my noble Friend could not have intended to represent by that that we were to be tied down to the dead level of a uniform enactment when dealing with a condition of things so absolutely different in the two countries. I believe I have listened to every speech, or almost every speech, delivered in the course of this Debate against the Bill; and upon my word I do not believe a single statement was made by any speaker, a single hint was given by any controversialist, that the condition of Connaught and of Munster was not as the condition of Midlothian or Kent. I do not believe that one single word was dropped from any hon. Gentlemen opposite to show that Ireland has been rent in twain by controversies, the bitterness of which cannot be comprehended in this country, and that one of the favourite weapons of the parties on one side of the controversies was especially directed against the social and material destruction of a class.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Which side? Your side?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman who has been good enough to interrupt said yesterday in his speech, "We are as good as you are, and we are as bad as you are." I do not in the least desire to enter upon a minute examination as to on which side the scale of virtue falls; and if the moral merits of Ireland be compared with the moral merits of England, I do not say Ireland is worse. What I do say is that Ireland is different; and I do not see how that proposition can be denied. We all live a Party life. Party feeling is the breath of our nostrils. We are all Party politicians. We belong to Party. We are all accustomed to Party controversies; and that which is a mild attack in this country is a virulent and fatal disease in Ireland. It attacks the Irish constitution with a violence of which you have no conception. Even friends in Ireland, when they do fall out, use language to each other which would quite stagger the more steady-going politicians on this side of the Channel; and when that occurs with people who yesterday were friends, and who will be friends tomorrow, how much more must it occur in these perennial, or, at all events, long-standing differences which have divided creeds, races, and strata of society in that country? The right hon. Gentleman did not hear at question time the question asked by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) dealing with a case, of the merits of which I know nothing, but a case in which the hon. Member for West Belfast stated that gross tyranny and outrage were practised by Protestants in Belfast against a Catholic boy in that town.

MR. SEXTON: Produced by your speech.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have made no speech which would in any way justify anything of the sort, but even if it were true, would not that prove my case? I have never had it attributed to me that my oratory had such an effect in any other part of the United Kingdom; and if it has produced a result of that kind it must have fallen on a curiously prepared soil. I say if you listen to Irish gentlemen sitting on that side of the House when they explain the kind of outrages to which Catholics are subjected in Belfast, just as when you listen to Irish gentlemen sitting on this side of the House when they are explaining the outrages to which the small minority in the South and West are subjected, you will then have brought practically home to you that there are divisions in Ireland, and modes of political warfare unknown in this country, capable of the grossest abuse in Ireland; and if a statesman ignored their existence in any Bill of this kind he would show himself utterly incapable of government. It is not merely that Irish society is divided in the way I have described which required us to make special provisions in our Bill, but it is that in large parts of Ireland the economic condition of the people is wholly different from what it is in other parts of the United Kingdom. I am glad to say, except perhaps in a corner of the North West of Scotland, you get nothing at all resembling the condition of things which meets you face to face in the South and West of Ireland. There you have an enormous number of small occupiers, small cottiers, paying annual rates of threepence, fourpence, sixpence, or tenpence, who have unfortunately had from time to time to be aided by the establishment of relief works out of public funds, and who are therefore accustomed to look for employment on such works as roads and bridges for obtaining the means of satisfying their needs. These men, if it was not for the provision of the Joint Committee, which I shall refer to more particularly presently, would be absolutely able themselves to vote for the relief works on which they were going to be employed. The minimum wages paid on the relief works would be ten shillings a week. The head of a family would thus earn in one week seven times, fourteen times, twenty times that which he would pay for the whole year in county cess. And then you say these people pay the rates, and surely you must trust them. I pass from these general considerations, which never seem to have occurred to the minds of the right hon. Gentleman or any of the other critics of the Bill.

But before considering the particular provisions by which we have endeavoured to meet the exceptional state of society in Ireland, let me say one word about the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject of the boundaries. He began his attack on the Bill by saying in substance, "You have so arranged matters that the Lord Lieutenant will be able to jerrymander." He did not use so vulgar a word—"to manipulate for Party purposes the districts, and arrange the areas within your counties—proceedings which you never attempted with regard to England or to Scotland." What we have actually done is this. As was stated by my right hon. Friend yesterday when we were framing the Bill, we instructed the Registrar General, the head of the Ordnance Survey in Ireland, and the head of the Irish Local Government Board, to draw out a map of Ireland divided into districts, mainly with these two directions—that the area should be convenient in size, and that under no circumstances was the boundary of a barony to be cut; and the scheme so prepared will be submitted to Members at a later stage of the Bill. If—which I do not in the least contemplate—the arrangement is objected to, of course some other plan can easily be devised by a Commission or otherwise. But there is no use in settling this until we have settled what scheme of representation we should have. We have framed the Bill on the plan of the representation of minorities by the cumulative vote. That requires Ireland to be divided into areas returning fifteen members each, about the size of a School Board. If you are going to have the single Member constituencies which the hon. Member for West Belfast desires, you must have a different system; and it is premature (though we have our plan ready, and will submit it to the House later on before passing the Bill), to propose it as an effective scheme until we see how the clause establishing minority representation has been dealt with in Committee. I pass, however, from that small point to the more important issues raised by the right hon. Gentleman, and I will take them in the order in which he dealt with them. The first clause which he dealt with was that empowering two Judges to dissolve a County Council; and here the right hon. Gentleman applied a method of criticism which he applied in turn to all those special purposes, in which he says, "You found an English precedent and you have taken what was bad in it and have left what is good." This particular English precedent which he seems to have conceived as illustrative of his proposition is the English School Board. He said—"It is true the Education Board has power to dissolve a School Board; but then it has to elect another. You have left that precedent behind in dealing with Ireland, and in Ireland practically no second election is required." The right hon. Gentleman has been ill-coached in this matter. He has made two mistakes. He has made a mistake, as I understand it, about the Irish question, and he has made another mistake about the English precedent. It is not accurate to say that the locality can be permanently disfranchised by two Judges.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not say permanently.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, the force of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments seemed to carry that conclusion, but I am far from desiring to attribute to him words which he did not use. I would, however, remind the House that under the Bill the maximum time that a County Council which is guilty of corruption, malversation, and oppression can be dissolved for is three years. What is the case with an English School Board? The right hon. Gentleman appears to be under the impression that as soon as an English School Board is dissolved a new election is to take place. That is not the fact. It is precisely the reverse of the facts, and so far from it being necessary to have a re-election at once there is absolutely no date stated in the Act of Parliament at which there need be an election at all, and it is actually in the power of a Department—a creature of the Party opposite—in England to dissolve a School Board, say in London, representing, by an absolutely democratic vote, five millions of population—it is actually in the power of a Parliamentary Education Department to dissolve that Board, and there is no power of compelling them to have a new election at all. And this is the precedent that entitles the right hon. Gentleman, after a critical examination of the Bill and of the precedents from which the Bill may have been derived—that entitles him, in his opinion, to say that we have taken from the English precedents all that was against the people and left all that was in favour of the people. But I should like, on this point, to ask the right hon. Gentleman another question. He turned to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), and to his hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings), and said: “Would you serve upon a Board which could be dissolved in this kind of way? Would your self-respect permit you in any circumstances to put yourself in a position in which you might be brought up before two Judges, and would you belong to a body which might suffer dissolution at their hands.” It appears to me that no man’s self-respect hitherto in England has been thought to be interfered with by his serving on a School Board. And why are Irishmen supposed to be gifted with so much sensitiveness of character that what Englishmen can stand at the hands of a Department they cannot stand at the hands of two Judges of the High Court? Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman attacked the particular machinery by which this dissolution is to be effected. He told us that these Judges are not competent, and that even if they were competent, we have given them a law to interpret so vague and so general that nobody can interpret it. I am not wedded to that tribunal, though I believe it to be the best tribunal. But to say that the Judges are not specially competent to deal with matters of fact in these cases appears to me to ignore the whole value of judicial training.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What about oppression?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman interjects the word “oppression.” He seems to think—I do not know who has given him the information, probably the same person who gave him the information about the School Boards—that the word “oppression” has never been the subject of legal disquisition or definition before.

He is wholly misinformed on that matter. I can assure him that “oppression” has been the subject—as my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland did state the other day—has been the subject of legal discussion and definition; and it appears, so far as I understand the matter, to be precisely the sort of oppression that was contemplated by the writers of those legal text-books that we have to think of now. It is perfectly true that, in society as it has been constituted up to this time, oppression was most likely to occur—if it occurred at all—at the hands of magistrates and other non-elected persons endowed with great power. You have substituted for them really elected bodies and government by majorities. Henceforth, oppression, if it occurs, will be oppression by those majorities. And why I am not to apply to them the same legal acumen which has not found it impossible to deal with the question of oppression, not by elected bodies but by magistrates and other high authorities, I do not know.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Where are the words taken from?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am correct in my statement with regard to the legal text-books, but the hon. Member must not press me too far with these legal points. I think he will find that I have not in any way misled the House. Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman went on to say “these vague powers you hand over are capable of indefinite extension, and may be malignantly used.” There were other strong epithets which escaped me, but “malignantly” I preserved. I confess I am wholly unable to place myself in the frame of mind of the gentleman who thinks it natural and probable to expect that a Judge will use the powers entrusted to him with malignity, and who thinks it incredible that a majority of an Irish County Council should ever do the same thing. The only people who can err in Ireland are the Judges of the High Court; the only people who may be attacked without hurting the susceptibilities of the Irish Representatives are the Irish Judges. I confess it seems to me the plan we have adopted—by which, instead of giving the powers of dissolution to the Local Government Board, as is given in the case of Board of Guardians, or to the Education Department, as is given in the case of School Boards in England, we propose to hand them over to two Judges—who, if they do not fulfil all the qualifications which hon. Gentlemen would like to see in them, are, at all events, the most impartial authority which, even they will admit, exists in Ireland—it seems to me this plan is far better and far safer, and far more in the interests of impartial administration. The special justification of this clause is what I have before adverted to. It is the undoubted fact that one Party in Ireland, and largely represented in this House, have steadily announced their intention of waging social warfare against a class, as a means of obtaining their political objects. They do not deny that. They do not deny that they have professed that doctrine; they will not deny that they have done their best to carry it out, and it is lunacy to ignore the intention which they have expressed, and to give over the class which they publicly announce their intention of ruining absolutely unprotected. I pass to the Joint Committee. Here the right hon. Gentleman applied the same old argument that he had already used with regard to the Judges and the School Board. He says—"You have taken the English and the Scotch precedent; you have magnified in it all that is obnoxious, and you have removed all that is beneficial." I deny that. I observe the right hon. Gentleman carefully abstained from touching on the case of the Scotch parallel, but he dealt at great length with the case of the English parallel.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I mentioned fully the Scotch parallel.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman says he mentioned fully the Scotch parallel. If it was on the Scotch parallel he based his facts, he must be as ignorant of the Scotch Act as he is of the Education Act. The parallel between our clause and the Scotch clause is absolutely complete in every substantial particular, with the single exception that the Sheriff of the county is taken as one of the ex-officio members, while in Scotland there is a judicial officer.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: Who pays the rates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will come to the payment of rates presently. With regard to the Sheriff, I have really nothing to add to what I stated on the introduction of the Bill. I then, in the most open manner, told the House that this was a part of the provision I was not fully content with; and I said that if another and a better plan could be suggested I should be glad. How has the right hon. Gentleman replied to that? The right hon. Gentleman says—

"It is not our business to help you in this Bill. It is your business to make a good Bill of it."

Then what is the use of the Committee stage in this House? What is the use of all those offers of assistance which the right hon. Gentleman has given us when he likes a Bill, and which he refuses us when there seems to be some political reason for rejecting a Bill? Was there ever such a reason given as that for rejecting a Bill on the Second Reading—that we have not been able to find in the organisation of the Irish County Councils any person qualified to take the place of the Sheriff? I think it is a blot on the clause, but that surely is no reason for departing from the whole practice of Parliament, and rejecting the Second Reading of the Bill. I think it will require something much stronger than a mere colourable excuse to lead the House to reject the Bill. It is perfectly true, as has been admitted, that in Scotland half the rates are paid by the landlord, and that in Ireland the landlord does not pay the cess. But the right hon. Gentleman glided very lightly over what was said by the hon. Member for Tyrone, who referred to the case of nine landlords—was it not?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes, nine landlords.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Who are in occupation, and who pay it.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Yes, to that extent.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There are many cases where the landlords as occupiers pay the largest—an enormous portion—of the whole county cess. But we base our contention on something much more fundamental than the fact that here and there the landlord is the biggest cesspayer; and here I may express my regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has left the House. He is fond of dilating upon this topic. I do not propose to argue the point with the right hon. Gentleman, for the facts of the case are simple enough. If you impose a rate in an agricultural county the occupier will pay that rate until the terms of his occupancy are revised, and he will not have the same permanent interest that the landlord has. In England it is different, because, as the House knows, a tenancy will go on for generations without any modification of the rent. We all know what happens. The tenant continues to pay. In Ireland the rents are revisable every fifteen years, and not only is it the practice of the Fair Rent Courts to take account of the amount of the rate, but, by a decision of the Queen's Bench, they are compelled to take it into account, so that every tenant who at the end of his judicial term goes into the Court may have the whole of the rate thrown upon the owner. No human being will deny that it is fair to give the persons who bear the permanent charges some voice in the determining of what those charges shall be. Is it not possible that, where there is an enormous mass of small ratepayers who may desire public works not generally required by the wants of the community, an attempt might be made to throw very heavy burdens on the landlords which they would be unable to bear? That is not a new argument. It has been advanced by every speaker on this side of the House, but no answer has been attempted on the other side. It was used by the right hon. Gentleman by my side, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian never touched it. It never occurred to him that such an argument existed. I believe that the case of the Joint Committee is absolutely unassailable, and that the same considerations which induced the House to establish it in Scotland will justify its establishment in Ireland. I have detained the House at great length, but I think I have gone through all the objections which have been raised against the Bill. I want to know what they come to after all? The Member for West Leeds, who spoke on Thursday night, examined this Bill with a microscopic eye, and he found that every clause bears trace of the desire of the First Lord of the Treasury or of the Attorney General to limit the powers of the County Councils, and to heap insults on the Irish people. As a matter of fact, the greater part of the Bill is identical with the English and the Scotch Acts. Certainly, nine out of every ten clauses, sentence by sentence, will be found to be taken verbatim from the Acts already passed for England and Scotland. It is also a fact that this Bill confers powers on Ireland which never have been given to England and Scotland, but which I hope will be given. It gives absolute control over every county officer but two, and if it were worth while I would explain why they are excepted. Thus most of the officers and the whole of the work done by the Grand Juries—far more of the work than was transferred by the English and Scotch Acts—are transferred bodily to the Irish County Councils. Why, then, has this Bill been opposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite? Are we to place any faith in the thin and futile pretence that this Bill is an insult to the Irish people? Are we to suppose that practical men will reject this measure, will refuse to give it further consideration, on this flimsy pretext founded on two or three clauses of the Bill? A much better reason must be found, and I think a much better reason exists. The vacant laughter and inarticulate indignation with which this measure was met at its first introduction have now been slowly translated into something of the nature of argument, and to what does the argument amount? It amounts to this—that here and there, in a Bill of seventy-three clauses, there may be found provisions which hon. Gentlemen think might be modified with advantage. My belief is that it is not because they think the Bill is an insult that they reject it. It is because they believe that the Bill will not serve the purpose which they hope to effect. They have made the most explicit statements, the most frank statements—because frankness is one of their chief merits—as to the way in which they intend to treat a Local Government Bill. They are not going to treat it as a Bill for establishing Local Government. They are going to treat it as a ladder by which to climb to Home Rule, and possibly through Home Rule to separation. If they have been frank as to the object they desire to attain, they have been equally frank as to the methods they desire to adopt. They have never made it a secret for the last ten years that the methods by which they intend to wring from reluctant Radicals the granting of Home Rule were by disorder and the oppression of a particular class in Ireland which they have the power to afflict—the ruin of the landlords, the expulsion of the landlords, the destruction of the landlords—these are the familiar topics of their eloquence when in Ireland—these are the avowed methods by which they hope to succeed. The reason why they have changed their views on that subject and are now anxious to reject this Bill on the Second Reading and to prevent its discussion in Committee is that they clearly see, whatever else it will do, it will do nothing for them in the direction of Home Rule. The difference between us on this side of the House and those who are on the other side of the House is two-fold. We do not desire their objects, and they do not desire our objects. Their object is Home Rule; our object is Local Government. We sincerely believe that Local Government may be made a great boon and a great blessing to the population which knows how to use it. We desire earnestly and sincerely to confer this boon upon Ireland. They are perfectly indifferent whether it is conferred or not—they do not value it because it helps to Local Government and confers a very great boon on the population. They do not value it a pin for these reasons, and they reject it without scruple. They value it, or they did value it, before they saw the provisions of the Bill. They did not set the least store on what the Government were going to do for Local Government, but they thought it might be made an instrument of torture for further extracting Home Rule. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian said that one benefit, at all events, that this Bill conferred upon his Party was that it cleared the issue. It has cleared the issue. As far as in us lies, at all events we have made it clear in the last six years what the whole policy is of which this is but a fragment, though an important fragment. We have endeavoured in the clearest manner to show how we thought the true interests of the Irish people were to be attained, and how all the benefits, and more than all the benefits, we have been able to confer upon England or Scotland could be conferred by the Imperial Parliament upon Ireland. So far we have endeavoured to clear the issues. So far we have shown of what our broad policy, of which this is an element, really consists. It rests with the right hon. Gentleman to clear the issues on his side. The country knows by acts, by deeds, by legislation which have been accomplished, by legislation which has been most sincerely and earnestly attempted, what it is we desire to do. What the right hon. Gentleman desires to do no human being knows. And if we have done our part, as we have done, to clear the issues, all we can ask him is to do his part; to lay before the electorate of the country in the same plain, unmistakeable outline, the policy which he desires to see adopted.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I rise to explain. The right hon. Gentleman has made a great point against me of being totally ignorant of the Education Act; and, in his own elegant expression, he said I had been badly "coached" in it. The question is, who has been badly coached in the Education Act? I quoted Section 66 of the Education Act of 1870, and I believe that section is still in force. I suspect that the right hon. Gentleman has been deluded by some too rapid informant who has examined some other enactment which did not deal with the School Board at all. The enactments about the School Board in this 66th section are precisely as I quoted, and the House will judge as to the correctness of the right hon. Gentleman's statement when I read, to save the time of the House, only the middle part of the section, which I think is sufficient—

"And after the date fixed by any such order the then members of the Board shall be deemed to have vacated their seats, and a new election."

shall be held in the same manner, and the Education Department shall take the same proceedings for the purposes of such election as if it were the first election."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (reading) :

"Where the Education Department are, after such inquiry as they think sufficient, satisfied that a School Board is in default as mentioned in this Act, they may by order declare such Board to be in default, and by the same or any other order appoint any persons, not less than five or more than fifteen, to be members of such School Board, and may from time to time remove any member so appointed. . . . After the date of the order of appointment the persons (if any) who were previously members of the School Board shall be deemed to have vacated their office as if they were dead. . . . The members appointed by the Education Department shall hold office during the pleasure of the Education Department."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has not told me what he has quoted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The 63rd section.

MR. GLADSTONE: My statement is perfectly accurate.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The clause of the Bill—"Order!" I have a perfect right to speak.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman was not called upon by me. Before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian rose to make a personal explanation I had called upon the hon. Member for East Mayo.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): In the speech of the right hon. Gentleman we have had a most instructive example of the bias which affects the mind of his Party in dealing with the Irish people. Right hon. Gentlemen have been appealed to as to whether there might not be brought about so great a crisis as to rend society in twain, and to render it necessary to employ coercion and the Forces of the Crown against the people of Ulster. For my part, I have not the slightest fear that it will become necessary to employ either coercion or the Forces of the Crown against the people of Ulster, except in the streets of Belfast, on the 1st July next. What was the great horror which the right hon. Gentleman conjured up? He said that in his judgment, as well as in that of his illustrious relative, it was perfectly possible that the people of Ulster might resist by force the will of this Parliament. But are not the people of Ulster as much bound to recognise the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament as we are, and if it be no crime for Ulster to deny the supremacy of this Parliament and this Crown, why are we denounced for a crime of which we have not been guilty? But there is this further consideration. The right hon. Gentleman, pursuing the path marked out for him by the Prime Minister, denounced in most unmeasured language the horror of placing the people of Ulster under the feet of their fellow-countrymen; but is there no compunction on that side of the House at the keeping of the whole population of Ireland under the heel of the small and corrupt minority in Ireland? When we are told with wild alarm of the consequences which might result if the minority of the people of Ireland were placed under the control of their own countrymen, we are prompted to ask why hon. Members see no illiberality, no wrong, in placing the vast majority of the people of a country under the heel, not of the people of Ulster, but of a corrupt and exceedingly small minority who grasp at that Government for no other reason than their own financial advancement. What there is to be afraid of is that on the 1st and 12th of July the streets of Belfast will be reddened with the blood of the people of Ulster and of Her Majesty's soldiers who, in spite of what is said in this House, will be obliged to turn out and shoot them down on those days as they have done before, in 1886. The Leader of the House went on to declare, with that audacity which is all his own, that the Government had redeemed every one of the pledges that had been given. I wonder if the right hon. Gentleman was present in the House in 1886, when in the course of a Debate on the Estimates—I think it was the Vote for the Board of Works in Ireland—the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) interrupted me in the course of a speech and requested us to abbreviate the Debate, on the ground that before that day next year we should ourselves have the control over those matters in Ireland. We do not seem to be any nearer having that control than we were six years ago. In alluding to the social war which had distracted Ireland for so many years, did not the cause enter into the mind of the right hon. Gentleman? Is it from the exercise of legal liberties that class has been divided against class, and that all those troubles have arisen? Is it not from that system of placing the majority under the heel of the minority? He points to the system of the Government against which we are struggling as a reason why this misgovernment should not be changed; but I say that if weight were to be given to arguments of that character, no reform could ever be carried out in Ireland. It is impossible to get rid of these social disturbances and symptoms of social disorder, until you remove the disease that gave birth to them. There is one more point in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman; he repeated an extraordinary statement which on a former occasion I challenged him to prove. He brought forward, as another reason for the difference between this Bill and the English Bill, the inferior economic condition of the Irish people. He made the statement that in the South and West of Ireland there is an enormous number of small occupiers paying annual county cess amounting to fourpence, fivepence, and sixpence only. Now, the county cess in Ireland varies from one shilling to two shillings in the pound, and so, even in cases where the rental is only £2, £3, or £4, the county cess amounts to half a crown and up to five or six shillings. While it is perfectly true that in some districts a large portion of the cess-payers would pay a very small sum—but something very different from what the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned; I should think it would always exceed two shillings—I may inform him that to these poor people a penny is more than £10 or £20 would be to him. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to give force to his argument in this way: He said the County Councils would be called upon by these poor people to start relief works, and that they would thereby be able to earn seven shillings a week by paying a few pence in cess. The fact is, it would be impossible to place any considerable proportion of people on relief works, because, if any attempt were made to start relief works on a liberal scale, the small cesspayers would be the first to raise an outcry against it. Now, I should like to say a few words on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who sought to give us a great deal of instruction on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman on this occasion laid aside his usual offensive and aggressive manner and adopted an entirely business tone. He told us he approached this subject with a large experience of municipal matters, and that he was, therefore, entitled to indicate the proper way in which to govern Irish counties. Well, I have not been Mayor of Birmingham, nor a Town Councillor, and therefore I would not for a moment enter into a controversy with the right hon. Gentleman as to the best way to conduct the affairs of that great Municipality; but I think it is a singular illustration of the frame of mind of men like the right hon. Gentleman that because he has had experience in conducting the municipal affairs of Birmingham he thinks he is entitled to lay down the law with regard to the way of governing Mayo and Kerry. Although I have not had experience of municipal affairs in England, I think I know something more as to what are the burning questions of the Irish rural districts than the right hon. Gentleman. One illustration that occurs to me in connection with his speech is this: He spoke of the Sanitary Acts, and he said that in his judgment one of the most important duties for Local Governing Bodies to perform is the administration of the Sanitary Law. I have no doubt that in great Municipalities like Birmingham, and Glasgow, and Manchester that is a burning and most important question. But in Mayo and Kerry, and similar districts, the administration of that law is not a burning question; and although good might be done, no doubt, in certain districts in this direction, it is absurd, and characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman, to put it in the forefront of a Bill like this. Take the case of the rural districts in Ireland. The only proper course to take in administering the Sanitary Laws there would be to knock down every single house and re-build them. How can you administer the Sanitary Laws where there is only one room with a thatched roof? I should like the right hon. Gentleman to go and try to administer the Sanitary Laws in my constituency. If he did make that attempt I think he would come back a sadder and a wiser man. Well, Sir, there is a sadder aspect of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman than these smaller questions I have alluded to. He reached the last stage in the long record of his broken promises to the people of Ireland in the speech he delivered in this House yesterday. One would have supposed, to have listened to him yesterday, that his hands were free from pledges and promises. But what has been his record? He has pledged himself to the hilt to give a system of Local Government to Ireland only short of what was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). In 1885 he sketched out a scheme of the most advanced character, and published it with the full authority of his name. In 1886 he solemnly repeated again and again, as one of the leaders of the Liberal Unionists, that while he was not willing to go the whole length proposed by the right hon. Member for Midlothian, yet if the Home Rule Bill were rejected he would give a measure of Local Government far in advance of anything England was prepared for, and in speech after speech he declared he fully recognised the fact that the peculiar circumstances of Ireland demanded from this House a far wider and more extensive system of Local Government than anything the English people cared for. Not content with all these speeches he brought forward that well-known proposal, published in 1888, by which the proposed Council for each province of Ireland would have very nearly all the powers that would have been conferred on the Central Parliament by the Home Rule Bill. In spite of all these pledges and promises, the right hon. Gentleman was not ashamed to come down to this House yesterday and make a speech in support of a Bill which not only denies to Ireland all those wide privileges which he had promised to extend to it, but which, furthermore, seeks to place the Irish people in a position of great inferiority to the people of England. Then we listened to a long story from the Chief Secretary for Ireland stating what legislation this Government have carried out for Ireland, and expressing his conviction that it had redeemed every single pledge given to the Irish people. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to place a limit on the audacity of Ministers in this respect, but how it is possible for the Chief Secretary to affirm that the Government have redeemed their pledges on this question of Local Government in the face of the events of the last six years, surpasses my comprehension. The Chief Secretary told us that Bills had been passed to make light railways and for land purchase in Ireland, and other admirable things. But that is not what the Government undertook to do for us in 1886. The pledge they gave to us was that they would introduce a Local Government Bill which should be a substitute for the Home Rule Bill. It does not matter whether the legislation passed by the right hon. Gentleman has been good or bad, the fact remains that the pledges given by the Government have been shamefully broken. Once more I must affirm our position. It is not true that we have opposed, obstructed, or sneered at any good measure proposed for Ireland. The policy I have always advocated, and shall continue to advocate so long as we cannot get and until we get full right to deal with our own affairs, is that we should take every bit of good legislation we can worry out of this Parliament. What we have done and what we shall continue to do—and experience has taught us it is the only way to get any good out of this House—is this, that when measures of a faulty and deficient character are brought before the House, then we criticise them and endeavour to amend them. I say and I maintain that the criticisms we have offered to measures introduced by the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors in office, every blot or weakness we have indicated, every amendment we have proposed has been justified by subsequent experience of the working of the measure in Ireland. It is untrue to say that we have sought to defeat measures which contained even the germ of good for the people of Ireland. We have done what we could, and sometimes with considerable effect, to criticise in the most strenuous way evils we have found, and we have exposed unsparingly all the weaknesses we have discovered in legislative proposals. I do not propose to go into details of this Bill: it is now too late to do so. Here I have in this pamphlet what may be called the "Bible," the sacred scripture of those who promote this Bill, and from this pamphlet hon. Members opposite draw their quotations. Here I find the boiled-down opinions of the ascendancy party in Ireland, and here I find set down by the Loyal and Patriotic Union the dangers of Local Government against which the Government are warned. First we are told that in the giving of contracts undue favour will be shown to the personal friends of members of the Councils. Here is a case if ever there was one of Satan reproving sin. What has been the past history of Local Government in Ireland? It is one mass of jobbery from beginning to end, under the appointments made by Grand Juries. Then it is alleged a danger will be that the County Councils will appoint incompetent men to offices under the Council. Could absurdity reach a higher point? Is it not perfectly notorious that, except in the case of County Surveyors, the competency of a man has been the last consideration in the appointments made by Grand Juries? Is it not notorious in the past history of Poor Law Boards and Grand Juries that the one thing which brings Magistrates from any distance—even from England—to attend a meeting is the scent of a job of any kind? Is it not grotesque to have such warnings now, knowing as we do that the past history of county administration is a record of the most scandalous and outrageous jobbery? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) quoted the cases of certain Poor Law Boards suppressed under a Liberal Government; but I repudiate the idea that the cases in these Poor Law Unions can be taken as fair samples of local popular administration in Ireland, because these suppressions arose for the most part not from causes of corruption; they had their origin in the disturbed and distracted condition of the country. I affirm, without fear of contradiction, that in direct proportion to the increase of popular control over Local Boards has been the decline of corruption and jobbery. I might illustrate this by a reference to local administration in Dublin, contrasting the administration at the present day with the time when control was in the hands of the "loyal minority." But it would be idle for me to attempt to go into details with the impatience of the House for the impending Division. I object to this Bill because it is an imposture upon the people of this country; because I do not wish to see the Government going to the constituencies with a lie in their mouth. I do not wish to see them doing as they did the last time, when they carried the verdict of the country on a false and misleading issue—when they appealed to the electors to give them power to grant equal laws to Ireland and to govern without coercion, and when they were returned they broke all their pledges and destroyed our liberties. I object to the Bill because it is a gross falsification of the pledges given to the people of Ireland, pledges confirmed and endorsed by the leaders of the Unionist Party. I object to the Bill, because if it should pass into law it would be one more object lesson to the people of Ireland to put no trust in British faith. I object to the Bill because it is an illustration of the way in which when we ask for bread, you give us something worse than a stone; because, when we ask for some institution which would serve as an organ by which we could give expression to our national life as a nation, which, though small, is as distinct from your own as that of one nation can possibly be from that of another; when we ask for some institution to give expression to our national life, and to restore contentment to our distracted country, we are told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) we may clear out the cesspools of some country villages. I object to the Bill, because it is an attempt to take advantage of the present dissensions and distractions in our Party, to put the Irish people off with a miserable imposture, and because it will leave a legacy of evils to those who come after us.

MOTIONS.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND (DISESTABLISHMENT AND DISENDOWMENT).

RESOLUTION.

*(9.1.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): The Resolution I propose to bring before the House is to the following effect:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the Church of Scotland ought to be Disestablished and Disendowed.”

To understand the Disestablishment question in Scotland it is necessary to appreciate the position which the Established Presbyterian Church bears to the Presbyterian religion in Scotland, a position entirely different to that of the Episcopalian Church towards that religion in England and Wales. In England the Episcopal Church—certainly it is the case in Wales—may embrace but a minority of the population; but in both cases the Church is co-extensive with, and practically embraces, the entire population professing the Episcopalian religion. In the case of the Episcopalian Establishment, assuming the postulate—which I do not, except for the sake of argument—that Episcopacy is the true faith, and that it is the duty of the nation to support the true faith out of the national funds, a case can be made out to support that Establishment. But in Scotland the case is wholly different. The Scottish Established Presbyterian Church is not only confessedly the Church of a minority of the population, but it is also only one of three great Presbyterian Churches. Many years ago the Free and the United Presbyterian Churches seceded from the Establishment, in consequence of the interference of State restrictions with what they considered, and what the whole Church of Scotland pronounced, to be vital points of faith. For conscience sake they left the Establishment, relinquishing its privileges and endowments, and at unparalleled sacrifices they built up alongside the Establishment a magnificent ecclesiastical organisation which is doing precisely the same work as the Established Church—doing that work as well and as efficiently, and without State support. Now, since 1843, the date of its foundation, the Free Church has expended twenty-one and a half millions sterling in founding and maintaining its churches, and the United Presbyterian Church since 1847 has expended twelve millions on similar objects. These sums, making together thirty-three millions sterling, make twice as much as the entire revenue of the Established Church from the public funds, local contributions, Church rates, and teinds during that period. These non-Established Churches embrace a portion of the Presbyterian population of Scotland, which, even on the admission of the Established Church, is not very considerably less than the number within the Establishment; and, on our contention, based on statistics of church attendances and contributions to religious work, these non-Established Churches embrace a larger portion of the Presbyterian part of the population than the Establishment does. Their revenues are ample; their zeal and activity are unquestioned. During the past eighteen or twenty years these non-Established Churches have seen the Establishment availing itself of its privileges and endowments to sap their foundations and lure away their flocks. Year after year the Free Church and the United Presbyterians have been forced to denounce the continuance of the Establishment as unjust, inexpedient, a standing menace to the voluntary churches, an offence to the consciences of a large number of Presbyterians, and as detrimental to the cause of religious peace and unity in Scotland. The question in Scotland is not only whether it is right that a single denomination should monopolise State support, but whether the churches which have grown up outside the Establishment, professing the same faith with it, should be left to work out their destiny without State interference, or whether the resources and patronage of the State should continue to be enjoyed by a single branch of the Presbyterian community for the discomfiture and disintegration of the other two branches. Of course, the question in Scotland, as elsewhere, concerns not merely Presbyterians; it is a question of religious equality, in which every citizen is concerned. Independently of the large body of United Presbyterians who hold that all connection between Church and State is wrong and inexpedient, there are in Scotland twenty-five or thirty per cent. of the population outside Presbyterian bodies, and on what grounds and on what principle of justice are these taxed for the support of a creed the teachings of which they disapprove? We hold that the revenues arising from teinds are just as much national property as the subsidies by Parliamentary grants or the revenue raised by local rates, and their allocation to a single branch of one religion can only be defended on the same ground as subventions raised by taxation direct and avowed. These revenues from public sources are mere fractions of the revenues of Presbyterianism in Scotland. If members of the Established Church were to combine with that liberality which distinguishes members of the Free Church and the United Presbyterians there would be no difficulty in making good any deficit that might arise through the cessation of public endowments. As a matter of fact, in a considerable number of cases where the Established Church is most vigorous and flourishing, it is self-supporting, and Disestablishment and Disendowment, if they came to-morrow, would create no appreciable disturbance of the existing state of things. It may be said these endowments are necessary for the poorer districts. But it is precisely in those poorer districts that State interference has been found useless. This is notoriously the case in the Highlands. I could, if time permitted, give a list of a dozen parishes in the Highlands with a population of 16,000 inhabitants and only sixty-three communicants of the Established Church kept up at the cost of £8 or £10 per head for a miserable minority of the population. The people in these parishes are strictly Presbyterian, but they belong to the Free Church, and have nothing to do with the Establishment. Speaking on the Bill introduced in 1886 with the avowed object of inducing the Highland parishes to abandon the Free Church, the hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay), who is about to move an Amendment to my proposal now, epigrammatically stated the case in these words:—

“In the country districts of the Highlands the endowed Church had no people, and the people’s Church had no endowment.”

The hon. and learned Member desired to rectify the anomaly by endowing the Church of the people, but we believe it is a far more just plan to disendow the Churches which have not the people. Now in these Debates, though I do not know that it is very germane to the question, the question of the true tenets of the Free Church on the doctrine of State Establishment continually crops up. In vain the Free Church, by resolutions year after year, pronounces in favour of Disestablishment and Disendowment. We are told that position is inconsistent with the creed of the Free Church; and in the discussions on the Bill I have referred to, my hon. and learned Friend quoted the opinion of counsel to the effect that—

“Anyone who did not hold the Establishment principle rejected an essential part of the constitution of the Free Church.”

Well, if that is so, then the Free Church must be more deeply committed to that principle than the Establishment from which it sprang, for in the Campbeltown case—“Smith v. Galbraith,” decided in the Court of Session in 1839, shortly before the disruption—the Court laid down in most emphatic terms that the doctrine of State Establishment never had been the doctrine of the Church of Scotland. In support of that decision Lord Meadowbank, a great authority on ecclesiastical law, and on this subject in perfect accord with his brethren on the Bench, in the course of his judgment said—

“The argument of the pursuer rests, first, on the proposition that it is an essential part of the faith of the Church of Scotland that the State shall maintain and endow that Church for the religious instruction of the people. . . . On that point I entirely concur with the views which your Lordship has so luminously explained. I never heard that, spiritually speaking, it ever was required in the Established Church that the principle of an Established Church in connection with or endowed by the State should be professed as an article of faith. Sure I am that not a word having any tendency to such a doctrine is to be found in any one of the recognised Confessions of Faith promulgated by the Church from the period of the Reformation down to the present hour. On the contrary, the whole history of those tenets, which our Church has ever maintained, is hostile to such a principle.”

Then he goes on to quote the Confession of Faith recognised and enforced by Parliament, 1567, cap. 3, which, he says—

“Is utterly and entirely repugnant to any such principle.”

It may relieve the minds of those who profess to see an attack made upon the tenets of the Church by such a Motion as this to know, on the highest legal authority, the decision of the Court of Session, that if Disestablishment and Disendowment should become law to-morrow not a single principle or tenet of the Established Church would suffer the smallest hurt or damage. Now, in the Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Finlay), and indeed in all the Amendments, with one exception, it is asserted that Disestablishment and Disendowment would not be consonant with the wishes of the Scotch people. My hon. and learned Friend will doubtless base his statement upon the statistics of Petitions presented to this House against Mr. Dick Peddie's Bill. But many of these Petitions were analysed and their worthlessness demonstrated at the time. I will not enter into the matter further than to say there is no Ballot Act existing in connection with Petitions and no Corrupt Practices

Act to prevent a man signing as many Petitions as he likes. But we have had two General Elections and many bye-elections since that date; and when we are told of large numbers of members of the Free Church and of the United Presbyterians having signed these Petitions in favour of Establishment, we may set against these the resolutions passed by the General Assembly and the Synod year after year in favour of Disestablishment and Disendowment, and we may also retort, by asking why, with these Petitions, indicating such numbers in favour of the Establishment, do they not make their views felt by the Members returned to the House? In 1887 Lord Hartington stated that the question was one that should be decided according to the desires of the Scotch people themselves, and that whenever the Scotch people made up their minds upon the question, the Liberal Party would be prepared to deal with it on its merits. My Resolution has been three times before the House in two successive Parliaments. In 1886 there were for every three Scotch Members in its favour only two against, and on the second occasion there was an absolute majority of Scotch Members in its favour. Bye-elections have shown a greater proportion in favour of this proposal among the candidates returned; and on the last occasion in 1890, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian declared that the conditions laid down by Lord Hartington had been fulfilled and the Liberal Party were committed formally to the support of the Resolution, on that occasion forty-three out of the seventy-two Scotch Members voted or paired in its favour. I do not see how these facts can be denied or ignored when the principles of Parliamentary representation are recognised. But the hon. and learned Member for Inverness says—

“It is not desirable in itself, nor consonant with the wishes of the people of Scotland, that the Church of Scotland should be disestablished and its endowments diverted to secular uses; and that, in the opinion of this House, it is highly desirable that the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland should be re-united upon a national basis, and that the endowments should continue to be appropriated to religious purposes.”

Well, it may be highly desirable that the Churches should be united on a national or, as the hon. Member opposite (Mr. de Lisle) would have it, "Catholic" basis, but that will never be accomplished on the basis of any Parliamentary interference short of Disestablishment or Disendowment. That is not only my opinion, but the opinion of men who hold opposite views. When the Patronage Act of 1874 was passed through Parliament, it was again and again alleged that the effect would be to bring about a union between the Established and the Free Churches. The Duke of Argyll, who has always taken a deep interest in Scotch ecclesiastical subjects, saw the fallacy of this contention, and when the Bill was before the House of Lords spoke as follows:—

"I have always said there is no hope of a union of the Free and Established Churches, except on the basis of Disestablishment and Disendowment."

An hon. MEMBER: What was the date?

DR. CAMERON: The Duke of Argyll said that in 1874. If the Duke has changed his opinion since then, the facts on which he then rested it remain unaltered, for he went on to say that there were insurmountable physical difficulties in the way. There were nine hundred ministers who separated themselves voluntarily, and what would become of them? They would starve. That may be the opinion of the Duke of Argyll, but I strongly object to the noble Duke's way of putting it. The Free Church ministers have before now faced starvation on account of what they considered to be their duty. But as to the justice of his main contentions the events of the last eighteen years have left very little doubt. Then there is another opinion expressed by a Gentleman who does not, perhaps, carry the same weight as the Duke of Argyll—the Marquess of Lorne. He has been Governor-General of Canada, and he looks at Church questions in Scotland in the light of his Canadian experience. Writing in 1885 in the Scottish Review the Marquess of Lorne asked—

"Can any honest Presbyterian now believe that union is possible under the Establishment banner? We know it cannot be."

With that opinion I cordially agree. A number of non-established Presbyterian Churches have united. The United Presbyterian Church is an example of this, and the Free Church has been strengthened by the accession of smaller Presbyterian Churches. The Free and United Presbyterian Churches were long engaged in negotiations for union, and if it had not been for obstacles arising out of the existence of the Establishment they would probably have been united long ago. Union can only be brought about by mutual agreement; it can never be brought about by the seduction of individual members, and it can never be brought about by Parliament altering its laws or the conditions of endowment to meet this or that individual's scruples, to tempt this or that individual's cupidity. In the Amendment which is about to be moved the hon. and learned Member practically confesses that the present Establishment in Scotland is unsatisfactory, and modestly asks Parliament in this tenth decade of the nineteenth century to construct a new National Church. He confesses that the application of the endowments is unfair, and he asks the House to endow that new Church. The proposal is presumably that of the Laymen's League, of which he is a distinguished member, and it is to this effect: that Parliament should pass an Act declaring the spiritual independence of the Church; that the endowments of the Establishment should be participated in by the Presbyterian Churches, and that every Presbyterian minister in a parish should be declared the parish minister. But there has been an extremely guarded approval of the last two proposals by the Established Church itself, and the Free Church gave its reply to those proposals last year, when a resolution condemning them was carried by a majority of 7 to 1. The rejection by the United Presbyterians has been even more emphatic. That Church says that it can be no party to any proposals regarding the union of the Churches on the basis of a civil Establishment or participation, by itself or others, in any State endowment or other public funds. What, therefore, would be the result if legislative effect were given to the Amendment which is to be proposed? It would be that State endowments might induce a certain number of seceders to abandon the Free Church and join the Establishment; but the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church would more than ever resent the attack made upon them, and would support more vigorously than before the policy of Disestablishment and Disendowment. It has been said that it would not be easy to give practical legislative effect to my Resolution, but I think that would be vastly easier than to give practical effect to the Amendment if it were accepted by this House. The endowments of the Church of Scotland are not a fixed quantity. They are being constantly augmented, even when they are paid from local sources. The Town Council of Greenock is now engaged in resisting a claim for a stipend of £400 to the parish minister. This claim has arisen out of an undertaking to pay not less than £55 11s. 1½d. per annum, entered into by the predecessors of the Town Council some one hundred and fifty years ago. Already the dispute has cost one expensive lawsuit; a second is going on, and probably there will be appeals to the House of Lords. The whole matter appears to be involved in such confusion that the counsel who drew up the agreement by which Greenock agreed to pay double the sum stipulated, having occasion, as a Judge, to consider the case, and forgetting his previous connection with it, declared that he could not understand the principle on which this agreement had been arrived at. If we give to the Scotch people this sort of thing multiplied by three, you will get a state of feeling that will not promise well for the Establishment which my hon. and learned Friend proposes to set up. We have been asked, why should this motion be brought forward at the end of an expiring Parliament, when the public outside take very little interest in our proceedings? Our reply is this. If we allow this Parliament to close without moving the question, and a new Parliament came in, we should be told, as we have been told again and again, that this question was not before the people of Scotland at the election, and that the Representatives whom they returned had no mandate to express their views on this subject. We desire to make it known that the question is one which cannot be allowed to drop, but one over which we shall fight till victory is achieved. As to the answer that will be given to us to-night that is not a matter of doubt; but earnestly believing in the justice and righteousness of our cause, and believing that in it are bound up the truest interests of religion as well as of religious equality in Scotland, we shall confidently appeal against the adverse verdict of to-night to the supreme decision of the constituencies at the approaching Election. I beg to move the Resolution.

(9.35.) MR. ALEXANDER L. BROWN (Hawick, &c.): I beg to second the Resolution, and as I seldom interpose in the Debates, I feel I may say a few words on a Resolution of this importance. I should like to call the attention of English Members to the fact that those who are supporting Disestablishment and Disendowment in Scotland occupy a much stronger position than those of our friends who are advocating the same thing in England and Wales. In England those who belong to the Established Church have no doubt that the Episcopal is the purest form of Christianity, and is, therefore, deservedly the Established Church of the country. They would look with scorn and contempt on any proposal to assimilate their religion with that of the Baptists, the Independents, or the Wesleyans. In Scotland that is not so. No Established Churchman has ever ventured to say that his form of religion is better than the Free Church or United Presbyterian form. The most that he can say is that it is at least as good, but by his political action he has shown that he does not consider it as good. What has been the tendency of legislation in connection with the Established Church of Scotland in recent years? It has all been in the direction of making the Established Church a little more like the Dissenting Churches. In 1874 a Bill was presented to enable the Established Church, like the Dissenting Churches, to appoint their own ministers. I suppose that was with a view to make the Established Church more popular, and to give to its members the same rights and privileges that the Dissenting Churches possess. That I suppose is the explanation of the Church Patronage Act. In 1886 there was another attempt in the same direction, when the hon. Member who at present sits for Inverness brought forward a Bill to declare, what there appears to be some little doubt about, namely, that the Established Church was a spiritually independent Church. The Bill was intended to convince the Highlander that the Established Church held in all its entirety what is known in Scottish Covenanted history as the doctrine of the headship of Christ. The Bill was voted down, but I am very much surprised that in a House where the Liberal Unionist Party is supposed to be supreme it should not have been re-introduced. But has the hon. Member succeeded in detaching one single member from the Free Church, and inducing him to join the Established Church? The Highlander may be simple, but he sees very clearly that the State which declares this Church independent to-day can just as easily take away that independence to-morrow. And so we have in Scotland the extraordinary spectacle of two Churches side by side, and the Dissenting Churches making themselves so much more popular than the State Church, that the State Church is every now and then coming to this House with Bills to make itself a little more like the Dissenting Churches. We do not look up to the Established Church in Scotland, but I will not say that we look down upon it. It has been charged against us that we want to "pu' doon the kirk," but that is not so. We merely want to raise the Established Church to our own high level. I know there will be every effort on the part of our opponents to raise side issues, and so to prevent the public seeing the great principle for which we are contending, and which is becoming so popular in Scotland — absolute equality of all men and all sects in the eye of the law. However the question may be settled in Church Committees, as politicians we fight under the voluntary flag and no other. There will also be an attempt on the part of our opponents to avoid stating the principle in which they say they believe, that it is the duty of the State to provide for the spiritual needs of the people. Those whose motives are very high will say that plunder and not piety is the mainspring of our action. We shall be asked what practical proposal we have to make; we shall be asked what we propose to do with the money that will be freed. I am not particularly anxious to get our opponents off that line of argument, as it is the line always taken by people who find it impossible to defend the principle for which they are contending. The principal side issues raised in these Debates are that the Established Church of Scotland is the Church of the nation, that it is free to all, that it is the Church of the poor, and that those who defend it are guarding the heritage of the poor. How can a Church be free to a man who utterly disapproves of the principle on which it raises its funds, who considers it dishonourable to put his hand in the State Treasury, which is simply his neighbour's pocket, to build his church and pay his minister? The other Churches are free to all Scotch Presbyterians; the Established Church is the only one which by its civil action shuts its doors in the face of half the people of Scotland. Then, what is meant by the Church of the poor? Does it mean the Church for the poor? for it certainly is not the Church of the poor. You will find in both town and country that it is the rich who go to the Established Church, while the free Churches are crowded by Highlanders and the labouring population. I think you mean the Church for the poor—the Church where they are provided with the inspiration the Christian religion gives for nothing. If that is meant I say there never was, and never will be, a Christian Church which is in that sense the Church of the poor. Our opponents are making a great deal just now of the point that if this controversy is forced on it will form the prin-

oipal bar to the union of the Churches. That I cannot understand at all. How can it be a bar to union to take away the favours one particular sect received from the State? If you say those from whom the favour is taken will sulk all the rest of their lives, then on their own heads be the sin and shame. In 1888 the then Solicitor General for Scotland stated the case as it ought to be stated. He said that he and his friends were bound to do their best for the spiritual interests of the people committed to their care. That is the Church and State argument. I would ask what the State is doing at present for the spiritual interests of the people. It is administering some £300,000; is that the measure of the spiritual interests of Scotland? And how is it that the spiritual interests do not increase? The bills for the Army and Navy increase year by year, but the boldest statesman dare not come forward with a proposal to provide for the increasing spiritual wants of Scotland. If that is so, does it not mean that you are pretending to defend a principle which you dare not put into practice? You dare not put your law into practice. In one of the burghs I represent, near Hawick, when a new minister was recently appointed the Kirk Session wanted to put the manse in repair, but the heritors refused to give one farthing towards it, and said they should be ashamed to come and ask the State to do for them what the other sects did for themselves. But the law is that the heritors are bound to keep the manse in repair. There are many Established Churchmen in Hawick who are glad the heritors did not put upon the community what the Church is well able to do for itself. As to the spiritual interests of the people being committed to the Government, I would ask the House to look upon the front Bench—I mean it without any offence—its occupants consist of men belonging to the Established Church of England, to the Roman Catholic Church—I will not go any further, but how is it possible that the spiritual needs of the Presbyterians of Scotland could be committed to such hands? We have only to look at the front Bench to see how utterly indefensible is the position of our opponents, that the State is bound to provide for the spiritual interests of the people.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this House, the Church of Scotland ought to be Disestablished and Disendowed."—(Dr. Cameron.)

(9.50.) MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): I rise to move the Amendment which stands in my name. I have listened to the speeches of my two hon. Friends, and have nothing to complain of in regard to the tone in which they have brought the question before the House; but I was a little surprised at one or two of the things said by the hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron). He asked the House how it was, if the people of Scotland were opposed to Disestablishment, that there was not a larger contingent of Members from Scotland to support that view. My hon. Friend knows the answer perfectly well. He knows that before the General Election of 1885—one of the two which he said manifested the opinion of the people of Scotland—the right hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) appealed in the most impassioned way to the electors of Scotland to give their votes for Liberal candidates irrespective of their opinions on the Church question. Does my hon. Friend think it right after that election to appeal to its results as evidencing the mind of Scotland on the Church question? His second deduction is equally wide of the mark. It is well known to those who took part in any contest in the election of 1886, that the Church question was not brought up in any constituency; the election took place on an entirely different issue, and, therefore, he cannot suggest that the votes given for Home Rule candidates in 1886 can be construed into support of a proposal for the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland. I was a little more surprised to hear him have the courage to touch upon the grievance of ecclesiastical assessment for the repair of churches and manses. Whose fault is it that that grievance has not been remedied? The grievance would have ceased to exist if it had not been considered a profitable one.

DR. CAMERON: As a matter of fact a Bill was brought in for the special purpose, and it was thrown out again and again by the action of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. FINLAY: I admire my hon. Friend's discretion in referring to a matter of ancient history, but the Bill was dropped by the hon. Member to whom my hon. Friend referred, and for years, instead of bringing in Bills to remedy the grievance, that Party has devoted itself to steadily opposing them. My hon. Friend said it is vain to hope that the Churches of Scotland will be united by Parliamentary interference. I have never advocated Parliamentary interference for that purpose. All that Parliament can do is to remove any obstacles in the way of re-union, and when the Churches, as I hope they may, have been able to agree on some basis of re-union, the State might lend its aid. The hon. Member for the Hawick Burghs (Mr. Alexander Brown) made one remark which surprised me. He said that the object of the Established Church of Scotland had been to endeavour to raise itself to the high level already reached by the Dissenting Churches in Scotland. Is not my hon. Friend a reader of the history of Dissent in Scotland? Is he not aware that every secession from the Established Church has been, not on the ground that those who seceded differed from the principles of the Church, but because they held that the majority of the day were not carrying out those principles in their entirety? When the grievance of patronage was removed, the Church of Scotland was returning to its best traditions, and reverting to that freedom which the Church claims as its birth-right. My hon. Friend also said that in this matter he was fighting under the flag of voluntaryism. Then, all I can say is that if he is fighting under that flag he is not fighting under the flag of the Free Church, for nothing is more certain than that anyone adopting voluntaryism is at issue with the Free Church on a vital point. It is impossible, in discussing the Disestablishment of the Scotch Church, not to carry one's mind back to the arguments for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church; and, looking at the arguments in favour of that measure, one will find that in every part there is the most striking contradiction between the circumstances existing in the case of the Irish Church and those in the case of the Scotch Church. The Irish Church was disestablished because it was the Church of a small minority of the people of Ireland, and was not growing in the attachment of the people of Ireland. In the case of Scotland, beyond all question, the Established Church embraces within its fold one-half of the Protestants of Scotland. Then why is it we hear so much of these proposals to disestablish the Church of Scotland? It is not pretended that it is because the Church is weak. This agitation has been started because the Church is strong, and is getting stronger every day. They feel that the Church is growing, and unless it can be pulled down in no very long time it will be too strong for any attack. The Church of Ireland, again, represented a faith which was not the faith of the people of Ireland; it represented beliefs alien to those of the vast majority of the people of Ireland. Is that the case with the Church of Scotland? Is that the case with the Church of Scotland? The doctrines and government of the Established Church of Scotland are identical with the doctrines and government of the other Presbyterian Churches of Scotland. How is that, from any point of view which appears to have been stated to the House, an argument for pulling down the Church of Scotland? Is this a matter which ought to be looked at from a national point of view, or should it be looked at from the point of view of the rival bodies? I cannot help feeling that, in the great part of the arguments to which we have listened in this House and elsewhere in favour of Disestablishment, there is an under-current to this effect: that this question ought to be treated as if it were a question between rival corporations. After all, Churches and Ecclesiastical Organisations are merely a means to an end. We ought not in our zeal for the means to lose sight of the end. The Free Church, the United Presbyterian Church, and the other Dissenting Churches of Scotland are great and useful bodies, but it is possible that we should be so engrossed in the welfare of the body to which we may happen to become attached as to lose sight of the fact that, after all, these bodies, the Dissenting Bodies of Scotland as well as the Established Church of Scotland, exist for the promotion of one great end, and that is the promotion of the religious and moral welfare of the people of Scotland; and what I ask this House to do is to treat this question from a national point of view. We ought not to look at these Churches as if they were so many competitors for the custom of the people of Scotland. There seemed to be a disposition in the speeches of my hon. Friends who moved and seconded this Motion to personify these Churches, and to endeavour to treat it as a sort of grievance to the Free Church and the other Dissenting Churches of Scotland that the Established Church should be under the protection of the State. What is the grievance? Is it a grievance to the people of Scotland? Surely not. The Established Church exists for the purpose of teaching those doctrines which have been professed and taught by the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church, as well as by the Established Church of Scotland. Is it a grievance of the same kind as that which might be set up by any private teachers who consider that their business is interfered with if the State sets up national schools for furthering the education of the people? Surely it ought not to be considered as a grievance by those religious bodies that endowments, which in ancient times were devoted to sacred purposes, should be continued to be applied to the teaching of those doctrines which are dear to almost the whole Protestant population of Scotland. If the object of the agitation for Disestablishment be to give a triumph to rival religious organisations I can understand it; but if what they ought to look at is the welfare of the people of Scotland, I confess I do not see how the withdrawal of these endowments from objects which are dear to almost the whole people of

Scotland can be regarded as either desirable in itself or as likely to meet with the approval of the people of Scotland. Now, what is the feeling of the people of Scotland with regard to this matter? The second portion of the Amendment, which I now submit to the House, is this:—

“That it is not consonant with the wishes of the people of Scotland that the Church established should be disestablished, and its endowments diverted to secular uses.”

We are told in some quarters that the Dissenting Churches of Scotland desire that there should be Disestablishment and Disendowment. I think the hon. Gentlemen who lay down that proposition have been either misled by the deliverances that proceed from the General Assemblies of these bodies, and that they have mistaken the voice of the majority in the General Assembly of the Free Church for the voice of the lay body of the Free Church. I do not deny at the present time that a very considerable majority of the clergy of the Free Church of Scotland have year after year voted in favour of the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland. There is a very respectable minority indeed among the clergy of the Free Church of Scotland who have declined to be a party to any such resolution. But I do most absolutely deny that in this resolution which has been carried in the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland they represent the feeling of the laity of that Church. Some reference has been made to the provision of the Treaty of Union, by which the Establishment of the Scottish Church was supposed to be guaranteed. I never have put that provision so high as some of my hon. and learned Friends have desired to put it. Everything, of course, is in the power of Parliament. Our ancestors no doubt imagined that they had guaranteed most effectually the continued existence of the Established Church of Scotland; but I do say this, without any hesitation, that after a treaty of that kind it would be a breach of faith on the part of the united Parliament to disestablish the Church of Scotland without a clear manifestation of opinion from the people of Scotland in favour of that step.

Since the object of such a provision in the Treaty of Union, in which a weaker country joins with a stronger, was to stipulate for certain powers which it desires to remain unbroken, if that weaker country afterwards changes its mind, and is willing that the Treaty of Union should be modified in this particular, so be it; and the change can be effected without any breach of faith. That condition was fulfilled in the case of the Irish Church, for there is no doubt whatever that the vast majority of the people of Ireland were in favour of the Disestablishment of the Church of Ireland. Has that condition been fulfilled in the case of the Church of Scotland? Can anyone say that the opinion of the people of Scotland has been taken upon this point, and that it has been pronounced in favour of Disestablishment? I do not think the proposition can be more clearly stated than it was by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian in a speech made in the course of the Midlothian campaign in 1879. He then said—

“I should be a party objecting strongly to any attempt to filch or to gain an advantage against the Church of Scotland, or against anything that is Scottish, without a fair consideration of the circumstances by the people of Scotland, to whom it should be referred. The reference must be a real reference. There must be a real consideration in order to have a real decision. Nay, the decision must not only be really manifested and pointed, but an undeniable decision, in order to bring about any fresh issue or any great change.”

Has there been any such reference or decision? Propositions have been made over and over again by the friends of the Church, who are confident that they have got the support of the people of Scotland in this matter behind them, in order that the opinion of the people of Scotland might be taken on this point apart from other issues. How have these overtures been met by the advocates of Disestablishment? They have been scouted as unconstitutional. (“Hear, hear!”) No doubt the constitutional mode of taking the opinion of the people of Scotland is by Parliamentary election. But what objection is there to putting in force some machinery which would elicit what the views of the people of Scotland are on this point, uncomplicated by other issues? Why is it that such propositions have always been scoffed at and jeered at? I will tell right hon. Gentlemen why. Because the advocates of Disestablishment are afraid of the result. As no such proposal will be accepted by the advocates of Disestablishment, we are thrown back upon the constitutional means of making known the wishes of the people of Scotland upon this matter. And what is that? Surely it is a General Election turning upon this question. I know that that view is derided, and I know that it is considered absurd that there should be a General Election upon this question. I refer the gentlemen who regard that proposal as preposterous to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, whom, I take it, they will hardly repudiate upon that point. When addressing the electors of Midlothian on this very subject in the course of the Midlothian campaign, he referred, speaking at Gilmerton, to the case of the Irish Church. He pointed out that resolutions were introduced and carried; and not only that those resolutions were carried, but that they did not bring about the destruction of the Irish Church, though they had raised the question in the face of the country, and that Parliament was dissolved upon the question. And he went on to say—

“Even in the case of the Irish Church, which was far weaker than that of the Scottish Church, even in that case there was, after the subject had been raised in Parliament, a Dissolution expressly upon the case. The verdict of the country was given only after a full trial and consideration, and this is what the Established Church of Scotland fairly and justly asks.”

Will the right hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) get up and repudiate that, and say that that is an absurd proposal? Does he now propose to take the opinion of Scotland upon this question, or does he now deride the idea of a General Election upon this question?—because, forsooth, it is so very small. I do not admit that the question is a very small one. Scotland, it is true, is not so large as England; but, still, the question of the existence of the Established Church of Scotland is a very serious matter for the people of Scotland to decide, and a matter on which they are entitled to have a deciding voice, without other considerations, which would complicate the verdict and confuse the voice of the country, being mixed up with that great issue. But surely the question of Disestablishment in Scotland loses none of its importance when you look at what the effect of such a proposal in Scotland would be upon the Church of England. Is it such a ridiculous proposal that the question of Disestablishment in Scotland should form the subject of a General Election before it is taken up by a responsible Government? Why is it that so much interest is taken in the subject of Disestablishment in Scotland by the Liberation Society in England? They do not care so much about the Church of Scotland—whether it exists, or whether it does not—but they know perfectly well that they are approaching the Church of England, and that the first operation of Disestablishment in England is that the Church of Scotland should be brought to the ground. That feature of the question was brought out with almost irresistible force by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, whose speeches upon this question in former years afford a perfect magazine of materials for the defence of the Church. In 1885, when he was appealing in the most earnest way to the electors of Midlothian and the people of Scotland not to be misled into the absurdity of not voting for the Liberal candidate because he was a Disestablishment man—when he was appealing to them to vote for the Liberal candidate who represented his opinion upon the Church, he pointed out that the question of the Church in England could not be raised without the greatest damage to the Liberal cause; and he pointed out that if the question of Disestablishment was raised in Scotland it would at once be taken up by the electors of England, and he used these very remarkable words on the 16th November, 1885, speaking at Edinburgh:—

“The first consequence of urging that Disestablishment should be made a test question in Scotland would be that the friends of the Church of England would in one great phalanx rush to the poll and support the interests of the Church of Scotland and throw their weight into the scale adverse to Disestablishment.”
Mr. Finlay

Is it possible—looking at the question of the Church of Scotland either as it affects the people of Scotland in itself or in its bearings, most keenly appreciated by the advocates of Disestablishment in England, on the question of the Sister Church in England—is it possible to say that a question so trumpery as that could not be taken in hand before there has been a Dissolution upon the question? The advocates of Disestablishment, while they sedulously avoid any machinery for taking the opinion of the people on this one question, and while they profess to flout the notion of Dissolution upon that issue, say, “Look at the voice of the Scotch Members in Parliament.” What is the good of looking at the way Scotch Members vote when they were returned irrespective of this question? We have got a very good authority for saying that the Scotch Members on this point may not represent the opinions of their constituents. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian represent the opinions of the electors of Midlothian on this question? Why, when he was invited to express his opinion upon this question of the Scottish Church in 1885, the opinion of the electors of Midlothian was taken upon the question, with the result that sixty-nine per cent. of the electors of Midlothian, with the exception of three parishes—in which there was no reason to suppose any different result—actually signed a declaration against Disestablishment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian does not represent the opinion of his constituents on this question; and what security have we that the other Members from Scotland represent the opinion of their constituents? There is a constituency adjoining Midlothian with which in former days I had occasion to make myself acquainted, that is the constituency of East Lothian, represented by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Wallace), whom I do not see in the House; but although my connection with that constituency was not so long as my hon. and learned

Friend—and I never had the honour of representing it in Parliament at all—I certainly got to know enough of that constituency to be aware that my hon. and learned Friend in his advocacy of Disestablishment most certainly does not represent the opinion of that constituency. If he is returned again, as for personal reasons I should be glad he would be, he will be returned not because of his Disestablishment opinions, but in spite of them. The advocates of Disestablishment in Scotland preferred to trust to what they call the play of Political Parties; and the modus operandi is extremely simple. They have, as a rule, captured the Liberal organisation. The Liberal organisation selects a candidate. The first stipulation that the Liberal committee makes is that the candidate should be prepared to swallow Disestablishment. Until he adopts that shibboleth he is not qualified to stand as a Liberal candidate. But when that is achieved, then he comes forward as a candidate representing the Liberal cause, and the electors are appealed to to support the Liberal candidate as against the Tory candidate. Then they are told they should vote on general grounds of politics and that their vote will not tell against the Church Establishment, but when the election is over then that gentleman, if he be returned, is paraded in the House as evidence of the opinion of the people of Scotland. When you have an election turning upon this question in Scotland, then I think the result will astonish a good many of my hon. Friends who sit for Scotch constituencies with a very scanty acquaintance with the groundwork of Scottish opinion on this subject. There are two portions of the Amendment I have to put before the House, and the second portion is as follows:—

“It is highly desirable that the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland should be reunited upon a National basis, and that the endowments should continue to be appropriated to religious purposes.”

Now I apprehend that hardly any doubt can be entertained by anyone that it is desirable that there should be re-union among the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland. Why are they separated? Their doctrine and government are absolutely identical, and the question that every man must ask is, “Why do they remain apart?” We are sometimes told, “You have only to disestablish and you will have re-union,” but I venture to think that instead of Disestablishment bringing about union it would put the greatest possible obstacle in the way. I do not think that Members acquainted with the feeling in Scotland will say that the Established Church has been the obstacle to re-union. On the contrary, I venture to think that it is only on the basis of a National Church that a union of the Presbyterian bodies in Scotland is likely to take place. Surely some light may be derived from history in this matter. The Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church entered into negotiations for re-union, and why was it these negotiations came to no result? Neither of them was established; the difficulty had nothing to do with an Established Church, as my hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) seemed to suggest. The difficulty was simply this, that the Free Church discovered that it was as my hon. Friend has pointed out in the opinion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. J. B. Balfour) and a very distinguished Member of the Scotch Bar, who is now on the Bench—that it was a fundamental tenet of the Free Church that the Establishment principle should be recognised. The hon. Member for Glasgow quoted the sentence which, as many Members are now here who did not hear it, I may repeat—

“Anyone who does not hold the Establishment principle rejects in our opinion an essential point in the government of the Free Church.”

There is no power to alter that essential principle. That is why the negotiations between the Free Church and the United Presbyterians miscarried; it had nothing to do with the existence of the Established Church. If you carried a measure for Disestablishment to-day, you would not bring the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church any nearer, for there would still remain the unsurmountable barrier I have mentioned. The Free

Church and the United Presbyterian Church would not be one whit nearer if the Established Church were disestablished to-morrow. It is an essential tenet of the Free Church that the Establishment principle should be recognised whatever may be the opinion of the majority of the hour in the General Assembly of the Free Church, and I do not believe that the clergy of the Free Church represent their congregations in this matter. We have cogent evidence to the contrary, and my impression is that if this matter of re-union of the Scottish churches were left to the laity of Scotland it would be settled in the course of twelve months. There is a strong feeling to that effect in Scotland, and the outcome of that feeling has been the formation of that body known as the "Laymen's League," of which I hope my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Campbell Bannerman) may become a distinguished member. That body represents the feeling of laymen that there is a great and lamentable waste of ecclesiastical machinery in Scotland under the present ecclesiastical arrangements in that country. One united Church would suffice for the religious ordinances of the people, and why should the present state of things continue? Would any man of business tolerate such a state of things in matters under his control? Certainly not, he would look at it in this way, "Here we have these endowments long appropriated to sacred purposes; let us take them as the basis for a National Church as our starting point, and see whether we can get all this ecclesiastical machinery so fitted that it will work in promoting the religious and moral welfare of the people, so that we may go on without these unseemly and meaningless controversies." I must notice the statement my hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) made in reference to the Highlands. He said it was notorious that the Church of Scotland did not provide for the poorer districts of the country, and he instanced the Highlands. I quite agree with my hon. Friend that in a large portion of the Highlands the people to a great extent—to a very great extent—do not belong to the Established Church; but was it quite fair not to add what everyone who knows anything of the position must know—that these very members of the Free Church in the Highlands are the most devoted opponents to Disestablishment in the country? Is this the way to convey a correct impression of the Church situation in Scotland? Surely it is fair to remember and to mention that in the Free Church in the Highlands are the most resolute opponents of Disestablishment; that they regard these endowments as appropriated to sacred purposes? My hon. Friend has cited the people of the Highlands as witnesses in favour of, instead of opponents to, Disestablishment.

DR. CAMERON: I cited the case of the Highlands for the purpose of showing the absolute uselessness of State Establishment and State Endowment in the poorer districts of Scotland.

MR. FINLAY: I do not complain of what he said, but of what he did not say. Surely the scandal of competing Churches in the Lowlands, and the state of things in the Highlands to which I have just been adverting, is enough to justify one in saying that it is desirable that the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland should be re-united on a national basis, and that the endowments should continue to be appropriated to religious purposes. There is very little in the way of re-union; and the obstacle, such as it is, was very nearly removed in 1886. My hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs said the Bill for that purpose in 1886 was thrown out of this House. He forgot to add that it was thrown out by a very small majority. I do not know why my hon. Friend should refer to that occasion. I should have been disposed if I had referred to it at all to refer to it rather as an occasion of encouragement to those who think that the very small obstacle in the way of principle might be taken out of the way of the Churches, so that there might be no further impediment to their re-union. All that is really needed is a very little mutual accommodation on the part of members of the different Churches. And what the laity of Scotland are disposed to bear in mind is, that all these ecclesiastical organisations exist but as a means to an end. They think that those who are concerned in the direction of ecclesiastical affairs in Scotland in the great Dissenting bodies are sometimes given to mistake the means for the end. The spirit of patriotism is developed in connection with the association to which a man happens to belong, which leads him to mistake the organisation for the great object for which the organisation itself exists. If there is anything distinctive in the history of Scotland it is the history of the Scottish National Church. It is not necessary that a man should be even a Presbyterian to appreciate the great features of the religious history of Scotland. Of course every country must shape its own institutions and its own views, but a great deal of what is best in the life of Scotland has taken shape in the National Church of Scotland. I would appeal to every Scotchman who has some sense of what is due to his country—who has some sense of what is due to the past of his country, who has some care for the future of his country—not to lend a hand to destroy that which it cost his forefathers so hard a struggle to build up.

(10.34.) MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I rise to second the Amendment that my hon. Friend has so ably moved. The hon. Member or the College Division quoted the great work that the Free Church has done since the disruption in building up a structure for itself. It is a great and splendid work that it has done, but in what spirit did that Church start? It started with a movement of splendid religious enthusiasm, a movement which all of us, whether we belong to that Church or whether we do not, admire for its strength, its earnestness, and its unselfishness. But is that the kind of spirit, the kind of impetus, with which we are trying to set the Established Church adrift? You are not telling it to start off on a mission of religion. Instead you are saying, "Erring sister go in peace;" you are seeking to send it away in disgrace, and with the reputation of having done evil in the past. In the Free Church they are now finding difficulty from the loss of force and impetus which the dying out of the disruption feeling has given them. Two days ago the Moderator of the Free Church in his introductory address said this—

"For many years the special circumstances under which the Free Church came into being as a separate body formed a powerful factor in her history. A Church that had made such sacrifices . . . commanded the respect of all and the adherence of many. For a whole generation the disruption was a circumstance in their favour which no man could misunderstand, but to-day this strong force was almost wholly spent. . . . The loss of this initial force was really a very great one."

That was the answer to those who say that in proposing to disestablish and disendow the Church they are not hurting the Established Church, but that they are simply giving it the chance which the Free Church had before. And then they profess that this Disendowment is to lead to re-union. Reunion? We are only just now coming to the end of the bitter feeling that the disruption caused fifty years ago, and the disruption was not so much a contest between different sections of the Church as between the leading persons in the Church and the Court of Session and the Houses of Parliament. This present movement is a movement which is considered a clerical and ministerial one, and, therefore, the success of it would mean a permanent bitterness in the relations of the different Presbyterian bodies in Scotland which would last not fifty years, but which would not have expired at the end of a century. It has recently been sought by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian and others to throw the onus upon those who are defending the Church instead of on those who are attacking it. That is entirely unjustifiable. It is for those who attack an institution which exists, and is doing a great work, who seek to change the historic policy of a country, to act not only against the ideas of the Established Church but directly against the whole tenets of the Free Church, and to do what not even the tenets and creeds of the Presbyterian Church in sist on—to do all that for the sake of a phrase, a phrase which in Scotland has no meaning, “religious equality”—to prove their case. It is not suggested that the Church is asleep or stagnant; it is not suggested that she is simply resting on her endowments, and not doing work outside those endowments; that she is not doing a great work and spending what funds she has to the best advantage of nine-tenths of the country. There are none of those great inequalities of payments and of value of livings between one place and another as in the English Church; none of those inequalities which make a certain invidious distinction between the Established Church and Dissent in this country. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs tried to state that the Church of Scotland was the Church of the rich, and not of the poor. He tried it very feebly, and I should like to see him put forward that argument in an assembly of Scotchmen, and debate the question. There is one argument which I am glad to say has not been put forward, and which cannot be relied on for the Disestablishment of the Scotch Church. The Disestablishment of the Scotch Church is not a question of money. The question that is to be fought out there is the question of principle, because the whole amount that would be gained by the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Scotch Church is something wholly and completely insignificant. The value put by the Disestablishment Committee in their circular on the National Funds that would be obtained in connection with the Disendowment would be something like £380,000 a year. A good deal of that, I think, could not in any way be realised. For instance, the assessments of churches and mansees could certainly not be realised in case of Disendowment, and then it was admitted a year or two ago by the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow, and also by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, that when you are dealing with this question you must deal with life interests in a generous spirit—that you must give up all the endowments that have been given to the Church by individuals, and that you must compensate all life interests in a large and generous style. And after you have done that in the same style as you did in Ireland, you would find nearly half the capital value of the Church used up; that was the proportion that they used up in Ireland. If you do that you would have a balance at the outside of £150,000 a year, though many are of opinion that it would be a great deal less. That is the whole amount of money you would have to distribute by destroying the establishment and endowments of this Church. It would not be more than half the amount of money which in this present Session has come as a windfall to Scotland, and over which we were nightly squabbling a few days ago. Is it worth while destroying an institution for money of that sort? Is the Establishment question a burning question now? There is no general feeling and no general activity in Scotland in its favour. Where are the public meetings, the petitions, the discussions and the newspaper articles that show that the question is in the people's mind as a burning and active question? It was brought forward strongly by the hon. Gentlemen, among others, in 1885, and it was pressed forward desperately on the ground that it was “now or never” then. But when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian came down and was expected to curse the Church, to the surprise and bitter disappointment of keen disestablishers, instead of doing that he gave the word that the question of the Church at that election was not in any way to be a test question. Liberal Churchmen accepted that all over Scotland, and immediately after that speech a manifesto was issued by the Liberal Churchmen who had taken part in meetings held in defence of the Establishment. That manifesto was as follows:

“We loyally accept the declaration of Mr. Gladstone, as the Leader of the Liberal Party, that he will not support the Motion of Dr. Cameron, and that the vote upon that Motion is not to be taken as affording such an expression of the opinion of the people of Scotland as he has declared to be the indispensable condition of practical legislation on the subject. We shall accordingly give our votes at the ensuing election on the understanding, sanctioned by our Leader, that the question of Establishments is not one of the test questions at that election."

The result came out in the number of Liberal Members who were elected throughout Scotland in 1885, but who certainly would not have been elected except for the action of the Churchmen. There is only one point that was quoted by the hon. Member for the College Division that I should like to refer to, and that was in regard to the Highlands, and in regard to measuring the effect of the Established Church in certain Highland parishes by the number of communicants. If he wanted to compare the hold of the Established Church with the hold of the Free Church upon those parishes, he should also have mentioned the number of communicants in the Free Churches in those parishes. All of us who know the Highlands know that in these places there is a very strong feeling, a superstitious fear, against becoming a communicant, and consequently, while you will have a very large number of adherents of a Church, you may count on your fingers the number of communicants, whether they belong to the Established Church or to the Free Church. But I do not want to base my case in any way upon percentages. The case would be gone if it was merely a question of the casting vote of some small section of the community. What we base our case on is that we say that thousands and hundreds of thousands outside the Established Church of Scotland do not desire Disestablishment. You complain of petitions being unreliable. Of course no one ever supposed that petitions were absolutely and strictly reliable, for when you have petitions of 650,000 on the one side and petitions of 3,000 on the other, there remains a good deal of margin for striking off accidental discrepancies, names put on that were not entitled to be on the petitions, and so on. I do not wish to enter on the question of the voluntary principles. I respect the principles but I do not agree with them, and I do not wish now to argue them. All we can say is that they are not the principles of the Free Church; they may be the principles of the leaders of the Free Church, of large sections in the Free Church, but they are not the principles of the standards of the Free Church. Those principles are stated in the very strongest and clearest terms in the document which the Free Church chose for itself as its standard and test of membership. Dr. Chalmers, the first Moderator in the first Free Church Assembly, said this :—

"Though we quit the Establishment, we go out on the Establishment principle. We quit a vitiated Establishment, but we rejoice in returning to a pure one. To express it otherwise, we are the advocates for a national recognition and national support of religion, and we are not voluntaries."

Patronage was not the cause of the disruption. The Church has got on with patronage for 130 years. It was not a matter of conscience. It was simply the encroachments of the Court of Session that brought about the disruption. It was in search of spiritual independence that the Free Church went out in 1843—it was with the mistaken idea that they would get more spiritual independence outside the Establishment than they had inside that they went. In truth, the Established Church is at the present time the freest and most independent of any. The Church has a status of its own recognised by the Constitution which no other Church in Scotland has. Members of the Church are not content to have no views of their own; they are not content to merely watch the current of public opinions without taking part in it themselves. What is the way out of the difficulty? Presbyterians are in agreement all over the world; why should they not also be in harmony at home? Some ministers of the Free Church and of the Established Church hold services in one another's parishes, and the Established Church is willing to hold forth the chance of coming back on the principles which are the principles of the Free Church. To carry out a scheme of that sort—to bring the Churches together in one strong and solid Church, holding the old Scotch Presbyterian views—would be a task worthy of any statesman who has the confidence of the nation. It is in order to assist in this task of bringing the Presbyterian bodies together in this way that I desire to support the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "it is not desirable in itself, nor consonant with the wishes of the people of Scotland, that the Church of Scotland should be disestablished and its endowments diverted to secular uses; and that, in the opinion of this House, it is highly desirable that the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland should be reunited upon a national basis, and that the endowments should continue to be appropriated to religious purposes."—(Mr. Finlay.)

*(10.5.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): If I ask to be allowed to occupy some small part of the time devoted by the House to-night to the discussion of this subject—time all too scanty for the importance of the question—I do not think it will be grudged to me when I state that, having been a Scotch Representative for twenty-four years, I have not yet opened my mouth in this House on the subject of the Scotch Church. My intention is not to invite the House to consider the broad and general question raised by the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), but rather the position in which that question is now placed in consequence of the attitude of those who oppose Disestablishment. The Resolution moved has this advantage, I think, over the rival propositions before the House—that it is, at least, perfectly plain, unambiguous, and unequivocal. There cannot be the slightest doubt as to what my hon. Friend and those who support him mean. The Resolution means that the one branch of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland which is at present favoured with State patronage should no longer be distinguished in that respect from the two sister Churches. It means that these three Churches and all other religious bodies in Scotland should be put upon a footing of absolute political equality. It means that the public funds which are at present applied towards the maintenance of the work and ordinances of the Established Church should in future be devoted to some public beneficent purpose or purposes, in the benefits of which all our countrymen in the several localities of the country may share without distinction of creed, or Church, or opinion. That is what my hon. Friend and those who support him mean. Those of us who join in commending this policy to the House do not found ourselves merely upon the general theory of religious equality; we found ourselves upon the events of Scotch ecclesiastical history, upon the glaring inequality and injustice presented by the present relative position of the three Churches; and we found ourselves further upon the fact that, if there is one country under the sun in which the interests of religion can with perfect safety be left to the free action of the people, that country is Scotland. I would myself go further, and say that if there is a Church in any country under the sun which is fit and qualified in all respects to discharge in overflowing measure all the sacred functions which can be fulfilled by a religious society it is the present Established Church of Scotland, with the vitality and energy she has shown in recent years. That is our case. It has been put before Parliament so amply on many occasions that it is unnecessary to dwell upon it now. But how is our proposal met? We have been accustomed hitherto to be told that if our policy were adopted, the interests of religion would be sacrificed, that the moral and social progress of Scotland would be endangered, and that the State support of some Church or other was essential to what is called the national recognition of religion, and that without this national recognition of religion no prosperity can be expected for a country. That is a theory which I entirely reject, but I feel that it at least occupies lofty and even sacred ground. But have we heard it to-night? It has not been mentioned; it has disappeared. But we shall hear it again. We shall hear it constantly—on village platforms, in leaflets, in the conversation of canvassers seeking to win votes; but it is not brought forward into the broad light of discussion in the House of Commons. Let me say that if that argument has anything in it, it, of course, supersedes all others; and if there is any force in it, then I must say that to be told the elements which are to determine a great cause like this are the wishes of the people of Scotland and the opportunities of debate in the House of Commons is not only idle, but I think I would go so far as to say that it is also insincere. If hon. Members who wish to oppose the Motion do so on the larger doctrine, why do they take refuge in these smaller questions which we find raised to-night? What are these Motions against the proposal of my hon. Friend, which we may take as representing the strongest and most effective argument that can be brought in opposition. There are two coming from different parts of the House—one from my hon. relative opposite, the hon. Member for Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities (Mr. J. A. Campbell), and the other from the hon. Member who has just sat down. These two Members are practically identical in political opinion, and, accordingly, the Amendments are identical in terms. And what do these Amendments say? They say there is no reason, either as regards the present position of the Church or the wishes of the people, why proposals for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church should be entertained. If I were to be critical, I should express my surprise at the phrasing of the Amendments. It is not that the proposal should not be accepted or adopted—but “entertained.” To entertain a proposal is a suggestion of a compromise. I do not know whether that is intended. But let me point out that both these Amendments give up any rigid principle on the matter whatsoever—they are founded upon the present position of the Church and upon the wishes of the people. The present position of the Church is what it has been for the last fifty years, with the exception that the Church is stronger, and, therefore, better able to support itself by voluntary action than ever before. So that, as far as the argument from the present position of the Church goes, it is an argument in favour of the Resolution. Then it is said we are to be guided by the wishes of the people, and I have every respect for the wishes of the people when they are expressed in the usual constitutional fashion through their Representatives. Then my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. Arthur Elliot) has an Amendment—and let me express my no small surprise at finding him among the ardent champions of Church Disestablishment—in which he wishes the whole matter to be postponed until we have first of all had adequate Parliamentary discussion, and until we have had a definite expression of opinion. By “definite expression of opinion” I suppose he means, as did the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, that there should be some step taken to ascertain in a special manner the views of the people of Scotland on this subject. I do not know whether my hon. Friend refers to a referendum or a plébiscite, or to something which requires some other outlandish name. If he means that a special vote should be taken, I must remind my hon. Friend that it would be almost an impossibility to obtain absolute demonstration by any such process. There is, I believe, a process in physics of resolving forces so that you may isolate some one force, and consider its individual effect on the hypothesis that no other forces are acting, but can you apply such a process to a moral or practical question? Suppose there was a plébiscite taken, and my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburghshire gave his vote on this question. Would he guarantee that at the same time he would not have one of his eyes, if not both, looking at the question of the Union with Ireland? It is obvious that in a country like this, where there are so many interests affecting men's opinions, you cannot completely remove one opinion from another. A party man will take a party view. This process of separation has never been attempted in this country, and I hope it never will be.

MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I said nothing about a plébiscite.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: But how is the hon. Member to get this "definite expression of opinion" of the people of Scotland? Could a General Election perform the process of the abstraction of which I have spoken? Even supposing it were possible for a General Election to turn mainly upon the question of Scotch Disestablishment, how are we to know that that would even represent in Scotland an opinion purely and solely confined to the one question and the merits of this case? No, Sir, I confess I am constitutional enough and simple-minded enough to prefer the recognised mode of taking the judgment of the country. Then there remains the most important Amendment on the Paper, in the name of the hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay). My hon. Friend has at least this advantage over the others of whom I have spoken. He, at least, has the courage to say what he means, and he boldly traverses the thesis of the hon. Member for the College Division, and says that it is not desirable in itself that the Church of Scotland should be disestablished—more than either of the chosen champions of the Church of Scotland ventures to say in his Motion. But my hon. Friend also said much in his speech of this necessity for a special expression of the opinion of the people of Scotland. His arguments seem to me to come perilously near the fatal doctrine of Home Rule, because he was most anxious that the question should be determined solely by the Scotch people; and yet when he came to recommend his views further to the Committee he reminded them of the fact that the fate of the English Church would be largely in people's minds in England when voting upon this question. Therefore, the Home Rule which he wished to encourage would surely be over-ridden. My hon. Friend alluded to his intimate knowledge of the feeling of a part of Scotland far away from that district where he now so appropriately finds his seat. He talked of East Lothian, and until we elicited the fact it would have been difficult to discover that his connection with that district consisted in the circumstance that he was the unsuccessful candidate in an election there. Having followed that election pretty closely, I venture to say that two things were against him. The first was, that he was not outspoken in favour of Disestablishment, and, therefore, did not commend himself to the Liberal electors; and the other reason, which was absolutely fatal, was that he had the misfortune to be supported by the Scotsman newspaper, which every day covered the noble Lord the Member for Ipswich (Lord Elcho), who was his rival, with such constant denunciation and vilification as would have turned anybody willing to vote for my hon. Friend into a supporter of his abused opponent. I now come to what is the real gist of the question before us to-night. My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness talks in a somewhat vague way of re-union on a national basis. What does he mean by a national basis? Let us deal for the moment with the Presbyterian Church alone, without reference to other religious bodies, although these after all have also something to say on this question. Let us look the facts in the face, and I would here ask the House to bear with a Scotchman while he endeavours to explain facts, not familiar to those who have not the advantage of being Scotchmen. What does my hon. Friend mean by re-union on a national basis? Does he merely mean that the three Scotch Presbyterian Churches should make one great National Presbyterian Church? If so, we all agree. There is no reason under heaven why that most desirable consummation should not be effected. But my hon. Friend has used the term "national basis," not in the sense of a national Scotch basis, but in the sense of a State Church basis. Let the House realise what this means when I have stated a few facts. I wish to treat this question from a practical point of view, and of course, as I think, from a common-sense point of view too. And by that I mean I will put aside all ecclesiastical or political theories, and the arguments drawn from Scotch ecclesiastical history, for, however interesting these may be to the student, and however useful to garnish and adorn our position, it is not by them that the feeling of the Scotch people will be practically influenced in this matter. The Presbyterian Church has three branches. The first in order is the Established Church itself, of which I need say nothing. The next is a body called the United Presbyterian Church, an agglomeration of Churches which from time to time have seceded mainly on the ground of spiritual independence; and the fundamental, essential doctrine of this United Presbyterian Church is that the interference of the State in religious affairs is unscriptural and injurious, and that the interests of religion are best served when they are entrusted to the voluntary effort of the people. The third body is the Free Church, the inheritors of those who left the Church in 1843, under circumstances so dramatic and so full of heroism, in protest against the interference of the civil power in spiritual matters. This Church includes a considerable number of men who are—to use the word of my hon. and learned Friend behind me—passionately devoted to that extreme doctrine of the State Church, which is now apparently abandoned by the champions of the Established Church. (“No, no!”) Well, the fact that the hon. Member says “No” will not prevent me holding that opinion. But it is a comparatively small section now which holds these extreme views. The great majority of the members of the Free Church of Scotland, lay and clerical, have by declarations year after year shown that they do not recognise the idea of re-incorporation except on the basis of perfect liberty and equality—in other words, Disestablishment. Now, does my hon. Friend propose a formal, honest, and open incorporation of these two seceding Churches in the Established Church? Not at all. Anyone can see that, in the circumstances I have stated, such an incorporation is practically impossible, and, in fact, to propose it is an insult to the consciences of those to whom it is offered. But the object is to create some such modification in the position of the Established Church as shall tempt deserters to come back to it from the rival folds. Therefore, while professing peace, it is war that the hon. Member brings. By some specious modification in the constitution, or standards, or canons of the Established Church he hopes to be able to filch and pilfer here a member and there a member from the Seceding Churches in order to strengthen the Established Church. My hon. Friend who lends himself to that process knows but little of his countrymen. The honest men in the Established Church are just as much opposed to such a process as anyone else. Those honest members of the Established Church wish to see their Church strong; but sooner than that object should be accomplished by a process so unfair and insulting to their neighbours—their rivals, if you like—in the other Presbyterian Churches, whose conscientious convictions have driven them into secession, they would say, “Perish our endowments and perish our State privileges!” Is the House of Commons going to assist such a process as that proposed by the hon. Member? How can a United Presbyterian, if his connection with his Church be anything more than a name, abandon his principles, although he may benefit his pocket by joining the State Church? How can a Free Churchman, glorying in the traditions of his Church, and treasuring as his most precious heritage the history of his Church’s birth, consent to go back to the Establishment unless on the condition not only that he secures all for which his forefathers fought, but also the fullest recognition and atonement for their great sacrifices? The House of Commons has a peculiar responsibility in this matter, because it was Parliament that I will not say caused, but precipitated, the disruption of 1843. Is Parliament now to countenance an attempt to weaken and beggar this Church which for fifty years has nobly done its work? Let, indeed, the differences between the Churches in Scotland cease, and let the old sores be healed by union. On that we are all agreed. But the only path to union is by admitting to the non-Established Churches the full justification of their present position; by withholding from all Churches—whether for the purpose of support or of direction and control—the hand of the State; and the Scotch Presbyterian people will do the rest, without the aid of Parliament and especially without the aid of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay). My position is that the union he talks of can only be accomplished by Disestablishment, and I will quote in support of that position authorities that should have some weight with my hon. and learned Friend. The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)—who I am sorry to see is not present—was for a brief and uncertain period a Representative of a Scotch constituency, and in addressing his constituents on one occasion he used these words: “I would wish to recall the fact that I was an ardent supporter of the Disestablishment of the Church in Ireland.” It is difficult nowadays for us to conceive the right hon. Gentleman an ardent supporter of any reform—

“I can see,” he says, “in the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland one great result, which would be entirely absent in the case of the Disestablishment of the Church of England, and that is the union of all the Presbyterian bodies. I am treading upon delicate ground, but I think that the fact that the Established Church is tied to the State was the one great obstacle to the union of the Presbyterians in Scotland.”

But I have a still higher authority, whom one naturally approaches with awe. The Duke of Argyll made a statement on this subject in 1874.

MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): Quote what he said in 1891 or 1892.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I will quote what he said in 1892 presently, which is better than 1891. In 1874 the Duke of Argyll held a certain opinion which I will now quote. It may be said that that is a long time ago. Well, that is a consideration which might have some effect in the case of anybody else than the Duke of Argyll; but he never changes his opinions, because he is never wrong. What he said in 1874 was this:—

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

“There is no hope whatever of the re-union of the Free and Established Churches, except on the ground of Disestablishment.”

That is a plain statement from the mouth of a man who knows as much of the ins and outs of this question as anyone living. Well, now I come to what he said in 1892. In January of this year there was a meeting in Edinburgh of a strange body, called the Laymen's League, which exists with the object of uniting all the scattered flocks under the banner of the Establishment. The Duke of Argyll was brought to Edinburgh as the great orator on that occasion; and, since the days of Balaam, nothing more remarkable has happened, because he devoted the whole of his address to proving that all the outside seceding bodies were in a very poor way, and that the best of all possible Churches was the Church of Scotland—of course, because it was the Church of the Duke of Argyll. Not a very diplomatic way to bring about a solution of this question. He said, giving them small comfort—

“My advice is against going to Parliament at all. What can we get better than that on which we have stood for nearly 200 years.”

The Scotsman newspaper, which advocates generally the policy of the hon. Member for Inverness, was greatly disappointed with what the Duke said. It hoped the public would not be so ungrateful as to wish that he had buried his views in the quiet crypt of some Church magazine. It summed up the Duke of Argyll's speech as maintaining that the Church of Scotland is the one Church in Christendom which is built on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, and that its General Assembly is the one legitimate descendant and representative of the Council of Jerusalem. And it argued that, if it were an error to suppose that equal virtue was to be found in other Churches, the Laymen's League was nothing better than a Church Defence Association. Well, Sir, I pass from this point, because what I have quoted shows that eminent men among those who have no sympathy with the policy of my hon. Friend and Member for the College Division and myself share our opinion that the only way to effect a union is by Disestablishment.

It is my hon. Friend for the College Division, and not the Laymen's League, that is the true peace-maker in Scotland. My firm belief is that my countrymen are not so concerned, as they are sometimes thought to be, in nice theological distinctions and in the contests of Church Courts. They are tired and contemptuous of the dark intrigues of political ecclesiastics, such as those which the obscure Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend represents. The proposal of my hon. Friend for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) is perfectly straightforward and unmistakable in its design, and I believe, Sir, that the quiet and steady-minded men of all the Churches, Established or otherwise, have realised more and more every year that while Disestablishment is the only path that leads to union, it will bring no injustice to those concerned, and that it will vastly increase the power for good of that general Presbyterian Church, in which are involved indissolubly the sympathies and traditions of the great mass of the Scotch people.

(11.38.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has not left me—I do not complain of it—any lengthened period of time in which to discuss the important questions now before us; but he has, at all events, left me sufficient opportunity to declare in explicit and clear language what is the opinion of the Government upon the Motion and Amendment before the House. One or two of the statements of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down I have listened to with extreme surprise. He occupied no inconsiderable part of his interesting speech with an elaborate attempt to prove not only that the opinion of the Scotch people has not yet been definitely taken on this question of Disestablishment, but also, under no conceivable circumstances, could that opinion be taken under our existing Parliamentary institutions.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : In the sense referred to by my hon. Friend.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The right hon. Gentleman attempted to establish the proposition that it was impossible to have a Dissolution, the result of which would clearly show whether or not the people of Scotland definitely desire the Disestablishment of their Church.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : On the contrary, I am ready to accept the result of a Dissolution—quite ready as soon as the Government will give it us—asa verdict on the point; but what I said was the question could not be segregated from all other questions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : In other words, the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly ready to accept the result of a General Election as conclusive on this point, while holding the opinion that it would show nothing of the general opinion of the country. He says he will accept the verdict, though it would not be given upon the question of the Disestablishment of the Church alone, but associated with the question of Home Rule, with the Temperance question, and with each and all of the items in the Newcastle programme. Upon that I have two observations to make, and the first is that it is not consistent with the view put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian in 1879. His object at that time was to persuade the people of Scotland to vote for him upon the Eastern question and other important questions then before the country, and he would not allow the red herring of Disestablishment to be drawn across the track. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“ Even in the case of the Irish Church, which was far weaker than the Scotch Church, even in that case the question was raised in Parliament and there was a dissolution expressly upon the question. The verdict of the country was given after full consideration, and that is what the Established Church of Scotland fairly and justly asks.”

So that whatever may be the view of the right hon. Gentleman at the present time, he in 1879 did not share the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), but on the contrary thought it was not only possible to get the verdict of the people of Scotland on the question of Disestablishment, but it was right to have that verdict definitely taken. That is the first observation I have to make, and the second is not less applicable to Scotchmen, who, over and over again, have had it thrown in their teeth when they have stood by the Established Church of Scotland, that the majority of the Scottish Representatives in the House have voted in favour of Disestablishment. Well, but in the view of the right hon. Gentleman what is the value of that verdict? Does it show that the people are in favour of Disestablishment? Not at all. On the right hon. Gentleman's own principle, what security have we that the hon. Member for Glasgow who moved this Resolution to-night, the hon. Member for the Border Burghs who seconded him, or others who supported him, were not elected by the constituents who sent them to this House to vote for Home Rule, or on the Temperance question, or any of the various points in the Newcastle programme? What possible grounds are there for believing that these hon. Gentlemen represent the opinion of the Scotch people, or even of their own constituents, on the great question which is now before us? I think the right hon. Gentleman in his few observations on this point has shown himself opposed to the contention of his Leader in 1879, and also at a later date, that the verdict of the Scotch people could not be derived solely from the voices of the Scotch Representatives. I do not propose to go at any length, nor would time allow me to do so, into the elaborate and important questions raised by the right hon. Gentleman. He has dilated on the advantage of re-uniting the various Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, and upon that everybody agrees with him, and it is the subject matter of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Finlay). But the right hon. Gentleman has told us that it would be degrading and insulting, or, at all events, contrary to the conscientious convictions of members of the non-Established Churches of Scotland, to enter into any arrangement of the kind contemplated in the Amendment. But upon what historic basis does the right hon. Gentleman found that assertion? He appears to be of opinion that it is a cardinal point with the United Presbyterian Church and the Free Church, and that it is an insult to ask them to deviate from it, not to unite with an Established Church. He assumes that it is the specific and peculiar creed of these Churches, that the ecclesiastical organisation which they follow should not be connected with the State. On what historic basis does he found the assertion? It is in absolute contradiction to the most notorious facts of history. It is perfectly true, I believe, that the great majority—not all—of the United Presbyterians do not approve of any relations—of any specific relations—between the Church and State; but it is no part of their original creed, no part of their existing organisation, no pledge to that effect is given by the minister or required from a United Presbyterian layman. I believe I am not going beyond historic fact and am warranted in saying that the original founders of the United Presbyterian Church did not express the view entertained by the right hon. Gentleman; but held precisely opposite convictions. If that be true of the United Presbyterians, it is certainly and emphatically true of the Free Church. The men who seceded from the Establishment and founded the Free Church were as convinced as we who intend to vote against the Resolution to-night are, that the ancient historic connection between Church and State in Scotland should be maintained, and to this day I believe the majority of the men who call themselves the Free Church are as firmly convinced in favour of the principle as their forefathers were when they seceded. I heard one argument of the right hon. Gentleman with astonishment. He told us that we, the Parliament of this country, were at all events partly responsible for the secession from the Established Church in 1843.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I said precipitated it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Responsible for precipitating the secession of 1843, that is the allegation. I believe the right hon. Gentleman said this Parliament, thus responsible, ought to be most careful before it weakens, or attempts to weaken, the Free Church of which Parliament is in part the author. What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by that argument? I boldly assert, and I do not think that anybody will contradict me who knows the ecclesiastical history of Scotland, that if the spirit of the Established Church, and the laws governing that Church in 1843, had been then what they are at this moment, not a minister or a layman would then have seceded from that Church. In seeking to unite the Free Church with the Established Church on the basis proposed, we are asking that from the members of the Free Church which their forefathers would readily have done. I utterly fail to understand, therefore, what this particular argument of the right hon. Gentleman means. When he went on to say that the consciences of Scotchmen required equality of treatment, and what is called by the Liberation Society religious equality as between different ecclesiastical bodies, he used a terminology which, however appropriate it may be to English controversies on the subject, is wholly alien to a discussion upon Scotch matters, for the Scottish people have never desired what the right hon. Gentleman calls religious equality; they have never wished to see the funds devoted from ancient times to the maintenance of the Presbyterian form of religion diverted to other purposes. Whether they belong to the Established Church or not, they have never wished for that kind of religious equality which figures so largely in Liberation Society speeches and pamphlets. I ask the House to reject this Motion on a very plain and simple issue. Here we have funds devoted from time immemorial to this purpose—not public contributions in the sense of contributions from taxation; but funds derived from private beneficence principally, devoted from time immemorial to this public purpose under sanction of Statutes. I ask the House to reject the Motion because there is no purpose suggested to which these funds could be more usefully devoted or more in consonance with the wishes of the people of Scotland. It is true the right hon. Gentleman vaguely adumbrated some public purposes to which the money might be devoted—baths and wash-houses, I think he mentioned, but he did not tell us plainly what it was he had in mind—some obscure and remote purpose in which he thought these funds might be more usefully employed than in supporting the religion in which the people of Scotland as a whole believe and the form of worship they desire to follow. I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. I think the purpose to which these funds have been appropriated is the highest purpose for which any funds can be used. They are used for purposes certainly in consonance with the religious convictions of the people of Scotland, and this House would be ill-advised under any circumstances in diverting these funds to other uses, and would be guilty of a crime if it attempted any such diversion without a special mandate from the people of Scotland. I hope the House will assent to the Amendment, which certainly we on this Bench shall not hesitate to support.

Question put.

(11.59.) The House divided:—Ayes 209; Noes 265.—(Div. List, No. 140.)

DR. CAMERON rose—

It being after midnight, Mr. SPEAKER proceeded to interrupt the business, Whereupon Mr. FINLAY rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(12.10.) The House divided:—Ayes 294; Noes 142.—(Div. List, No. 141.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put accordingly, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved—

"That it is not desirable in itself, nor consonant with the wishes of the people of Scotland, that the Church of Scotland should be disestablished and its endowments diverted to secular uses; and that, in the opinion of this House, it is highly desirable that the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland should be reunited upon a National basis, and that the endowments should continue to be appropriated to religious purposes."

MOTIONS.

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

Ordered—

That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire and report as to the cost and method of the publication of the Debates and Proceedings in Parliament.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman proceeds to the nomination of the Members to serve on this Committee will he say upon what basis the selection has been made?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): The usual course has been followed after due consultation with Members on either side to secure a Committee of a representative character.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I object.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Perhaps the hon. Member would be satisfied if two directors of the Freeman's Journal were added to the Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: Objection being taken, the nomination stands over.

POST OFFICE ACT (1891) EXTENSION BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill—

"To amend the Post Office Act, 1891, in relation to its application to Scotland, and to apply that Act to the Isle of Man and to the Channel Islands."

I may explain that this is precisely the same Bill as that brought in yesterday; there is simply an alteration in the long title.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Post Office Act, 1891, in relation to its application to Scotland, and to apply that Act to the Isle of Man and to the Channel Islands."—(Sir James Fergusson.)

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): It is a somewhat remarkable thing that yesterday a Bill was introduced to correct a mistake in last year's Bill, and now there is a Bill to repair a mistake in yesterday's Bill. When shall we have an end of these corrections?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: The present Motion is rendered necessary on technical grounds. The long title omitted to mention the application of the Bill to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. It was an oversight, but it is not worth a controversy. According to the forms of the House the title of the Bill must correspond with the provisions of the Bill.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: As a point of order, should not the Bill brought in yesterday be withdrawn before this Bill is introduced?

MR. SPEAKER: No, that is not necessary. In due course the substitution will be made.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: I must say it is somewhat remarkable that should have these two Bills introduced on successive days, and I think we should have some information as to what the Bill contains.

DR. TANNER: I object.

Motion deferred.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 4) BILL.

On Motion of Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under "The General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861," relating to Carlway and Kinsale, ordered to be brought in by Sir M. Hicks Beach and Sir J. Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 368.]

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS
(NO. 5) BILL.

PUBLIC ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ritchie, Bill to provide for the valuation of Public Elementary Schools for the purposes of rates and for the use of such schools for meetings, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ritchie, Sir William Hart Dyke and Mr. Long.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 371.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GALWAY INFIRMARY BILL.—(No. 350.)
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Order be discharged."—
(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY : I do not object to the Motion that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, but I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the propriety of an Instruction to the Committee, empowering the Committee to give the Bill a general application to all the Infirmaries in Ireland.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : That is hardly a practicable course. The clauses of the Bill are drafted to meet the particular case of Galway ; and even if it were desirable, I do not see how the Bill could be made applicable to all the Infirmaries in Ireland.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) : The great advantage of the Bill will be to the Borough of Galway, though the County will to some extent share in the benefit.

VOL. IV.      [FOURTH SERIES.]

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) : Speaking from some experience of Infirmaries, I must say I should like to see the reform generally extended, yet on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread, I do not think we ought to stand in the way of Galway getting the benefit, which may hereafter be extended to other Infirmaries.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY : When will the Committee be struck ?

MR. JACKSON : At once.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY : I hope in the appointment reasonable care will be taken to secure the representation of all sections of Irish Representatives.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged.

Bill committed to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House and Two by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all petitions against the Bill presented three clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Mr. Jackson.)

ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord ARTHUR HILL, Down, W.) reported Her Majesty's answer to the humble Address of the 10th May last, as followeth :—

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I have received your Address praying that an Amendment may be made to the Code of Regulations by the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council on Education 1892, in page 39, column 5.

I will take the first convenient opportunity of complying with your advice.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELECTORS' QUALIFICATION AND REGISTRATION BILL.—(No. 38.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.27.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I desire to set out by expressing the opinion that during the Debate no hon. Member will question the accuracy of my statement that our system of registration is in need—I may say in urgent need—of amendment, simplification, and reform. The defects of the present system are generally acknowledged, though I do not know that they are distinctly or in detail understood. It is a complex system, a system which is costly in point of money and time, and in putting the voter on the register it is uncertain and dilatory, and far too dependent, so far as the right to vote is concerned, on paid and party organisations. Its unfitness has increased, or we have become more conscious of its defects since the introduction of household suffrage, for the difficulty is the greater with the great masses of the people to whom the franchise has been entrusted, as they have neither the information nor can they afford to lose time from earning their living for the purpose of making their claim to be put upon the register, or to defend that claim when party objections are raised against it. The demand for reform has largely increased of recent years, and the demand comes from either side of the House. With tolerable accuracy I think I have ascertained the defects of the present system, and I trust I shall convince the House that by the Bill I have provided a remedy for these defects, or for largely reducing them, after having given very careful study to the subject. The difficulties of the system of registration arose, in the first place, from the fact that it was framed when the franchise was far more restricted than, in these days of household suffrage, it is. Not unnaturally the main object in the minds of the framers of the system which has now become out of date was to put to the test of judicial investigation the claim to be on the register. Claimants are put to trouble and risk in getting their names on the register, and objections are almost encouraged. It is almost like going back to the time when I knew a little of law; when parties were supposed to fight out their pleadings and reduce them to an issue before appearing in a Court of Law. That old method of pleading was extremely troublesome and expensive, and the same remark applies to the case of registration. The man who makes his claim has the whole expense put upon him; he has to prove his claim and fight for his vote, and this he cannot do without having recourse to party organisation; and, as it used to be said, the battle of parties is fought in the Registration Courts. This should not be the system. The battle of Parties should not be fought over registration; the work of putting men on the register should be done by officers appointed to see that it is done. Our main object in improving the system of registration ought not to be so much the accurate testing of disputable claims as of placing on the register the name of every man who is entitled to the exercise of a vote. Such, broadly speaking, is the object of this Bill. I make the admission that I do not think it is possible to propose an efficient amendment of the registration system without to some extent dealing with the franchise itself. I did not address myself to the question with any pre-conceived intention of dealing at all with the franchise itself, and I have only dealt with it, so far as I have thought it necessary to do so, to procure the simplification of the system of registration. There are other Bills before the House. I do not know that they have been withdrawn—but other Bills have been introduced of a far more radical nature, reducing all the various franchises to the simple qualification of residence. Some of these measures propose a continuous registration—that is to say, that in every area there shall be a competent and reliable official appointed to keep and correct the register, putting on it the names of persons as they become qualified by length of occupation, and thus abolishing the Courts of Revising Barristers. I do not deny the merit of simplicity to these measures; and for myself I do not object to simplification, but we cannot afford to wait, and ought not to wait, for the amendment of our system of registration until we can introduce a considerable franchise reconstruction scheme. The leading feature of the present Bill, before all others, is the reduction of the period of qualification. At present the freeholder must be in possession for six months before 15th July to complete his qualification, and in all cases of occupation a tenancy of twelve months before 15th July is required. One day less possession or occupation involves the loss of a year before the claim can be made good, and as the register does not come into force until 1st January, a man who happens to commence occupation on 16th July may find himself delayed practically for two and a-half years before he can exercise the vote for which occupation qualifies him. No one can defend this monstrous state of the law, which especially affects our working class populations in large towns since the introduction of household suffrage. The fourth clause of the Bill meets this serious objection. The qualifying period is reduced to three months, and ends with 24th June. The change in date has been adopted for two reasons—in the first place, it becomes possible to complete the Parliamentary register by 1st November instead of 1st January—a gain of two months; and, in the second place, the qualifying period will begin with Lady Day, the day when the new overseers come into office. The first duty of the overseer is to construct a new rate book, and so he becomes conscious of the facts recorded in the rate book of occupations commencing, and it is easy for him to construct the overseers' list of voters as time goes on. 24th June is a better day than 15th July also, because it is one of the ordinary quarter days when tenancies commence and close, and obviously this is a convenient time to conclude the qualification period. There are other conditions of the franchise dealt with in Clause 3 by which the present requirement for the payment of certain rates and taxes is repealed. Anyone who has practical acquaintance with the working of our registration law will admit the great simplification of the register this clause would bring about. It would improve the register and remove the cause of many merely technical objections. Inasmuch as it touches the franchise, and I have said that I do not touch the franchise, except so far as it is necessary for the purposes of this Registration Bill, the change requires some justification. Under the present law the rates must be paid which are due to the 5th of the preceding January, but this date is under the Bill no longer within the period of qualification. It may be that the occupier occupied other premises before Lady Day, but it is not in respect to those premises that the claim is made. There is then no reason for retaining the date of 5th January. There is another reason in support of the clause. Take the case of a compound householder or a service franchise voter. It is in the power of the landlord or employer to disfranchise such voters by neglecting to pay the rates unless a tenant takes the trouble to ascertain if his rates have been paid, and if not to make the payment himself. In the case of the service franchise I do not know that it is possible for the voter to guard himself in that way, for I do not think it is possible for him to separate the particular portion of the rates due in respect to his cottage from the rates paid by the landlord on the estate. It is evident these are conditions under the present state of things which are a fruitful source of objection and disfranchisement. I may mention that lodgers who pay no rates are exempt from these difficulties, and why should the £10 occupier be subjected to them more than the lodger? My clause proposes the repeal of this qualification as well as the payment of assessed taxes on houses of £20 value, and I do not think the House will consider it is worth while to retain these difficulties in the way of a simplification of the register. Really it is a revival. It found a place in Lord John Russell's Bill of, I think, 1854. I go on now to the other proposals, one of which is aimed at the fact that successive occupation does not give a man a vote as freely as, in my opinion, it ought to do. A person removing from qualifying premises of one description to qualifying premises of another in the same area, as, for instance, from lodgings to a house or from a house to lodgings, loses the vote. If he moves from one place to another, from one set of premises which he has occupied, without hiatus, to another, each of them qualifying places, the two together do not qualify because of the time limit. That, to my mind, approaches as near as possible to legislative nonsense as anything I have read for a long time. Not only that, but when you come to successive occupation it very often happens that a man who is properly qualified loses his vote because of a slight and formal inaccuracy in his description of his successive occupations. Under the present law a revising barrister has no power whatever to remedy this. He cannot correct an inaccuracy even if it is clear that the man is entitled to his vote. One of the proposals of the present Bill is that the revising barrister shall be able, and it shall be his duty, to correct any entry of the kind, provided he is satisfied of the right of the man to be on the register. The eighth clause localises all cases of successive occupation of qualifying premises in the same electoral area, and the ninth clause does the same thing in different electoral areas, giving a man a vote in respect of his occupation; and it is in relation to this clause that Clause 21

gives the power of which I have spoken to the revising barrister. Then there is a point with regard to lodgers. At present a lodger has always to claim. The facts of ownership and lodgership, if I may coin a word for this occasion to express my meaning, are not known to the overseer; and the lodger, as I have said, always has to claim. It has always seemed to me and those with whom I am accustomed to consult that the overseers might, when making their inquiries on the subject of occupation, ascertain whether the lodgers on the register still possess the same qualification; and if they do, the overseers should put them on the list without the necessity of a second claim. I think this is a practical improvement to which there can be no possible objection, and it would not add considerably to the work of the persons who are now responsible for the lists. I say that the true groundwork in the matter of improvement of the registration is to secure that the lists should not be inaccurate, as they are now, and we should not leave people who are qualified to have votes to fight out the inaccuracies in the list at their own risk and their own expense before the Judicial Court of the Revising Barrister. What we need is provisions which will insure greater accuracy in the original lists than we have now; and on this subject I may say—and I know the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir E. Clarke) is well acquainted with the fact—that in Scotland they have an infinitely superior system of making up these lists than we have in this country. I hear no complaint of the system of the preparation of the Valuation Lists in Scotland. They are accurately made, and objections and claims are very rare, because of the accuracy of the original lists. In consequence of the consciousness we have of the superiority of the Scotch system, it has been proposed that the overseers should be disestablished, and that in every electoral area there should be a competent and reliable officer who should do this work. But I would point out to the House that there is just the same reason for retaining the overseers as there is for retaining the valuation officers. They both have in their hands the same information—the Valuation Lists in Scotland and the Rate Book in England—and it seems to me that the analogy of Scotland does not go to suggest the abolition of the overseers, but it goes to suggest the appointment of registration superintendents in every electoral area, who shall utilise and command the services of the overseers and see that they do their work properly. I think that is far more in accordance with the Scotch system than creating new officers at great expense. There is no doubt that the overseers, particularly in the small rural districts, are not educated men, and are not competent for this particular work. The superiority of the Scotch system is that the valuation officer is competent. He is a better-class official and operates over a larger area. So I would say to my friends who are in favour of disestablishing the overseer that it would be a much easier and wiser course to put the overseers in training, give them the necessary assistance, and put them under supervision, and that is what in this Bill I have endeavoured to do. By the tenth clause registration superintendents are to be appointed by the County Councils and the County Borough Councils for every electoral area. By the 11th clause the overseers are bound to obey the directions of the registration superintendents. The 12th clause sets forth that in parishes where the population is over five hundred, and where there is no Vestry Clerk or competent official to make out the lists, the overseers or the Vestry should appoint paid assistants. The 13th clause provides that in smaller parishes the overseers shall be entitled to assistance, the remuneration to be fixed by the revising barrister. The 14th clause enacts that the registration superintendents shall draw the attention of the revising barrister to any neglect of the overseers with a view to a fine, and shall also call the attention of the revising barrister to any necessary alteration in the list. These are proposals with the object of simplifying the machinery of registration, and I venture to recommend them to the House. They do not upset the whole of the present system, and they accept the overseers, giving them sufficient extra assistance wherever it is required, and placing them under the supreme direction of a competent registration superintendent in every electoral area. This is not my own measure entirely. I have had the assistance of gentlemen whose names would be sufficient authority, and I will mention the name of my late lamented friend Sir John Lambert, whose intimate acquaintance I enjoyed, and whose assistance I had in the construction of this Bill. I hope I have laid the proposals of the Bill before the House without unnecessary verbiage, because this is a practical question which ought to be practically considered. I will sum up once more the main features of the Bill. It abolishes the vexatious rate and assessed taxpaying clause. It reduces the qualifying periods from six months and twelve months to three months, ending on but not including the 25th June instead of the 15th July, for reasons I have already given. It enables persons to come on the register who have occupied qualifying premises of the same or different descriptions in the same or different electoral areas during the qualifying period. It enables a revising barrister to alter a claim when there is a proper qualification, and thus get rid of numerous technical objections. It provides for registration superintendents in every county or county borough, and enables the overseers to obtain registration assistance, when it is required, and arranges for the remuneration of assistants to the overseers in small parishes. I beg, Sir, to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

*(1.6.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): It may be admitted by everyone in this House that the Registration Law is not in a satisfactory condition, and may be beneficially simplified, but the Bill as it stands goes much further than dealing with the machinery of registration, and would require to be greatly modified in Committee if read a second time. The Bill seems to have been drafted with care, and appears to be aimed mainly at simplifying the present system of registration. Looking at the Bill in that sense, I think we should be justified in reading it a second time, and leaving the details to be settled in Committee. It is true that the Bill raises the important question of the qualifying period of occupation, and I am one of those who think that the present period of occupation is not too long. It has always been the constitutional doctrine in this country that the right to vote is not merely a personal matter, but a right to take part in the representation of the particular locality with which the voter is connected. It is obvious, therefore, that if the qualification of residence is reduced, there will be a danger of leaving the representation of a locality not in the hands of the permanent, but of the temporary residents. I have known several constituencies where a temporary influx of residents has occurred, and those people may come on the register even under the existing law. And thus in some cases, where the parties are very evenly divided, and the majority one way or the other is very narrow, it may happen even now that the permanent voice of a constituency is overborne by this influx of voters, who are only there carrying out some work for a year or two, and then leave the neighbourhood never to return. What, I ask, would happen if everyone of these men were allowed to go on the register after two or three months' residence? I do not approve of that part of the Bill which proposes to shorten the period of occupation. But if that be left alone, whether it is possible to simplify the machinery for bringing a voter qualified by residence into possession of his vote is another matter, and one which I think might be discussed in Committee on this Bill. With regard to the appointment of superintendent, my experience is not sufficient to enable me to speak confidently as to its probable results. But it is easy to see that there would be some difficulty where a portion of the Parliamentary area is not within a municipal boundary. I do not know what position the Town Clerk would occupy in such a case, as he is to be superintendent in the borough. Difficulty might also arise in the case of a municipality forming part of a County Division.

Therefore the machinery for dealing with that point would require some careful consideration in Committee. I would say, therefore, that if the House assents to the Second Reading of the Bill to-day, it ought to be clearly understood that all the provisions of the Bill are to be treated as matters of detail to be settled in Committee, and that the principle of simplifying the machinery of registration is the only proposition affirmed.

*(1.12.) MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I cannot arrive at the same conclusion as my hon. Friend (Mr. Tomlinson) with regard to the action which should be taken by the House in this matter. I am perfectly well aware that in reading the Bill a second time the House practically commits itself to nothing in regard to the registration of the country at the present time. Everybody is well aware that even if the Bill is carried through the Second Reading to-day it has no earthly chance of receiving the Royal Assent this Session, and therefore many hon. Members are doubtless more agreeably occupied than in taking part in the Debate this afternoon. I took the opportunity of coming down to record my vote against what I think would be an undesirable alteration of the law. I move, Sir, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. The Bill is a Reform Bill materially affecting the representation of the people, and this is almost the first occasion on which a Bill dealing with the electoral franchise has been urged on the House except on the responsibility of a Minister of the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman will agree that though measures affecting certain infinitesimal provisions regarding the representation of the people have been passed, no Bill so comprehensive as this has been seriously considered by the House of Commons except on the responsibility of a Minister of the Crown, and that is one ground on which I ask the House to support my Amendment. The Bill is framed ostensibly on somewhat modest lines, and the right hon. Gentleman in his explanation carried out the principle of moderation; but what are the objects of the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman calmly proposes to repeal a provision which has always been attached to the occupation franchise in this country—that a person should be rated and pay the rates levied in respect of the qualifying premises. The right hon. Gentleman wipes out that very material safeguard, and proposes to entitle every person to vote, however great his default may be in regard to the local burdens, the faithful discharge of which has been insisted on by Parliament as an essential element of the occupation qualification. That is a strong order to begin with. The right hon. Gentleman goes on to alter the period of residential qualification. I am not prepared to say that some improvements might not be made in the existing arrangements, but I hope the House will not accept the invitation to make the change now suggested. The principle on which the representation of this country has been always hitherto based is known as the local principle. Many other principles have been recommended to the House. Mr. John Stuart Mill recommended Mr. Hare's principle, which was based upon personal representation. By it the individual elector, wherever he might reside, was to be personally represented, in an elaborate manner, as such, without any regard to the locality where he might reside. There is much to be said in favour of that principle, but this Bill proposes to retain the existing local principle and to engraft upon it the personal principle. Under this hybrid system persons might be brought from all parts of the country, and thus swamp the opinion of the locality with which they had only a temporary connection. So long as our system of representation continues to be local we ought to have some efficient guarantee that the persons on the register are bona fide connected with the locality, and are not temporary sojourners in the district. I also object to the provision dealing with successive occupation. That has always been understood in a strictly local sense, and is limited to the same constituency by the existing Act. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to enable a person who may be occupying premises in Cornwall to claim for premises in, say, Northumberland after a short occupation; or, in fact, practically without any occupation at all. That is a novel proposition which the House will do well to be guarded in accepting. The right hon. Gentleman has dealt very loosely with the question of rating. He seems to think that failure to meet the honourable requirements involved in the Local Government of this country should not be insisted on as a necessary qualification for a vote. I differ with him entirely on that point. There is one grave anomaly which the right hon. Gentleman has not dealt with in his Bill, but which, if he undertook to deal at all with these questions, he might well have taken cognisance of—that is, the existing system under which rates are compounded for by the owners of tenements, who thereby obtain some slight modification of their local burdens, which I do not think is to the interest either of the State or the locality. Notwithstanding the fact that the owner compounds the rates, the persons occupying the premises are entitled to vote as if they paid the rates. It consequently very frequently appears that the so-called ratepayer is a person whose only connection with the rates is that he has never paid any in his life. It is no wonder that the rates go up by leaps and bounds. The so-called ratepayers who vote for the candidates have no interest in keeping them down. I may be told that in the long run the occupier pays the bill. Nineteen ratepayers, however, out of every twenty know perfectly well that to whatever extent their zeal may carry them in the way of additional burdens, thereby raising money in which they may in many instances be able to participate, in the guise of labourers or tradesmen or otherwise, that these additions to the local rates are a very long time in finding their way, if they ever do find their way, in the shape of added rent back into the pockets of the owners of property. Therefore, I should have hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would have inserted a provision in this ambitious Reform Bill of his for dealing with what, undoubtedly, is a very great anomaly in our present system. But I trust before the right hon. Gentleman comes again before Parliament with a Reform Bill he will give his serious attention to the suggestions which I have ventured to make. The ratepayer, in my judgment, ought to pay his own rates. I do not wish to detain the House at any length; but I felt it my duty to draw attention to what undoubtedly are very grave defects in the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. Without going into any further detail, I would really ask the House whether this is a Bill which we are justified in passing in a platonic manner—a measure which there is no single person who has any knowledge of the House of Commons who is not perfectly aware can never be carried practically into legislative effect during the present Session of Parliament. It may be asked why, under these circumstances, go to the trouble of opposing this Bill? Why not allow this stage to pass, and put down what is commonly called a "block-notice," and so ensure that we shall never hear any more of a scheme which, I am bound to say, has been largely treated, I will not say with levity, but with an absence of interest, as is evidenced by the state of the Benches on both sides of the House? My reason is this, that I think that Parliament is abdicating its duty when either of the two Houses composing the Imperial Parliament gives the smallest assent or endorsement to principles of which a large section, and as I hope a majority, of Members decidedly disapprove. Therefore, I should hope that the House will consider this measure on what I consider its demerits, and that it will discourage the introduction of amateur reform. I use that term in no disrespectful sense towards the right hon. Gentleman, who to my own knowledge has been more practically associated with legislation bearing upon questions of this nature than perhaps any other Member of this House. He has had experience as a responsible Minister. Should he occupy that position again he will be entitled to approach the subject with the prestige of having had practical knowledge and Parliamentary experience; but occupying the irresponsible position which he and I both occupy at the present time I am justified in describing this as amateur legislation, as endeavouring to obtain the assent of Parliament to a principle which it is not seriously intended to carry into effect, and to commit Parliament, at the instance of a private Member, to a principle which I trust under these circumstances will never be assented to—namely, a tinkering of the Registration Laws in support of wire-pulling party interests, with the view, according to many people, of gaining supposed party advantages, though I am not myself prepared to say whether one or the other party would be affected in a party sense by the provisions of this Bill. I hope the House will support me in moving, as I now do, that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

(1.35.) MAJOR GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): Mr. Speaker—

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. and gallant Member second the Motion?

MAJOR GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY: I do. My reason for intervening in this Debate is that I entirely disapprove of this Bill; and I will give my reasons for disapproving of it. When we had our last registration in the borough which I represent, I found, through the registration agent, than an enormous number of bogus claims were put forward; so much so that the revising barrister sent these claims to the Public Prosecutor with a view to have some steps taken in the matter. What does this Bill propose? It proposes a three months' residence as sufficient. How can a personating agent do anything at an election when men only reside three months in a locality? There have been an immense number of men struck off the register in my locality, and if it had not been for the very able and very capable registration agent these men would have been upon the register, and had there been a General Election, possibly voters would have been found who would have adopted those names. I do not accuse any right hon. or hon. Gentlemen whose names are on this Bill of having any cognisance of that, or that they would themselves lend themselves to such a thing. On the contrary, there are Liberals in my own constituency who repudiate what was done. If these tactics have been employed where there is a large majority, as there was in my constituency, of about one thousand six hundred, what about those constituencies where there is only a majority of one or two hundred? I consider that in the Metropolis, at all events, it is necessary that the period of residence should be more than three months; and I am not putting the matter now from a party point of view, or from any particular point of view. I give my strenuous opposition to this Bill. I am fully aware, however, that the Registration Laws want alteration, but I think myself that they should be altered in a different direction from what is proposed here, and that this Bill would not be for the good of this country if it took effect. I have great pleasure in seconding the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." — (Mr. James Lowther.)

*(140.) Mr. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major General Goldsworthy) said he would tell us the reason why he objected to this Bill. I listened to hear what his reason was. The reason the hon. and gallant Gentleman put forward was that some time recently within his constituency certain people, improperly professing to be voters, who had claimed to have their names entered upon the register, were found out, and their claims were rejected. In the first place that shows, if it shows anything at all, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman either must live in a very lax constituency, or else that due care had not been taken by the proper person concerned in that behalf to see that those persons did not go on the register. The hon. and gallant Gentleman could not have read this Bill, because if he had he would have found that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the measure has specially put in a clause which will impose upon the overseers the duty of seeing that the lists are protected from improper claims of a character such as the hon. and gallant Gentleman referred to. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet based his objection to this Bill on the fact that it was a Reform Bill; and although he got away from that objection, and proceeded to consider some details, he kept reverting to it. Afterwards he called it an "amateur Reform Bill," and later on he called it a "tinkering Reform Bill" but discarding the epithets, it is none the worse for being a Reform Bill, and it is because it is a Reform Bill that we on this side of the House support it. Therefore the point is not whether it is a Reform Bill or not, but whether there is real substance in the objections which the right hon. Gentleman put forward, and put forward with clearness and fairness, to the measure before the House. The right hon. Gentleman stated that his first objection was that, by a sweeping provision in this Bill, the necessity for the personal payment of rates, so far as it is a qualification for a voter would be entirely swept away. Let us see if that be a just measure of reform or not. What was the reason for requiring personal payment of rates? Was it to ensure the collection of the rates; was it that the payment of rates was evidence of good citizenship? Or, rather, was it not this that in 1832, when Parliament was passing the Reform Bill of that year and was casting about how to find the best evidence of who was a household rated at £10 a year, the fact that a man had not only been rated at £10 a year but paid the rates at £10 a year, was taken as evidence, and the best evidence to hand, of proving that he was a £1 ratepaying householder? I submit that that was the real reason why this provision for the payment of rates was introduced into the law. I may remind the House that when the Reform Bill was before Parliament some Amendment having been moved in connection with this matter, Lord John Russell, who was in charge of the Bill in this House on the 3rd of February, 1832, as may be seen from Hansard, used these words—

"The Amendment could not be accepted because it was not in accordance with the object of the Bill, which was not to encourage the payment of rates, but to enable £10 householders to enjoy the right of voting for a Member of Parliament."

But we have advanced long stride since then. We have done away with the £10 occupation franchise—we have got household suffrage; and it is no longer necessary to find out whether a man is rated at £10 and pays rates at £10, or whether he is rated at £6 and pays rates on that valuation. Therefore I say that the time has come now for sweeping away such requirements as that.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: There is a provision for personal payment in the Reform Bill of 1867.

*MR. SHIRESS WILL: I was going to deal with 1867 later on; but as the right hon. Gentleman has referred to it, I will deal with it now. I suppose what the right hon. Gentleman alludes to is this. In 1867 there was a Reform Bill before Parliament. At that time a practice prevailed whereby the owners compounded with the overseers and paid the rates for their tenants, and in consideration of their paying them, and thereby saving some trouble to the overseers in the collection of the rates, a small reduction was made to them. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman desires to call my attention to this—that by the Reform Bill of 1867, I think it was by Section seven, Parliament put an end deliberately to that system, and required that in future the rates should be paid by the tenants, providing also that in future, if the owner had agreed to pay the tenant's rates, the tenant should be enabled to deduct the amount. But what happened? Only two years elapsed when Parliament repented of its purpose, and deliberately undid that which it did in 1867. I had not the pleasure of hearing the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Stansfeld) opening, and therefore I do not know that he referred to the fact that by the Poor Law Act of 1869 there was, as I say, a deliberate giving up by Parliament of the principle which it stood out for in 1867. Since then no attempt has been made to make personal payment of rates by tenants a necessary qualification. Furthermore, why should payment of rates, as a condition of qualification, be imposed on a man any more than payment of his other debts? Why not his gas and water rates, why not his tailor's bill, and his tradesmen's bills generally? But there is another feature which the right hon. Gentleman did not deal with, and it is this: you get disqualified if you do not pay your poor rates at a particular date. You do not escape the payment altogether, you have to pay; the law is strong enough to make you, and you will have to do it in the end. Many a working man may find it hard to provide the money to pay the rates at a particular date, and if he does not pay he becomes disqualified. He becomes disqualified, but he has to pay all the same. Therefore, I think it is high time that this disqualification should be removed. The next objection of the right hon. Gentleman was that the Bill swept away the twelve months' residence. What is the present grievance, and on whom does it operate? It is that while, on the one hand, the law says that twelve months' occupation should be necessary, in point of practice much more than twelve months' occupation is necessary. It means sometimes two years, and sometimes as much as two years and a half. But there is another objection to the present law, and that is the case of the removals. The hardship of removal does not fall largely on the rich, who do not often change their residence. Some may carry on their business at one place and have their residence at another. Such people do not often have to remove. It is when you come to the working classes, who have to follow the tide of industry from one place to another, that the hardship of twelve months' occupation most harshly operates. I would suggest this question to the House—Why, when a man who is a voter in a particular district, say the City of London, removes, owing to the exigencies of business, to another place, say Liverpool, should he forfeit his interest in the Imperial Parliament and his right to vote on Imperial questions? I grant there is a distinction between municipal and Imperial affairs, and it is right that when a man ceases to reside in a place he should, at the end of his year of registration, cease to have any interest in its affairs; but does the same rule apply with regard to Imperial matters? Does a man cease to have a stake in the country, or is his interest in keeping down taxation, in retrenchment, in reform, diminished when he removes from one town to another? Surely this has only to be stated for it to be manifest that such a man does not lose his interest; and why, therefore, should you penalise him because he has to move? It would be much better and much fairer in Imperial matters that when a man removes from one electoral area to another he should be allowed to carry with him his interest in, and vote for, the Imperial Parliament, just as he now carries with him his personal character, his household goods, and all else that is his. I am afraid we cannot expect that this will come in the immediate future, because it is said with some authority that some period of residence must be necessary, and I grant that this is desirable. It is suggested that if you have not some such period as three months, then at election times wire-pullers and persons with improper motives might have an inducement to bring down to some locality immediately before an election a number of persons, by perhaps starting some industry, and thus preventing the opinion of the constituency being fairly expressed. Possibly these fears are remote, but in dealing with this privilege there should be some reasonable protection, and I think the right hon. Gentleman has done wisely in putting in a period of three months. Then what sound objection can there be to the proposal of successive occupation? At present if you move about in the same electoral areas your periods of residence count, but seeing that we are not dealing with municipal but with Imperial matters, and that a man's interest in these does not cease on removal, it is right to apply the same principle which you apply now to successive occupations in the same electoral area to successive occupations in different parts of the country, and the period of three months will be some protection.

(2.0.) MAJOR GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY: By the indulgence of the House may I explain that what I was referring to in my speech was not individuals coming forward and claiming votes to which they were not entitled, but false claims put forward by an agent. That agent put forward a large number of these false claims, and it was that fact which was the special reason for the observation I made. I could not imagine that any right hon. or hon. Gentleman opposite had any desire to encourage such a procedure.

*(2.19.) MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE (Finsbury, Holborn): The hon. and learned Gentleman who last spoke on the other side of the House fairly enough admitted that this Bill is not merely a Registration Bill, but that it is a Reform Bill. As he said, he and those who act with him are not ashamed of the word "reform." "Reform," no doubt, is a very taking and a very popular word; but, at the same time, it has been associated with so many doubtful measures and suspicious proposals, that we on this side of the House are inclined to look with some suspicion on measures that are called Reform measures. It is well, however, to remember that this Bill strikes directly at the rating qualification. The hon. and learned Member went back into history so far as 1832, and he said that the rating qualification was then adopted simply in order to fix the limit of the £10 rental. But if he had been logical, I think he would have gone a little farther and said why the limit of £10 rental was fixed. He must know that in the open boroughs, prior to 1832, every householder had a vote quite irrespective of the amount of his rent and the rate which he paid. The £10 limit was fixed because it was considered by those who passed the Reform Bill of 1832 that the persons who paid no rates were not fit to be entrusted with the franchise—they called them pot-wollopers. Therefore they adopted a £10 limit, and said, "We will disfranchise those who have not a house rated at £10," who they considered were quite unworthy of exercising the franchise. I do not know whether they were right or whether they were wrong. I only know that from that time to this in all the measures of Reform that have been passed the rating qualification has been recognised. The right hon. Gentleman told us that he got the clause in the present Bill from the measure proposed by Lord John Russell in 1864, but Lord John Russell's proposals were all unfortunate and ill-omened. The rating qualification has remained an integral part of our system. It is true, as the hon. and learned Gentleman who last spoke observed, that the personal payment of rates is not insisted upon. A person who occupies a house and pays the rates through the landlord is not disqualified or disfranchised. But it is altogether a novel principle to enfranchise those who pay no rates. It may be that the time has come when we should make some great alteration in the system of qualification for the franchise; but no such measure has ever been adopted unless it has been proposed by a responsible Minister. Then, as to the question of qualification in regard to the electoral area, it is proposed that anyone who resides in a particular constituency for three months shall be entitled to a vote.

MR. STANSFELD: Three months from a particular date.

*MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE: It may be that the persons have no connection whatever, beyond occupation, with the district. The system of electoral areas may be altogether wrong, but it is a system we have hitherto acted upon. I know that great men like John Stuart Mill and Mr. Hare propounded an elaborate scheme in which they disregarded the electoral area altogether; but, so long as the principle of the electoral area is continued, so long must the person voting in that area have some substantial connection with it. It is idle to say that a man should be entitled to a vote who has resided only three months in it. I am not advocating a qualification of twelve months—that may be too long; but I assert that three months is too short. I do not agree with the statement of the hon. and learned Member that those who move most from constituency to constituency are working men. I believe that working men, on the whole, reside quite as long in one particular district as any other class—certainly in London. It is the class above the working men who form the class of political casuals which this Bill takes under its special patronage. It seems to me that the man who is settled in the district in which he lives, who does not wander from place to place, is the most likely to act in the interests not only of that district, but of the country generally. Now, I have listened attentively to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who brought in this Bill, but I could not quite gather the exact complaints he makes against the present system. So far as I could understand, the only officers of whom he makes complaint are the overseers, and they are the very persons with whose functions he does not propose to interfere. No complaint was made against the way in which the revising barrister has acted; he is a person having no political bias, who comes in contact with the overseers and decides questions of law. Then what is the great improvement which is to be made in the present machinery? I am always suspicious when a Reform Bill is introduced from the opposite Benches, because I know what it will amount to. It means that there is to be an army of Inspectors created to be paid out of the rates. Does the right hon. Gentleman really think that a proposal of that kind is one that deserves the consideration of this House or of any part of it?

MR. STANSFELD: I do not propose to appoint any Inspectors.

*MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE: Not by name. I made a mistake in the word.

MR. STANSFELD: Superintendents.

*MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE: It matters little what they are called. They are to be appointed by the County Council and to be paid out of the rates. But the overseers, of whom such complaint has been made by the right hon. Gentleman, are to be entrusted with additional duties. They are to take the lodgers' list of voters for the last year and pay domiciliary visits in order to prepare the list for the new year. Fancy the overseers, who, we are told, have hardly sufficient intelligence to discharge their present duties, being entrusted with this delicate task of discovering in this way how many of these people are entitled to be on the list for the next year! Will it be at all practicable? The right hon. Gentleman said this was a simple Bill; but, having done my best to understand it, I venture to say a more complicated measure was never proposed in this House. What is the meaning of all this machinery? It is to save the voters trouble. If it means that a voter should be put on the list without having to fight for his claim, I agree; but if it means that he should not have the trouble of making a claim, signing his name, and handing in the paper, then I do not agree. If the vote is worth having, I do not understand why a man should be relieved of that small degree of trouble. In many constituencies we know that a great number of the claims sent in are not signed by the persons who are purported to have signed, and that is one reason why something more than three months' occupation should be considered necessary. If a man has only lived in a place for three months it is difficult to identify him or to learn anything about him, but if he has resided there twelve months you can generally procure information. In allowing persons to claim for others there will be this disadvantage—that the possessor of the vote being indebted to others for his vote will be inclined to exercise the franchise at their dictation. Therefore, I object to this Bill, because it strikes at the root of our present system. It may be right or wrong to do without rating qualification, but such a fundamental alteration should only be made by a responsible Minister.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): The latter part of the hon. Member's remarks have been devoted to the danger of allowing one person to claim for another the right to vote. That practice is universally engaged in by agents, but it is one that I have always opposed, and one I understand the Bill aims at removing. Party registration agents are nothing more or less than election agents in disguise, and they are the people who are rendering the Corrupt Practices Act a dead letter and utterly inefficient. I should like to turn to some of the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Thanet (Mr. James Lowther), and also to the observations of the hon. and learned Member opposite, because it seems to me that they dwelt too much on the details of this and previous Reform Bills. The three main principles embodied in this Bill are, to limit the qualifying period of the voter to the reasonable period always intended; to simplifying the mode of transferring a voter from one register to another after change of residence; and the third is to appoint an official superintendent in the different districts. These are the three leading principles of the Bill, and those who approve of them are, I maintain, bound to vote for the Second Reading of this Bill if it goes to a Division. I maintain that the present nominal qualification of twelve months practically means eighteen months, and in some cases two or even three years. What is desired by the Bill is to limit the period before a man can be put on the register to three months, and then it must be remembered that there is another three months before the register comes into force. I cannot bind myself to the actual dates fixed in the Bill, because I can see instances where the 25th June would be utterly useless, seeing that in agricultural districts the change of residence is on Lady Day. Those matters of detail can, however, be better dealt with at another stage. The real question is the principle. Are we satisfied that a man should have to reside in one place twelve months before he can have his name placed on the register, and have to wait a further period before he can use his vote? I venture to say that such conditions were never intended. The intention of Parliament was that a residence of twelve months should constitute qualification, and that there should be no subsequent delay before the franchise could be exercised. As to successive occupation, I would ask whether it is not positively absurd that a farm labourer or shepherd who changes his place on Lady Day from one farm to another in the same division should be entitled to successive occupation qualification, whereas if he moves out of the division he should be compelled to wait a year and a half before he can have a vote. The very fact that he has been qualified to vote is evidence that there is nothing against his vote, and the mere fact of a man living in another house does not in the slightest degree alter his fitness or diminish his right. That is an alteration which ought, in the interests of many at present injured, to be effected. Then, as to the mode of carrying out the transfer, the Bill proposes an official who would act not in the interests of a party, but in the interests of the country and in the interests of the thorough carrying out of the Act. I should like to point out that official registration is to a certain extent known in boroughs, and that we have very few of those disputes which occur in the counties, where the registration agent appears to think that his duty is to remove names from the register rather than to put them on. What we desire is that names should be placed on the register and not erased. In the boroughs the agents have learned wisdom; they have the assistance of the overseer of the poor, and with his aid the lists are generally fairly well made out. In my own borough I do not believe that last year there were half-a-dozen objections made on either side. But in the counties half-a-day is occupied in hearing objections, and in regard to this state of things I think the blame is evenly divided between the two Parties. I cordially support the three main principles of the Bill. There is, however, this great danger, and it is one we should have to look to—that where the residence has been short there is liability to personation at the poll. There is no reason why the limit should not be extended even under this Bill, although when we recollect that there must be three months' residence before a man can claim, and three months afterwards before he can possibly have the vote, the danger of personation will not, perhaps, be acute. I myself should be glad to hear any objection on that point, as the danger is one that should be carefully guarded against in the interests of all parties. Having supported the principles of this Bill last year, and believing that they ought to be carried into effect, I now give my hearty support to the measure.

*MR. CHARLES PARKER (Perth): One of the reasons weighing most strongly with me in favour of some of the changes proposed by this Bill is that at present we practically have not under our Franchise Act what in theory we profess to have. Much is said of the predominance of the working man, but in practice his voting power is much restricted by long periods of qualification, and the rating and other conditions. Now this ought not to be a party question. It does not follow that because the voters are working men they will all be found on one side. That is an exploded fallacy of olden days. Surely it would be a wiser thing to amend the franchise, as is proposed by this Bill, and make it correspond with what it professes to be, than to leave it in the present unsatisfactory condition. We were told in former days that in some countries the Constitution was despotism tempered with assassination, and I may say that here we have democracy tempered by registration. Our registration system is such as to limit democracy in a way that I do not believe was deliberately intended by Parliament. On the same principle as I object to promising private soldiers in the Army a shilling a day, and then defrauding them of that shilling by unforeseen deductions, so I object to telling workmen that they are voters, and then leaving them to find out that, by the ordinary and regular working of our registration system, their names are omitted from the register. Reference has been made by hon. Members opposite to difficulties that might arise by the proposed limitation of time for qualifying a man to vote. They spoke as if by this Bill three months would be the usual qualifying period, but that is not correct. Under this Bill a man will have to reside three months in a place before a certain day in the year in order to make his claim. Another three months at least will elapse before the new register can be complete, and there will almost always be a further lapse of time between the completion of the register and the exercise of the franchise at an election. It will, therefore, be seen that, instead of three months, the minimum of time qualifying a man to vote will be six months. I agree with my right hon. Friend as to a danger in Clause 9, which provides that a person who has occupied successively qualifying premises in different electoral areas is to be permitted to vote in the electoral area in which the premises last occupied by him for however short a time are situate. That seems a weak point in the Bill, and I can conceive that some of those gentlemen whose occupation as registration agents is to be taken from them might find a field for their activity in persuading voters—whenever it may be desirable—to transfer themselves to a different electoral area. I believe that in the United States of America tricks of that kind have been often played; but this is a matter that can be considered very well in Committee. It has been said that it will be quite impossible for us to consider this Bill in Committee this Session, and therefore why commit ourselves to the principle? Now, the principle of this Bill has been for a considerable time under discussion. Reforms in registration were promised by one Party in 1885, but nothing has been done. It appears to me that the time has now come when both political Parties should make up their minds on the principle of this Bill, even if there should not be time to pass it into law. I regret to find that by Clause 2 this Bill does not extend to Scotland, because I am sure it would be welcomed in that country, and is required as much there as it is in England. My hon. Friend the Member for the Montrose Burghs (Mr. Shiress Will), who made an admirable and lucid speech in support of this Bill, sat down without remarking that on the Paper for to-day appears a Bill brought in by himself—the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Bill. I ask that whatever is agreed to be done to-day as regards England may be done also for Scotland, either by introducing the necessary clauses into this Bill, or by allowing to run with it the Bill to which I have referred.

(2.58.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I do not propose to occupy the time of the House at any length, because I am anxious to hear what the Government have to say on this question. It matters very little in the present state of Business what may be the opinions of private Members with regard to this Bill; but if the Government will take it up there is not the slightest reason why it should not be carried through this Session. We have plenty of time before us. We are now only in May, and we have June, July, August, and a good piece of September before us with nothing else to do except consider the Local Government Bill for Ireland. Now, I want to say one word with regard to the observations and arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Holborn (Mr. Gainsford Bruce). To say that if a man wants a vote he should go and get it is simple nonsense. In the first place, a vote is not given to him as a prize; it involves a duty as well as a right. In the second place, hundreds and thousands of working men are prevented from going and claiming their votes because they have no time in which to do so. It is all very well for some of us who have but little to do to go and claim our votes; but I say it is simply cruel to turn round and say to a working man, "Why have you not got your vote?" when a half-day or day off means so much less bread for his wife and children, who, under ordinary circumstances, do not get too much. If, on the other hand, it is said he should claim it through someone else, then you have all those difficulties to which reference has already been made. There are three alternatives in this matter. A man may claim the vote for himself, but he has not the time; he may claim it by a person whom he chooses, but there are objections to that; or, as the third alternative, he may claim it by a recognised officer, and that is the suggestion of this Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Holborn has told us that there is the danger of personation connected with the system proposed by this Bill, and that the register would be inaccurate and incomplete. I should like to remind him of the state of things which existed in the very borough he represents at the time he secured his seat. I had the good fortune to be engaged in that election, and my colleagues and myself found upon the register made up so carefully—of course, under the admirable system that now exists—ladies and Members of Parliament and persons who had been dead for years. Well, I have that much faith in my countrymen that I believe whatever may be their political bias, if you once impose upon them a judicial and official duty, they will discharge it in a spirit of fairness; and, therefore, if we had these officials to make up the registers we should not have to deplore the shocking state of things which now prevails. Now, Sir, only one word more, and then I do hope the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir E. Clarke) will give us some information as to the view taken by the Government on this matter. I must confess that I do not agree with what has been said about the 9th clause. It was suggested a few moments ago by the last speaker that there was a danger of voters transferring themselves to another Division on the very eve of an election.

An hon. MEMBER: No; on the eve of a registration.

MR. WADDY: Well, if it took place on the eve of a registration no harm would be done; but on the eve of an election were the words used. If anything like wholesale swamping were to take place on the eve of an election, it would be very objectionable indeed; but I do not see how there can be the slightest objection to the transfer of a heap of people from one Division to another on the eve of a registration, because if they claim for one Division they will come off the other. They cannot be on both registers.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: Why not?

MR. WADDY: Because they could not be occupiers in both Divisions.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I do not see it.

MR. WADDY: Then I am astonished that the penetration of the right hon. Gentleman, to which we are all accustomed, fails him for once. I do not see why a man should not change from one place to another on the eve of a registration if he pleases. It is exactly what was done under the sanction of the great Constitutional Party in Liverpool not very long ago, when three hundred voters were transferred from one Division to another. I venture to think that the difficulty is one which could be got rid of, if it existed, in the simplest way, but it does not in reality exist. I do hope that the broad principle of this Bill of enfranchisement as against disfranchisement will be accepted by the House, and that all those who desire to see the population of the country exercising their votes as far as possible will vote for the Second Reading of this measure.

*(3.10.) MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.): It has been insinuated from the other side that we oppose the Second Reading of this Bill with the object, if possible, of keeping down the working class vote. I venture to disclaim any such intention. As a matter of fact, many of us who sit on this side of the House depend for our seats on that vote. We have as much confidence in the working classes as hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, and we are just as anxious as they are that this class should give their opinions clearly and truly in every election. We find from experience that as the working classes move steadily towards the big towns, and as the spread of education becomes greater day by day, they more and more gravitate towards us, and we have, therefore, not the slightest wish to keep down the working class vote. It has been said that there is a particular principle involved in this Bill, but I think there need be very little discussion about that. The question is really one of machinery. It is whether the machinery proposed by the Bill is suitable to give effect to the objects which most of us on this side of the House desire in common with hon. Gentlemen on the other side? We feel it is important that at every election we should have as far as possible what is the true voice of the country. It seems to me that three questions are involved in this Bill: What shall be the qualification of the voter? I think the word is not used now in the sense in which it was used in the olden time. One hon. Member spoke as if residence for a certain time in itself, with regard to the local interests it creates, ought to be held to be a necessary qualification. I venture to dissent from that view. The object of having a residential qualification is simply and solely for business purposes. The practical question in putting a man on the register is to see that personation and offences of that kind shall be rendered impossible. What I should like to see accomplished, if it were possible, is to have the register made out up to the morning of the election, so that every man who is entitled could give his vote. That is an ideal which I suppose we are all agreed upon, but of course it is not practicable. There are the questions of preparing and getting out the register and providing against personation, and for these matters some time must necessarily be allowed. We know that we are engaged on what is only an academic Debate; and we also know that if the Government had had time they would have liked to take up this matter and thoroughly thrash out the question of what is the best machinery for the purpose. But there are, we know, many more important matters than this to be dealt with. For instance, the question of the illiterate voter, upon which the House gave a decided expression of opinion the other day, is very much more important than this. The second point is, Where shall a man vote? That is a question of convenience, and is not, after all, a question of residential qualification. Suppose a man moves from one place to another he can only vote for the place where he is on the register. No doubt that is a matter of grave importance to the out-voters, and it is also, sometimes, a ground of temptation to candidates. In a recent election I had a letter from a man who had left the Division but was still on the register and was entitled to vote, but it would put him, he said, to considerable expense to come to the poll and give his vote because of the distance he lived away. Of course I could not help him, and I rather suspect that that letter came from a Radical who wanted to trap me; and while he received, I hope, my sympathy, he did not get his cash. But, of course, this is a question of convenience, and I think that it is desirable that a man's voting power should be transferred as quickly as possible from the place where the man lived to the place where he lives. The third question is, Who shall put him on the register? On this point I sympathise to a large extent with what has been said on the other side; for though I have never had any difficulty myself about being put on the register, I know that the working man must either look very sharply after the matter himself or have it very sharply looked after for him, or he is in danger of having his name omitted. I shall not, however, commit myself to the machinery for the purpose provided in the Bill without further consideration. But looking at the Bill as expressing the principle that as far as possible it is desirable to make the true voice of the constituencies heard, I shall support the Second Reading, without, however, in any way committing myself as to the details by which that principle is to be secured.

*(3.20.) MR. EDWARD HOLDEN (Walsall): As one who has recently come from the electors, I may say that there is no greater grievance amongst the electors than the way the registers are prepared. In the election to which I refer the opinion was expressed over and over again that great alterations were necessary in the Registration Laws, and nothing drew the cheers sooner from the large meetings which were held than the statement that it should be as easy to get on the register as on the rate-book. The Home Secretary is about to go to Birmingham, and if he will say the same thing to the people there I think he will find that the Town Hall will ring with cheers. He knows well that he dare not oppose this Bill in his own constituency. I should be very glad if the Government would oppose this Bill; but I am afraid they are too cute to take up that position at this time. This is a very good Bill, and I hope the promoters will be able to get it through Committee. I have been behind the scenes in registration matters for about thirty years, and I believe there is nothing more corrupt or unjust than the present system. It not infrequently happens that where it does not suit either party to put a man on the register, he is kept off for years. The registration agents go round and ask people what politics they profess, and if they happen to profess the same politics as the agent he puts them on the register, and if they do not he conceals his own politics and leads the men to believe that he will get them put on, but takes no further action, and thus, in many cases, succeeds in deceiving and thereby keeping qualified persons off the register. Not only is that the case, but sometimes you find a man on the register one year, and the next, though his qualification has not been altered and his rates duly paid, he is off. I do not say that one party is any worse in this matter than the other. I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) will take the Bill to a Division, and cast the responsibility of rejecting the measure on those who vote against it. We do not care whether the Government oppose the Bill or not, and I am sure it will make a popular appeal at the next Election to that large class upon whom at present the Registration Laws press so heavily. Respecting the illiterate vote that we have heard so much about, the electors are quite indifferent how that question is settled.

(3.23.) MR. TIMOTHY SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green) : This is eminently a Bill to be dealt with in the Committee stage, and I am pleased to notice that, so far as the principle is concerned, there is an almost entire agreement on both sides of the House. At present the Registration Laws are a temptation and an encouragement to fraud, and that system is thoroughly unsound and rotten from top to bottom. The registers are stuffed by energetic agents unless those agents are watched and checked by equally energetic agents on the other side. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Major General Goldsworthy) said that a short time ago an attempt to put on the register in his constituency a considerable number of fraudulent votes was only frustrated by the watchfulness and energetic action of a very capable election agent. But there are not capable election agents in all the constituencies. It is not every Member of Parliament who can afford to engage and maintain a very competent election agent, and the result is that the registers are stuffed and frauds are committed on the electors. I cannot see what interest any Party can have in wishing to continue a fraudulent system which is a temptation and an encouragement to dishonesty, and must be demoralising to all who are concerned in the working of it. I say it is absurd, and ridiculous, and scandalous to see the way in which questions are fought out at the Registration Sessions by the agents of the opposing parties with the object of stuffing or depleting the register as their wishes may incline. It should be the business of some public officer responsible to the State to do this work, and to do it satisfactorily. I am perfectly convinced that it would work satisfactorily, and would be approved of by Members of all shades of political opinion, and by the country at large. That being so, I fail to see why there should be any division of opinion on the Second Reading of the measure which is now before the House, and the details can be talked about in Committee. We have been told that this Bill will not get into Committee; but that is no reason why we should not take the Second Reading, because we have heard of other measures—big measures—which have passed the Second Reading, but which will not get into Committee. As there seems to be a universal and unanimous opinion in favour of this Bill, I hope the Second Reading will be pressed, and then it can take its chance of getting into Committee.

*(3.28.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : There is no doubt that the present system of registration is not everything that one could desire, and there is a great deal of room for improvement in many particulars. Many details are involved in this Bill with respect to which I should not object to reasonable alterations; but this Bill is a very large and formidable one, having some very sweeping consequences, and, therefore, requires to be looked at from every standpoint. There are, to my mind, three leading features in this Bill: First, it would alter very materially the qualification of the voter. That is a very sweeping alteration; and though there is possibly much that may be said both for and against the proposition, still, that is a very large reform, which would very materially alter the register. The second question is the proposal to very much shorten the period of qualification. The hon. Gentleman behind me (Mr. Bousfield) said that, theoretically, the idea should be to make up the register to the very morning of the election. When we live in another world that may be the system of election, but under our imperfect conditions that could not be carried out. It is all very well to have a high ideal and a noble aim, but we must look at this rough world as we find it, and I say that a period of three months does not give sufficient time to prepare the registers. There is a lot of work to be done in their preparation, and in my view a measure which only allows three months is so far impracticable that it need not be entertained by the House. Then comes what I suppose is really the main point of the Bill—the registration officer. The theory, as I understand it, is that we should do away with private registration agents, and have an official registration agent, who would do his duty impartially. Looking through the clauses I turn to London, in which I am largely interested, as I represent a division of that city. I find that the registration officer for London is to be appointed by the London County Council. The London County Council is a political body, and yet that political body is to appoint my registration agent. I should look with grave suspicion and objection on such an appointment as that, for I should strongly object to my agent being appointed by a party whose politics were opposed to my own. That is not a fair way of appointing registration agents. But if the measure were carried into law, would it really do away with private registration agents? It is proposed to appoint an official agent, but will it be maintained that both parties are to be content with that agent? Suppose he is partial and acts improperly, which is conceivable, to one side or the other, we should want an agent to look after him. I believe at present it is the duty of somebody to put voters on the list, and we only employ agents to see that somebody does his duty. It is said these agents often put on the names of those who have no right to vote, but I am sure that is not done to any great extent. If an official agent were appointed, I should insist on having an agent to look after my interests, especially if he were appointed by a political body diametrically opposed to me in politics and doing all it can to oust me from my present constituency. There is no penalty provided in the Bill for neglect of duty on the part of the official. If he is corrupt or leaves a large number of names off the list, there are no means of bringing him to book, and an election might take place on an imperfect or unfair register. I do not agree that the ideal registration system is such as that proposed by the hon. Member behind me. All these measures are necessary because people do not do their own duty. It should be the duty of everybody to put himself on the list. If the franchise were felt to be the duty and responsibility that it really is, everybody entitled to vote would demand to have his name put on the register. These measures assist men to be indolent, and I think we should try more to throw the responsibility on the individual and simplify the machinery to that end, instead of appointing another army of official agents. I have always felt keenly that some reform is necessary in the Registration Laws of this country, but this measure is so crude and drastic, and so sweeping, that I cannot support the Second Reading, especially as it is admitted, even by its supporters, that almost every detail in the Bill would have to be altered in Committee.

(3.37.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down seems to be under a misapprehension as to the duties of the registration agent under this Bill. He is not intended to render unnecessary the employment of Party agents, but simply to see that the overseers do their duty. The hon. Gentleman objects to the appointment of the agent by the London County Council; but does not appear to object to the present system by which registration is left in the hands of the overseers, who are appointed by the Vestries. I do not know that Vestries have divested themselves of political feelings any more than the County Council. I look upon this Bill as one intended to get rid of a large number of the harassing and absurd technicalities which make the franchise at present rather a subject of mockery than of serious consideration. The alteration of the period of residence to three months is undoubtedly a reasonable one, and it means that a man must be in a constituency eight or ten months before he can vote, because the register made in July does not come into operation till November. It seems to me that we are year by year drifting away from the principle of locality into recognition of the sound principle that the right to vote, which involves an Imperial duty, is not dependent on local circumstances or peculiar to any locality, but is a right in every sense Imperial. It therefore seems to me that we should consider whether we should not cut down the qualification to manhood qualification. There is an important clause which has been overlooked up to the present, Clause 21. At present a person on the list under any special qualification loses his vote if he does not possess that precise qualification, though he may possess half a dozen others, and the law of household suffrage is in such a condition of confusion, muddle, and scholastic refinement that it is in many cases absolutely impossible to decide whether a person is a householder or a lodger. A lodger who, during the qualifying period, changes his qualification by buying the house in which he lives loses his vote for that year. That is so absurd and iniquitous that it is sufficient in itself to condemn the present system. I warn the House that what we have to deal with now are not merely difficulties of registration and technical machinery, but difficulties going to the essence and root of the franchise, and I regret that it is not proposed to take a bold step and get rid of these shadowy and absurd qualifications, and come down straightforwardly and at once to manhood suffrage. It must come sooner or later, and all the machinery Bills in the world will not avoid the difficulties now attaching to the franchise until you get rid of the distinctions between lodgers, rated occupiers, householders, and others. There is another point in which I think the Bill is defective. While it provides that successive occupation of different sets of premises may qualify a man, it does not provide for cases where accompanying the change of residence there is a change of qualification, as where a lodger becomes a householder. This is a Bill which does something to throw light on the present absurdities of the law of registration, and for that reason I think it would be well worth consideration in Committee, and I, therefore, hope the House will pass the Second Reading.

(3.45.) MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I quite acknowledge that under the present law there are anomalies in registration that might be amended and technicalities that might be done away with; but, though I have not had time to very carefully examine the Bill, I think it is too drastic for us to be able to consider it at all fairly in this Parliament. In the first place, it appears to take the electoral power away from the resident population, and to put it as far as possible in the hands of the migratory and floating population. I think the term of three months is too short for qualification. In some London constituencies the fluctuations in the population amount to twenty-five or thirty per cent., and if the period were only three months I fear there would be serious jerrymandering in London. I look upon the proposed appointment of the registration superintendent by the London County Council with great suspicion, as that Council is a political body—a fact clearly proved by their having appointed their Aldermen entirely from one political Party. It would be the same with the registration agents. They would place in every district in London an individual who would be nothing more than a first-rate electioneering agent for their own ends. It is desirable to have an official agent in the various districts, but I would have him appointed by the right hon. Member for Midlothian, the Lord Chancellor, a Committee of Judges, or by any authority in the State than by the London County Council. The Bill takes away the property qualification, and allows people to be on the register without paying any rates and taxes. It has always been a principle of the Constitution that representation and taxation go together. And I would venture to suggest that any alteration of that principle should be straightforwardly done by a Reform Bill, and not in a Bill of this kind. The best system of registration would be that under which each voter came to claim his vote himself. In New York everybody desiring to vote at a coming election must, some time before the date of the election, go to an office and claim his vote. I cannot see why that system should not be applied in the United Kingdom. If the superintendent had to investigate lodger claims he would have in his hands a vast amount of patronage in the appointment of a large number of individuals of the same political faith as himself, who would go round the districts, not so much to trace the lodgers as to induce the voters to vote for the Party to which he belonged. I look upon this Bill as one which ought to be regarded with very great suspicion. No doubt the time is nearly ripe when this question of registration should be dealt with by a well-considered Registration Bill. I am prepared to give my support to a Bill of that kind, which will alter our present system of registration without altering it in the way proposed by this Bill.

*(3.51.) MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I think that, after the speeches which we have just listened to from that side of the House, surely it is time we should ask for a little Governmental guidance in the matter, because there have been the most contrary opinions expressed in different quarters. Every speech which has been delivered on the other side has been delivered, it will be observed also, either by London Members or by Members who represent essentially urban constituencies. Surely we are entitled to have some utterance from the supporters of the Government, or some Member for the Government who is more deeply in touch with the country districts, as to what line the Government propose to adopt with regard to the measure. A good deal has been said in the course of this Debate as to what is the real principle of the Bill. It has been argued that the principle of the Bill was contained in the fourth clause, which reduces the qualifying period from its present duration to the period of three months. That is certainly a provision of great importance, but I venture to think it is not the real principle of the Bill, I venture to think that the real principle of the Bill will be found in Clause 3, which provides that—

“So much of any Act as requires any person to be rated, or requires any rate or assessed taxes to be paid, for the purpose of entitling any person to be qualified as a Parliamentary elector, shall be repealed.”

If my view of the principle of this Bill be correct, then the reduction of the qualifying period to three months, though of great importance from a practical point of view, is really of less importance than the recognition of the principle in Clause 3—namely, that, after all, a man should be entitled to vote, not in consequence of what he has got, but in consequence of what he is. We have got the recognition of the principle in this Bill, though limited in degree, and with safeguards against fraud and personation, that a man is entitled to have the vote conferred on him, not on account of the property he possesses, but on account of the personality of the man; and that seems to me to constitute the main and cardinal principle of the Bill. What is contained in Clause 4 with regard to the reduction of the qualifying period to three months is a provision of great practical importance, but after all it is not, as I have said, the main principle of the Bill. But even that would help, perhaps more than anything else, to remedy the grievance which exists in many cases. As to what has been said as to the machinery of the Bill, surely that is a matter which might very well be discussed when the Committee stage is reached. Hon. Members have said that they have great confidence in the Committee stage of a Bill. We have not got to that stage of this Bill yet, but I think hon. Members ought to put as much confidence in the Committee stage of this Bill as in the Committee stage of the Irish Local Government Bill. If they are prepared to do that, as was indicated to some extent by the hon. Member for North Islington, I should ask the Solicitor General whether he is prepared to assent to the general principle of the Bill, and to give such facilities as would enable real and effective progress to be made with the present measure. I decline altogether to enter into the details of the present measure at this stage. It appears to me that what was said with regard to Clause 9 would have been amply met if the principle which was embodied in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) and which was rejected a few days ago, not on the real and straight issue but on a side issue, had been adopted. But even if that were not the case, surely it might be very fairly argued that any error in fact with regard to that clause might be fully and satisfactorily met when the Bill goes into Committee. On these grounds I venture to make an appeal to the Home Secretary or the Solicitor General to give us some words of advice and counsel in the matter, and to express what course the Government intend to adopt with regard to this measure.

(4.1.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I do not desire to inconvenience the House by postponing the observations which I intend to make on this Bill too long. Though I cannot pretend to give any counsel or advice to the hon. Gentleman opposite to guide his action in the matter, yet I am prepared to discuss the questions which have been raised in the course of this very interesting discussion. If I accepted the statement of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken that the main and cardinal principle of the Bill was to be found in this 3rd Clause, which repeals all provisions now in force as to the payment of rates—if I accepted that as a correct definition, I should certainly vote against it. But the hon. Member who stated that is not one of those hon. Members whose names appear on the back of the Bill. At the beginning of this Debate the purpose and object of the Bill was explained in a very moderate and a very interesting speech by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld), who has taken for years a very great interest in registration questions, and who has on more than one occasion offered elaborate suggestions to the House on the subject; and in this Bill he claims to have given to the House, and I see that he has offered to the House, a very carefully-revised version of the proposals as regards registration, which he had previously made. In his opening speech the right hon. Gentleman said this was not a Franchise Bill. He said he did not alter the franchise; he proposed to alter the franchise only so far as was necessary to carry out the purpose of improving the registration; and he also truly said—he only did justice to many Members on this side of the House in saying—that he was sure the desire to improve our system of registration was not confined to his own side of the House. All the Members who have spoken have, I think, acknowledged that our present system of registration is not in a satisfactory condition, and that it is desirable that an attempt should be made, and should early be made, to remedy certain defects in our registration proceedings, which, at the present time, unfortunately allow many voters to be off the register who ought to be upon it; and they do recognise that it creates a feeling of soreness and dissatisfaction which it is the duty of this House to endeavour to remove. The proposals of this Bill, so far as they affect the franchise, are proposals which the Government would not make, and would not accept. I think I shall be able to show to the House, when I examine these proposals, that they are not essential to the Bill. The Bill is one with regard to registration; and applying exactly the line of the right hon. Gentleman who proposes this Bill, I shall examine some of its provisions and state my views with regard to them. The Government has felt, and it has been acknowledged by all who have experience in the matter, that there are defects in our registration system which it is desirable to remedy; and I believe the Government would have offered to the House before the present year proposals for amending the law with regard to registration but for a consideration, which hon. Members I think will very clearly see the weight of when they notice the course of the discussion this afternoon. If the Government had offered to the House proposals touching registration only, it is perfectly clear that the Bill in which these proposals were contained would have been made the subject of additional proposals involving large and grave Constitutional changes; and the introduction of such a Bill would by no means be a simple matter of dealing with registration machinery. The speech of the hon. Member for Kilkenny, made to the House just now, will illustrate that to hon. Members, because his proposal is a very short and trenchant one. He said, "You say you have got a great many difficulties and unsatisfactory matters as regards the registration laws; and they can only be got rid of by having manhood suffrage." And I know there is a body of Gentlemen in this House who, when we were discussing a somewhat cognate subject the other day, made their opinions vociferously known that they are in favour of manhood suffrage, and they would seize at once—and I cannot say that their action would not be legitimate—they would seize at once the opportunity of a Registration Bill in order to carry their proposals into effect. But we are here dealing this afternoon with a purely academic discussion. One or two hon. Members expressed a sanguine hope that this Bill, if the Second Reading be accepted by the House, might be carried through Committee and carried into law during the present Session of Parliament. By the terms of the Bill I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has any view in consonance with that hope. This Bill proposes that certain alterations should be made in the law with regard to registration, and the date at which these alterations would take place according to the terms of the Bill would be the 1st of June, 1893; and it is not, I think, quite reasonable to imagine that the House would deal with any very great expenditure of time or care with proposals which clearly cannot be, or would not be, carried forward so as to become law in the course of the present Session. But that being so, I confess I think it is advantageous to both sides of the House that we should have had an opportunity of discussing the subject in reference to proposals deliberately made, and made not only with the authority of the right hon. Gentleman himself, who, as I say, has given much study to the subject, but with the support of many of his colleagues on the front Opposition Bench. It is very desirable that these matters should be fully discussed. As to the proposals that are now before the House of Commons, generally speaking, they touch two matters: they touch matters of registration, and they touch matters of franchise; but as the right hon. Gentleman said, the matters of franchise have been only introduced as consequent upon, and as necessary to carry out the registration arrangements which have been proposed in this Bill. I think I shall show the House that these franchise proposals are not essential to an alteration of the law with regard to registration; and I say at once that although I am prepared to meet with a negative any proposals which were simply for the repeal of the provisions as to the payment of rates, or for the reduction of the qualifying period to a term of only three months, I will show hon. Members, I think, how the two matters of registration and franchise appear to me to be not necessarily involved. With regard to the period of qualification, it is perfectly true that there are many cases now where persons clearly belonging to the class to which Parliament has given the privilege of the franchise are unable to procure the opportunity of exercising the franchise by reason of the difficulties of the registration law. The case has been put, and truly put, that under the present state of the law it may be, in an extreme case, two and a half years before a man, who is supposed to be qualified by a twelve months' residence—it may be two and a half years after the beginning of his twelve months' qualification period before he actually comes upon the register, so as to give his vote; and that, of course, is a hardship. The proposal of this Bill would not do away with the hardship. It would, I take it, reduce that hardship; but under the present Bill, and under the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, if a man came into occupation of his house on the 1st of April instead of the 25th of March, then he could not get upon the register until the registration of the year after that, and he therefore might be nearly a year and five months, although three months was the qualifying period, before he could exercise the franchise. I do not say that that difficulty can be wholly avoided. The right hon. Gentleman will remember that in the Bill which he brought forward four years ago he endeavoured to deal with that difficulty, and to deal with it by a system which has been much discussed by those who are anxious to amend the law of registration—that is, by providing for supplemental registers from time to time in the course of a year. The right hon. Gentleman's Bill of 1888 made provision for a register being formed at four different periods of the year, and brought into operation; and that would, but for an objection which is a serious one, be, to my thinking, a much better solution of the difficulty, because you could thus retain, what I think is very valuable, the requirement of twelve months' continuous qualification, and at the same time you could secure that within three months of the end of that year the person should get upon the register. The real difficulty with regard to that is its enormous expense. I think I am right; I have the Bill of 1888 before me. However, that was the principle. I fully agree that the hardship which has been discussed is one which Parliament ought to deal with, and my own view is that, directly you have got a man belonging to the class entitled to the privilege of a vote, it should be made as easy as possible for his name to come upon the list. If possible it should be by the action of a public officer, because it is a public matter that his name should be put upon the list, and when it is once there it should not be allowed to disappear from that list as long as he continues to hold the qualification which first put it there. But the hardship which is so much felt of having to wait sometimes for a year and a half or two years, or even two years and a half, before actually exercising the franchise is to my thinking of much less hardship than the one which now exists if a man changes his qualification from one constituency to another, and therefore loses again for this considerable time the right to exercise a vote. My own view is that the losing of the vote because a man moves from one constituency to another constituency is a much more serious hardship than the other. Some Members of the House will remember that in 1884, when we were dealing with a Reform Bill, I spoke and voted in favour of the proposal that successive occupation should be allowed in London not only as it now is, within the area of the divisions of an old Parliamentary borough, but that it should be allowed as between one Parliamentary borough and another. I could not see why a man who had lived in Bermondsey and went to live at Rotherhithe should be allowed to vote with successive occupations, whereas the man who lived at Clapham and went to live at Southwark should not. I think that is a matter in which an amendment should be made. But there are alternative proposals for dealing with this difficulty, and as far as I know there are only these two alternatives, with the exception of these supplemental lists. One is that you should shorten the period of residence; the other is that you should have successive occupation enabling a man to carry from one constituency to another the title to give a vote. My own individual opinion always was in favour of the second proposal, and I am not pressed by the consideration of the local character of the representation which has been put so strongly to-day. I think the greater number of those who have dealt with the question have been of opinion that there should be some reduction in the term of residence, but certainly not so short a term as three months, and certainly not so short a term as three months coupled with a successive occupation. This Bill is a Bill of detail. It is impossible to say there is any special principle to which one commits oneself in voting either for or against such a Bill. But the objection I have to the special mode of the right hon. Gentleman is that if you have a qualifying period of three months—three months from March to June—and you allow within the limit of these three months' successive occupation, you have a man who comes into the constituency on the 14th June, the qualifying period of the three months expiring on the 24th June, perhaps with a certificate of voting power from the other constituency, and he comes immediately upon that electoral list. I confess that that would be a most serious temptation to manipulating constituencies. One knows how very narrow indeed the majorities are in a great many towns. I will give just one instance of what might happen under the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman if it were accepted in all its details. I take such a place as Grantham. I find that in Grantham there was a majority at the last Election of thirty votes. Grantham is a place which has large industrial works and a great many men moving about from time to time and coming in to live in the constituency. It is said that the bringing in of voters for the purpose of swamping a constituency is not likely to be done because it must be done not immediately before an Election, but immediately before the registration. But suppose you have, as you often have, a case where a new register is established for the purpose of an Election. You then get the register and the Election practically at the same time. It is pretty well known that an Election must take place in the course of the next twelve months at all events. Suppose we are dealing with this case of Grantham under the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. Fifty or a hundred workmen might be brought into Grantham a fortnight before the 24th June. They would bring with them their certificates of voting capacity from the other constituency, and by living that fortnight up to the 24th June they would be entitled to be on the register for Grantham and to vote upon that register at any election which would take place between 1st November next and the following 1st November, although they might have gone away from Grantham within a week after the 24th June had passed. That is a serious danger, the reality of which would be shown at once if we were dealing with a Bill of this kind in a Select Committee and had the opportunity of getting statistics as to the extent to which a migratory population come into or out of a particular constituency. And when you are dealing with constituencies of a different character—rural constituencies, for instance—which are affected by particular times of the year and particular procedure in regard to husbandry—with regard to their population it will be seen that this is a very serious difficulty. So I do not think it is desirable to combine a shortened period of qualification and successive occupation, and I hope that whenever this House should find it necessary to deal practically with this matter it will either content itself with some shortening of the period of twelve months—not certainly taking it down to three months—without successive occupation, or that it will deal with the question of successive occupation in another way. The other part of the Bill is the part which relates to the processes of registration and the authorities by which the processes of registration are to be carried out; and in its own admirable and deliberate way the House has hesitated very long before it dealt with this matter. In 1868 there was a Report of a Committee of this House upon borough registration, and that Committee declared that the present system was unsatisfactory, because important and difficult duties were imposed upon unpaid overseers, who were constantly changing, and they recommended the adoption of the Scotch system. Parliament has not been in a hurry, even when it had the official leadership of those with whom the right hon. Gentleman is associated, to carry out that principle of registration. But the right hon. Gentleman in his speech accepted the Scotch system, and suggested that that was a wise system. There is a very important question to be raised with regard to that, which, again, is entirely a question of detail. The right hon. Gentleman has said it would be undesirable to oust the overseers from their present duties, because it would involve a serious interference with a long-established practice, and evidently it is so large a proposal that he shrinks from making it. At the same time, whenever this matter has to be practically dealt with, I think Parliament will have to consider very carefully what is the present expense of the system of registration as it is administered. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman certainly appears to throw a very heavy burden upon localities in this country, because he proposes that in every county there shall be a registration superintendent. By-the-bye, that is the case now. The clerk of the County Council has duties connected with the registration of a county. But the right hon. Gentleman also makes this rather serious proposal, that in every parish where there is a population of over five hundred, and where with the exception of the overseer there is no Vestry clerk or other officer whose duty it is to make out the lists of Parliamentary voters therein, the Vestry shall, on or before the 1st May in each year, appoint an officer, to be called the registration assistant, who is to do the work. Now a parish of five hundred inhabitants means sixty or seventy voters, and this is a proposal that in every parish of the country where there are sixty or seventy Parliamentary voters a public officer is to be appointed. If the Vestry do not appoint him, the Guardians of Unions are to appoint him, and he is to be paid such a salary out of the poor rate as may be fixed by the Vestry or the Guardians, as the case may be. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman could have carefully considered how very large a burden would be thrown upon the parish by the appointment of a regular registration officer to deal with registration work in every parish where you have over sixty or seventy voters. Of course, this question of the expense has two sides, and I should very much like to see a careful investigation by a Committee of this House of the cost to the country in one way or another of the present system of registration. For the purpose of dealing practically with this question I have endeavoured to get some information upon the subject of the expenses of registration, which, of course, apart from the expenses of revision, are the expenses of the overseers who have to make out the lists. I obtained some time ago from a friend of mine who has great experience a return of certain parishes, town parishes and county parishes, and of the amounts which were allowed to the overseers by the revising barrister in respect of the preparation of the lists. The amounts varied very much. I had an instance of one parish of two hundred and fifty inhabitants where the amount allowed to the overseer was £28, and in another parish, where there were two hundred and forty inhabitants, the amount allowed was only ten guineas. The amounts worked out in the boroughs to a cost of £28 per thousand electors; and in country parishes to £52 per thousand. I cannot say that the parishes which were given me could be taken as a governing rule as to the expenditure all over, but this is a very serious matter to consider. There are in England alone 4,500,000 voters, and applying the figures I was able to get to the number of these voters, I think that the lowest amount at which the expenditure of localities upon registration through the overseers can at present be put is £135,000, or £140,000 a year. We all know perfectly well the system that is adopted, though it costs that, is so unsatisfactory that the political Parties in each constituency spend a very large sum on registration. My own view is that it would be fair to take as an average that in every constituency in England, taking the two political Parties together, £300 a year is spent upon registration. That gives just the same result from private funds as we have already had from public funds, and makes £270,000 a year spent on a more or less imperfect system of registration. That is not at all satisfactory. The money might be spent in a much better way. A great deal of the money spent in Party registration is mischievously spent, and I am glad to recognise that one provision in this Bill would be a very valuable provision as reducing the amount spent in this matter. I think it is a mistake to say that Party election agents as a rule are working upon the lines which have been suggested this afternoon. The hon. Member for Walsall gave us interesting revelations of the way in which, according to him, Liberal agents carry on their practice.

MR. EDWARD HOLDEN: And Conservatives, too, I said.

SIR E. CLARKE: The contention was made for the Liberals; the imputation was made upon the Conservatives, but we do not accept it. A great deal of the work they have to do is to clear the list of the names of persons who have died. And I am very glad indeed to see a proposal in this Bill to make the overseers make returns of deaths four times in the year, in a way which would enable the register to be kept much better than it is now. But the right hon. Gentleman says this alteration of registration and of qualification requires the abolition of the provision regarding the payment of rates. I cannot see why. If it does require the omission of that, then it would seem to me a fatal objection to his proposal. It is true that if you have twelve months you may require the payment of rates up to the 9th of January before the end of the qualifying period; and if you make the period three months you would have to alter the period for the payment of rates. It seems to me it is most important for the sake of purity of the register, and for the sake of its completeness, that we should stand by the system which has been here adopted, and is adopted in Scotland, with results that are most excellent—namely, that the record from which the names of voters is taken should be a record which is not only connected with Parliamentary and political purposes, but is connected also with purposes of public and fiscal administration. I believe that secures the protection of the purity of the Parliamentary register, and at the same time secures that completeness of the register which is wanted for public purposes. If you had to make a Parliamentary register which was not connected with liability to rating or for public purposes, I think that register would be much more subject to being tampered with by persons having political objects. I hope I have put before the House considerations which are of much importance in regard to this matter, and I think the House will see that, holding these views, and speaking on behalf of a Government in sympathy with the desire that there should be amendment of the Registration Law which will make more complete our register, and will make it more certain that a man who has a qualification should be on the register early, and should be kept on this register regularly, there would be no excuse in the Government inviting the House to meet with hostility the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman makes. He has recognised quite fairly, in the speech in which he opened this Debate, that the proposals he was making were proposals not of a Party character. My hon. Friend who moved the rejection of the Bill, and whom I trust will not now think it necessary to insist upon his Motion, had, however, a suspicion that the right hon. Gentleman who proposed the Bill was inspired by astute wire-pullers, and that there was some reason for thinking that the Bill had been devised to give a Party advantage, although he did not indicate the way in which the advantage would be given in greater measure to any other Party than our own. However, I do not think this is a matter of Party advantage. My own belief is, and always has been, that the real object of both Parties ought to be to see that persons who belong to the class which is entitled to the franchise are as far as possible put upon the register and placed there with as little as trouble to themselves as can be arranged. We want to get the names of all qualified people on a great national register, and then to free them from difficulties arising simply in consequence of the complexity of Election Laws.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I think both sides of the House will be satisfied with the extremely moderate speech we have heard from the Solicitor General. I do not myself see how this is to be considered a Party question unless there were any Party that should profess to have interest in the keeping off a certain part of the people of this country who are entitled to be on the register. I should imagine that no Party would make that assertion or that profession. I quite agree with the Solicitor General that the main object of this Bill is to remove a great grievance, which operates extensively, and that is that a class of people whose employment takes them from one habitation to another should in consequence of that change lose their votes. There are hundreds and thousands of men in this country who at the next Election are entitled to vote just as much as those on the register, and yet will be not able to vote. The Solicitor General gave the instance of Grantham, where, under certain contingencies, it was anticipated that political operations might take place. But I will take the case of a place where hundreds of men are disfranchised by the mere fact of the change of their employment. In my neighbourhood there have been established great railway works, and many hundreds of those men are brought to those works, men whom everybody will admit are as fit to have a vote as—perhaps fitter than—many of those on the register. What is the effect? The effect is that these men who have a perfectly good qualification where they have resided, will, not through any act of their own, but by change of the employment of the Railway Company to another place, lose their right to vote, it may be for a year, a year and a half, or in extreme cases for two and a half years. That is a monstrous injustice, and it is an injustice which is not a rare one, but one which is taking place every day to greater or less extent throughout the country. We all know, too, the increased trouble and expense, in consequence of that state of things, in finding out what are called “removals,” and the great difficulty there is in bringing men who have gone elsewhere and not obtained a vote to the place they have left, and where they are entitled to vote. As the Solicitor General has said, there are two means by which that can be remedied. One is by shortening the time that is required for a new qualification, and the other is successive occupation. You might, if the lawyers were not supreme in this country, shorten the time very much by getting rid of the long interval between July and January during which a man cannot use the vote he is declared to be entitled to until the appeals have taken place. If sufficient time were given to the revising barristers and to the two Judges to hear appeals, I do not see why a man should not go upon the register in September or October, instead of waiting until January. I will take the case of one of these railway men, who, we may suppose, has resided in London for two or three years in one place. He is taken to another place, and the Solicitor General says he must reside twelve months in that place.

SIR E. CLARKE: I did not say he must reside in that new place; I said he might shorten the period of twelve months by successive occupation during the twelve months. I myself voted for successive occupation.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Do I understand you to admit that if a man is twelve months in one place he may vote on one month's occupation in another place?

SIR E. CLARKE: That would be my own view.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think that is a view for which there is a great deal to be said. I do not see why a man who has established his occupation for whatever period is considered to give a title to a vote should not carry it with him in his new employment. That seems to me reasonable, of course with certain protection against personation and matters of that kind. I do not agree in thinking that twelve months' occupation is a necessary element. I do not see why three months' occupation—which would prove that a man was not of the character of a vagabond, but was a bona fide occupier—should not be sufficient. I am not going to follow the Solicitor General through all the details he has advanced, but he has spoken of the expenditure, and I agree that the money might be much better expended. And one of the objects of this Bill is that the money expended on registration shall be more economically and better expended than at present. There is no doubt, if you obtain competent people to do the work, there will be much less expenditure required in correction. As regards rating, we do not want to discard the rate-book. You may still take the rate-book, but the question is whether you are to make the vote dependent upon the personal payment of the rate. In connection with that point we consider there is a valuable principle, but with so much concurrence of opinion as to the objects we have in view I think we ought to pass the Second Reading of the Bill, and so record the desire of the House of Commons to give facilities to every man to exercise the franchise to which the Constitution declares him to be entitled. We must remember that the men who are disabled are the men who are least able to help themselves. The property voter with his plural vote is always on the register. Wherever he has occupation he carries his vote with him; but the occupier whose livelihood is the wages of labour, subject to the necessities of that labour, is constantly disfranchised, to the great injustice to himself and to the real injury of the community. Under these circumstances, I think it would be a very good thing if this afternoon we passed the Second Reading of this Bill.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I wish to enter my protest—I hope temperately and respectfully, but at the same time most firmly and earnestly—against the attitude taken by Her Majesty's Government, as expressed at the Table by the Solicitor General; and I venture to say this is the first time in Parliamentary history a Government has accepted a Bill upon an all-important and far-reaching subject, that has been brought into this House and supported by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House. It is true that the Solicitor General, with all the nebulous precision of Nisi Prius, endeavoured to persuade the House that this was a mere question of registration. On that I have two remarks to make. If this is so very important a subject, as I admit, and if it so earnestly and urgently demands reform, why have Her Majesty's Government not brought in a Bill themselves to deal with the question of registration? We are on the eve of a General Election, and a reform of the Registration Laws, if necessary, ought now to be carried out; but I submit that any such proposal for reform of the Registration Laws ought not to come from the Opposition, but from the responsible Government of the day. But I deny entirely that this is a question of registration, and I say in opposition and in answer to the Solicitor General that this Bill, so far from being a mere question of registration, cuts at the very root and basis of our representative system. I am one of those persons old-fashioned enough to believe that the franchise is a privilege for which some test of fitness ought still to be required. We have still two tests, and two only, of fitness in this country—they are the payment of rates, either personally or by the landlord, and proved residence in some locality for a certain period of time. This Bill proposes practically to abolish both these tests of fitness, because by Clause 3 it is proposed to abolish the rating qualification. Surely the rating qualification is already low enough. The Solicitor General objects to Clause 3—I say it is the vital clause of the Bill—and yet the Solicitor General and the Government are going to support the Second Reading. The other test of fitness for the exercise of the franchise is twelve months' residence in the locality, and by Clause 9 of the Bill it is proposed to reduce that period to three months, and I would call attention to this three months' residence anywhere; because by the doctrine of successive occupation a man has only got to prove that he has existed, that he has lived in this country for three months before the registration, in order to prove his qualification. In fact, what this Bill reduces the franchise to is this—it is manhood suffrage tempered by the proof of three months' existence. That is merely the principle underlying this most dangerous and most mischievous Bill. There is another point which does affect us Metropolitan Conservative Members so closely that I must beg leave to draw to it the attention of the House. It is proposed that the registration superintendent, who shall practically have the whole control of the registration of voters in the Metropolis, should be an officer appointed by the London County Council—a body whose majority are animated by the most malevolent Party bias. It is to this body—the sworn enemies of Her Majesty's Government—that it is proposed to hand over the loyal body of their Conservative supporters. I most earnestly protest against the attitude of the Government. There is only one drop of consolation in the bitter cup which I am not going to drink this afternoon, and that is, that this miserable Bill has not the slightest chance of passing into law. None the less, as a matter of principle, shall I vote against it, with the firm conviction that I have never given a sounder vote in my short Parliamentary life.

(4.52.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Perhaps I may be allowed to make a few remarks upon what has fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann). As the Solicitor General has very clearly explained to the House, the Bill consists of two parts—one dealing with the limitation of the period required to give the necessary qualification for voting, and the other dealing with the machinery for registration. My own view with regard to the period of qualification is, that should the subject be touched at all, it should be touched with a most cautious hand, and in a most cautious manner. Undoubtedly, whatever change is to be made, I could not go to the length of the proposal contained in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. With regard to registration, I believe that a very large number of gentlemen on both sides of the House—certainly on this side of the House—have pledged themselves publicly to a reform of the registration laws, and are desirous of having such reform carried out. The difficulty this afternoon is to decide what line should be taken in reference to a Bill dealing with the subject. I should imagine that there are parts of the Bill to which every man sitting on this side of the House would strongly object. I can also conceive that there are other parts of the Bill to which hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House could have no objection. Certainly we are not called upon to exercise anything in the nature of Party discipline, or to ask hon. Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House either to vote for the Bill or to vote against it. The Government themselves are not committed either to the Second Reading or against it. Those who vote for the Second Reading, I conceive, will not consider that they are pledging themselves to swallow wholesale the views contained in the Bill with regard to the qualifying period; while those who vote against the Second Reading will not desire to regard themselves as committed against any reform of the existing machinery. I do not understand the heat which my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham has thrown into his observations on this subject. He must see that it is most inexpedient—unless he thinks that the existing system of registration is perfect—to preclude the House from the chance of publicly expressing its desire that some reform should be entertained. I do not myself see that I am the least bound not to oppose, to the utmost of my power, the particular suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite with regard to the diminution of the qualifying period; but I would not resist the Second Reading, because I believe that many of the provisions of the Bill are good as they stand, whilst others by alteration may be made good.

*(4.57.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I cannot agree with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Peckham that no Member of the House has any right to introduce a Bill on this important question, or that such a duty ought always to devolve upon the Government. We should never be able to urge upon the Government the importance of questions unless independent Members introduced Bills, and the attention of the Government was thus drawn to them.

MR. BAUMANN: That is not what I laid down, or anything like it. I said that a Bill dealing with Parliamentary Reform should be introduced by the Government.

*SIR H. JAMES: But proposals for Parliamentary reform generally proceed from the Opposition. If you always left Parliamentary Reform to those who were in Office, you would get very little reform of this character. Lord Grey carried his Reform Bill by his exertions when in Opposition, and only completed it when in Office. It is by exercising the powers of opposition and by calling attention to errors that exist that reforms are brought about. I will not follow the hon. Member for Peckham in his remarks. I do not think he contributed very much in the way of practical suggestion as to how we should act in regard to existing grievances. When we dealt with the Franchise Bill of 1884 and the Redistribution Bill of 1885, there was always a great difficulty on the part of those who were in charge of them in showing that they were Franchise Bills and not Registration Bills. The subjects are mixed up so closely together that there was great difficulty in keeping them separate. Hon. Members were constantly wishing to introduce provisions affecting registration, but it was suggested that they should be postponed till a fitting time came for dealing with such matters. I think that thanks are due to the right hon. Gentleman who has introduced this measure for having framed practical suggestions which can be considered by the House. I will not go into the details of the Bill. I will deal first with the question whether we should retain the present rating qualification or not. The hon. Member for Peckham stated that rating is regarded as evidence of fitness for the franchise; but I would point out that whilst the rate book is regarded as the best proof that a person is holding as an occupier, it has never been intended to be a test of fitness for the franchise. In 1869 Parliament enabled all small tenement holders to vote without themselves paying rates. When the service franchise was created, the rating qualification was dispensed with and why should that qualification be insisted upon for the master when it is not applied to the servant? As a matter of fact, the rating qualification was introduced in order to make the rate book the basis of the register, but that is a mere matter of conversion not of qualification. As to the time of occupation, every householder ought to exercise his vote without any restriction except in one respect—the occupying qualification should be sufficiently long to prevent the invasion of constituencies. The more eminent a candidate is, the more liable he would be to such invasion. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) might lose his seat, not by the votes of the bona fide electors, but by those of men introduced into his constituency solely for the purpose of getting rid of a most distinguished opponent. Surely some safeguard should be maintained against that. I agree with the general argument of the Solicitor General, but in his answer to the right hon. Member for Derby, the hon. and learned Gentleman contradicted that argument when he said that a man, having a six months' qualification in one constituency and only a day's residence in another, ought to be allowed to vote in the latter constituency. That would not be a fair exercise of the franchise. I am desirous, however, that there should be a great mitigation of the absurd occupation period of two years and six months. The House must remember that when Parliament gave household suffrage it did not intend that there should be an interval of between two and three years before the franchise could be exercised. The object should be to give as unrestricted a franchise as is compatible with the prevention of undue invasion or attack in any constituency. I agree that the time ought to be altered at which the register comes into operation. There is no reason why the Parliamentary register should not come into existence as soon as it is made. The municipal register comes into existence on the 1st November. Why should not the Parliamentary register come into existence at the same time? It has been urged that the successive occupation clause would lead to a great deal of personation. I would venture to suggest a way in which the amount of personation now existing might be lessened. A great amount which now occurs in our elections is in respect of dead people. My suggestion is that the registrar of deaths should be required to give notice to the returning officer of the death of every elector as it occurs. Then the names could be struck off the register at once, and there would be no possibility of personation taking place. There are other suggestions I should have liked to make with regard to the Bill, but I will not now enter into the details. I am glad to think that there will be a vote of the House in favour of this Bill, because it will establish the fact that the majority of the Members believe a reform of the existing registration system to be necessary.

(5.5.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): We have been witnesses this afternoon of a very curious scene on the Treasury Bench, and I think that some Member of the House should call attention to it. In the first place a subordinate Member of the Government, the Solicitor General, was put up to bless the Bill, and to express a general approval of its clauses; then a representative Member of the Conservative Party, the hon. Member for Peckham, got up, and spoke what I venture to believe is the voice of the majority of that Party. The First Lord of the Treasury comes into the House, and, hearing what his follower is saying, quickly picks up what the mind of his own Party is with reference to the question. He then gets up and takes practically the point of view of the hon. Member for Peckham, immediately throwing over the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General had not spoken for the Government, and the Government are not going to oppose the Bill, because they trim their sails to every wind that blows. The fact is the Government do not like this Bill. During the last six years the Conservative Party have several times voted against proposals brought forward for the amendment of the registration laws; but now, on the eve of the General Election, they have not the courage to say they are opposed to this Bill. The existing registration law of this country is utterly bad. It belongs to a time when a vote was a privilege and not a right, and when it had the effect of keeping people off the register. We ought now to have a system which will enable people to get on the register. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury touched the crux of the question when he referred to the absurd occupation period of two years and six months. No man could have contemplated, when the reform of 1884 took place, that such a state of things would now exist. Both the First Lord of the Treasury and the Solicitor General are against the proposal to shorten the period of occupation necessary for qualification. What is the value of a Registration Amendment Bill unless it will shorten the period of occupation? It is worthless. For the Government to pretend that they are supporting a reform in the Registration Laws when they refuse to support a proposal for shortening the period of occupation is simply ridiculous. Now, Sir, this matter is one in which the constituencies take great interest. I am not far wrong when I say that more than a million of people who should be on the register in England and Wales are kept off it by the present bad and faulty registration system. Let me call the attention of the House to the extreme necessity for this measure for London, where we suffer more in this respect than in any other place. In illustration of this simple fact I may say that last year, by the Tory and Liberal registration agents and associations no fewer than 93,000 names were placed upon the register, and no fewer than 22,000 names—many of the persons being dead—were struck off. The 92,867 names placed on the register by the various agents and associations were left off owing to the carelessness which the existing system makes possible. That, I venture to say, is a state of things which would be impossible if this Bill became law. Then the number of persons in London whose claim to vote is rendered null and void in consequence of their removing from one part of the Metropolis to the other, or because they change their qualification, or for some other reason of the same description, is quite fifty per cent. of the whole electorate. The right hon. Gentleman who moved this Bill has proposed a certain change in the matter of the registration of the old lodger, and I cannot see why he has not made a similar change with regard to the registration of the new lodger. I hope he will consider that point. Another matter to which I desire to call the attention of the House is that, whereas the Bill provides for successive occupation in various districts, it does not provide for what is a still more familiar form of disqualification—namely, change of qualification from occupier to lodger, and vice versa. These, however, are questions which could be dealt with in Committee. What, however, I have risen especially to point out is the absurd action of the Treasury Bench in this matter, and how clear it is that the Solicitor General has been thrown over by the First Lord of the Treasury, whose views on this Bill are represented by the hon. Member for Peckham.

*(5.14.) SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I had no intention whatever of saying a word upon this Bill; but the remarks of the hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) and of the hon. Member for Hoxton (Mr. J. Stuart) have induced me to do so. On the one hand, I should not like it to be supposed that the hon. Member for Peckham represents the general feeling on this side of the House; and, on the other hand, I think the hon. Member for Hoxton has infused into this matter a party element for which there is no justification. The Bill was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) in terms most reasonable and moderate, and that feeling was fully reciprocated by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir E. Clarke). I would remind the House that both political organisations have recognised the difficulties of registration, and appreciate the fact that there are many points capable of amendment. At Birmingham, last year, the Conservative National Union passed a resolution of mine in favour of registration reform, and as the hon. Member for Hoxton imputes to hon. Members on this side a lack of interest in this question, I may point out to him that the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. Bolton) and I have introduced this Session a Bill providing for successive occupation in the case of lodgers, and for otherwise amending the Registration Laws, and that the names of Conservative Members are among others on the back of the Bill. Personally, whatever the Treasury Bench may think generally, I, as an independent Conservative, most heartily approve of the sentiments which have been expressed by the Solicitor General. The time may soon come for us, as it has for many other countries, when we shall have to choose between household suffrage and manhood suffrage, and we, who believe in the principle of household suffrage, are of opinion that it will be best maintained by making its application as inclusive as possible, and so strengthening what is the franchise of citizenship. No one can have any experience of the delays, technicalities, anomalies, and disappointments, due to the want of the powers of amendment conferred by this Bill which exist in the Revising Barristers' Courts—and which tend to create a feeling of disgust in the minds of the voters—without feeling that something should be done in the direction proposed by this Bill to remedy such defects and shortcomings of the law. In my opinion, moreover, the work of registration is badly done by party action, and would be much better done by public officers. The appointment of public officers would not only prevent great delay and inconvenience to voters themselves, but it would terminate a state of things which demands that so much party energy should, as now, be dissipated in the useless and thankless task of registration drudgery. If politicians, instead of devoting the dog days to revision and mere technical details, could spend the time in taking a higher and better part in politics; for instance, in imparting political instruction, much real good would result, and, personally, I do not share the distrust of official County Council and Municipal action which has been expressed. I think, Sir, the principle underlying this Bill is a right one. The third clause is certainly open to criticism, because I still believe in maintaining essentially a citizen franchise. If taxation without representation is tyranny, I think representation without taxation may prove to be tyranny over other people. There are evils to be redressed in connection with the Registration Laws, such as the deprivation of the right to vote in cases of successive occupation both in and outside the same electoral area—with proper precautions for proving identity and preventing personation—and I hope and believe that this side of the House is anxious to help in redressing them, and that they will, therefore, support the Second Reading of this Bill.

*(5.20.) SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I should like to call particular attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. He came into the House for a few moments only, and stated that the Front Bench were at liberty to vote whichever way they liked; but, at the same time, as soon as the Bill goes into Committee, he should do his best to strangle it in some of its most important points. The right hon. Gentleman expressed himself as diametrically opposed to the provisions for shortening the qualifying period, and also, as I understand, to those relating to residence in different electoral districts. Now, it seems to me, judging by the needs of the working-class districts with which I am acquainted, that the most vital points of this Bill are the very ones the right hon. Gentleman has decided against. Under the existing law, if a man goes from one place to another in order to get work that he may keep his wife and family, he loses his right to vote. The Bill now before the House will remove that grievance amongst others, yet that is one of the things the Leader of the House has declared himself opposed to. I cannot understand how the right hon. Gentleman can consent to allow his Party to vote as they like since he has determined to do the Bill all the harm he can when it gets into Committee.

(5.23.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I think it is evident, from the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury, that his followers are going to support this Bill because they know it will not be proceeded with further than the Second Reading this year, and because some of them have stated on public platforms that their Party would bring in a Registration Bill. That is only another specimen of the policy which has been adopted by the Government this Session in connection with various Motions distasteful to them. I am sorry to miss from the Treasury Bench the presence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of whom we have heard a good deal with regard to Registration Bills. As the hon. Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit) has said that they are almost united on the other side as to this Bill, it might be as well that the House should hear a few words from a speech by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this subject of registration. On the same day that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) was pressing the Chancellor of the Exchequer at Hull to go in for a Registration Bill, and the Solicitor General was advocating the same thing at Westminster, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), speaking on this question, was reported in the Times to have said—

“It would mean a new distribution of political power; one more tinkering with the Constitution, and an attempt once more to pick the Constitution to pieces.”

That is the Ministerial view of registration. And I think it just as well, as we are going to a Division, that the country should know that, although a section of the Conservative Party will vote for this Bill, they have not the slightest intention of assisting to pass it into law. The hon. Member for Hoxton (Mr. J. Stuart) has gone into details with regard to London that I should have dwelt upon had I spoken before him. But as I do not wish to waste the time of the House I will refrain from touching on more than one point—namely, the question of successive occupation. London suffers more in this respect than any other city in the Kingdom. In Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow a man may move from one part of the city to the other and claim his vote on the ground of successive occupation; but in London

he cannot move from Southwark to Brixton, or anywhere else in the Metropolis, without running the risk of being off the register two years and five months. As time is getting short I will not say more than that I hope the country will understand that the promise of a Registration Bill from the Government is a very hollow one indeed.

(5.49.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say what will be the course of Business to-morrow and on Friday ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. Gorst, Chatham) : On Thursday it is proposed to take the Indian Councils Bill as first Order, and the next Business will be the Vote on Account. When the Vote on Account is disposed of, the Committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill will be proceeded with, and that Bill is not blocked by the Twelve o'Clock Rule. DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) : Will the right hon. Gentleman say for what period the Vote on Account will be taken—six weeks or two months ?

SIR J. GORST : The different items in the Vote will cover different periods according to the exigencies of Departments ; but, speaking generally, it will be a Vote on Account for two months.

DR. TANNER : We all know what that means.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 26th May, 1892.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

BIRMINGHAM CORPORATION WATER
BILL (by Order.)

CONSIDERATION.

As amended, considered.

*MR. SPEAKER: The new clause standing in the name of the hon. Member for Merionethshire (Mr. Thomas Ellis)—Compensation to yearly tenants—is not in order. It cannot be moved with the Speaker in the Chair.

*(3.5.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I desire to move a new clause to prohibit the use of barbed wire in the fencing the Corporation may erect. I understand from the paper which has been circulated by the Corporation of Birmingham that they do not object to the insertion of such a clause should the House see fit to insert it, and, indeed, in reference to one estate I find that such a clause has been inserted. It appears to me that if it is proposed to have such a provision in reference to one estate, it should be good for all the estates concerned under this Bill. I think there is a general feeling in the country against the use of this barbed wire for fencing; it is cruel to animals and it causes a great deal of unnecessary annoyance. As I understand there is no opposition to the clause, I need not trouble the House further.

New clause—

(Barbed wire.)

“The Corporation shall not use any barbed wire in connection with the erection of any fences or otherwise,” —brought up, and read a first and second time.

Amendment proposed, after the word “erection” to insert the words “or maintenance.”—(Mr. Brunner.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I have to move the new clause in the form in which it appears on the Notice Paper, and my reason is that the common rights involved should be under the control of a representative and independent body. By Clause 46 of the Bill power is given to the Corporation to acquire common land by agreement, which implies that if the Corporation offer sufficient inducement commoners may dispose of their rights, and those rights would then be disposed of without consultation with any independent authority. But I think there should be some independent authority to protect public rights other than the rights of commoners. After all, the importance of these common lands is due to the fact not only that certain individuals enjoy certain rights in the commons, but that the general community have an interest in the commons, and it is the interest of the community we desire to protect, not merely that of individuals. Secondly, the object of my clause is this. By Section 49 of the Bill power is given to the Corporation to make bye-laws regulating sheep washing, the digging of turf, the cutting of ferns, fishing, recreation, and things of that kind. Now, I do not think that unrestricted power should be given to the Corporation to make such bye-laws as they may think proper, subject only to the approval of the Secretary of State, who, of course, will have no local knowledge. An investigation should be held on the spot in accordance with the policy pursued in the Local Government Act passed by the present Government. It is right, I think, that the local County Councils should have some power of intervention in the matter instead of the bye-laws being left entirely to the Birmingham Corporation, whose interest, of course, it will be to make such bye-laws as stringent and restrictive as possible. These bye-laws should be prepared by representatives of the people resident in the district. The Councils will naturally regard the interest of all parties of the ratepayers, as well as of the Birmingham Corporation, the community generally, and the tourists who visit the district. The clause proposes that the bye-laws shall have the final approval of the Board of Agriculture, and so I think they will be fair to all parties.

New Clause—

Page 42, after Clause 49, insert the following clause:—“The common or unenclosed lands (as aforesaid) and the common or commonable rights over such lands shall be subject to the management and control of trustees, to consist of three persons to be appointed by the council of the county of Radnor, two persons to be appointed by the council of the county of Brecon, and one person to be appointed by the council of the county of Cardigan, the persons so appointed being removable by, and vacancies filled by the body who appointed them, such persons to be called ‘The Trustees of Common Lands.’”

The said trustees may, as respects the common or unenclosed lands, as aforesaid, make bye-laws for the prevention of the pollution of the water flowing through and from such land.

The bye-laws may include all or any of the following purposes:—

- (1.) The regulation of the cutting peat or turf for fuel, and the cutting of fern and rushes;
- (2.) The regulation of the exercise of fishing rights by the people of the district and town of Rhayader in the upper reservoirs and streams flowing into the same;
- (3.) The prevention of nuisances and of any act tending to the pollution of the water flowing through the common and unenclosed lands;
- (4.) The regulation of recreation on the said lands, and the prevention of the disturbance of stock growing thereon by dogs and otherwise;
- (5.) All such bye-laws shall be made by the said trustees, subject to the approval of the Corporation and the Board of Agriculture,”

—brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): As Chairman of the Committee I may state to my hon. Friend and the House what was the view taken by the Committee of this matter. The Committee, very reasonably I think, sympathised with the desire of persons in the locality that they should not be absolutely at the mercy of the Corporation of Birmingham with regard to the bye-laws to be made. At the same time, the full extent of these proposals hardly commended itself to the Committee—namely, that the County Councils of the different counties concerned should have a hand in the framing of the bye-laws for the purpose of protecting from any danger of impurity the waterworks of the Corporation. Surely the Corporation are themselves in the main the best judges of what is necessary for this purpose; but in order that local interests might be protected, and to meet local ideas, what the Committee did was to provide that the bye-laws should be subject to the approval of the Board of Agriculture, the central authority to whom is deputed the duty of protecting local interests in these matters. But the Committee also made the suggestion, which was adopted by the promoters of the Bill, that before being submitted for the approval of the Board of Agriculture a copy of the proposed bye-law should be sent to each County Council, in order that the Councils might have the opportunity of making suggestions in regard to it. Accordingly in Clause 49 of the Bill it is provided that the Board of Agriculture shall be the authority to which the bye-laws shall be submitted, provided that a copy of the proposed bye-law shall have been sent to the Clerk of the County Council in each county where the bye-law is intended to operate one month at least before application is made for its confirmation. Thus full opportunity is given to the County Councils to point out where any mistake may have been made, or where there is any unnecessary infringement of the rights of commoners. I may say generally the Committee were most careful to preserve the rights of commoners and of all persons resident in the locality, and I believe the Bill goes much further than any Bill I can remember in the direction of the protection of local rights. I am bound to say also that we found the Corporation most willing to meet our reasonable view in this respect, and I can confidently say that comparing this with any previous Water Bill of a similar character Parliament has had to deal with, far greater care has been taken to protect local rights, and I am not aware of any right that has not been fully preserved, so far as it is possible to preserve it, under the provisions of this Bill. If this is not so in any case, then it is contrary to the intention of the Committee. With regard to these bye-laws, there was a statement expressed that the casual wayfarer would have his feelings less disturbed if he found that the regulations were signed by the local County Council rather than by the official of the Corporation, but I do not think there is much in that sentimental view so long as substantially the people of the locality have ample power to make their voices heard and opportunity to make their views prevail. They have this under the Bill, with the protection of the approval of the Board of Agriculture, and I really do not think it is necessary to insert this clause.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I am quite ready to recognise that in the later stages the Corporation did, under pressure, consent to make considerable changes in their Bill, but I venture to say the clause as it stands will not serve the purpose the Committee desired to attain. In the original Bill the Corporation desired the power of buying up in toto all rights over 32,000 acres of common land, but in Committee a change was made by which the commons are still to remain in their present condition and under the present tenure, so that peasants and tenant farmers may still retain their common rights over these 32,000 acres of common. There is at present no authority whatever to take care of this fundamental question of the purity of the water. It is for securing the purity of the water that, according to Clause 49, these bye-laws are to be framed. But, according to the provisions and intentions of the Committee, these common rights are to remain as they are under the Corporation of Birmingham, and it is only by consent under Clause 46 that common rights are to be bought up. Now, in the meantime, and before the Municipality of Birmingham acquires the common right over these 32,000 acres of gathering ground for their water supply, there will be no authority to look after the interests of the commoners. Now I venture to think that even in the interest of the purity of the water you should by this Act create some body as trustees to look after these matters. It is much more than a sentimental question; it is a question of safeguarding the rights of commoners and of the inhabitants of the district. It is impossible for the Municipality of Birmingham, even with very good intentions, to know of all the interests in the case, and I think the least that should be done is that some responsible representatives of the Local Authority should have the initiative in the making of the bye-laws for the general management of the district. I think in the interest of the purity of the water, and until the common rights are bought up—if they ever are bought up, which I hope they may not be, and even then—that the Local Authority in the interest of the population of the district should have a voice in the making of these bye-laws. I trust that the Chairman of the Committee and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) will see that not alone in the interest of the locality, but in the interest of the purity of the water supply the clause proposed by my hon. Friend is well worthy of consideration.

(3.20.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): If the intention is to give to these trustees authority to make bye-laws for the land not acquired by the Corporation, that is not the meaning of the clause. The new clause simply applies to "the common or unenclosed lands ('as aforesaid')"—that is, those lands which have been acquired by the Corporation. If, therefore, the object is to regulate the use of the land not bought by the Corporation the clause entirely fails to do it. I am bound to say, as a member of the Committee, that it is not correct to say that the Corporation of Birmingham yielded under pressure to the changes in their Bill, because from the first, and in the opening speech of their counsel, they expressed their desire not to acquire greater powers than were absolutely necessary for the main purpose of the Bill and the security of the purity of the water. I do not pretend to a very large experience in respect to these Water Bills, but I am bound to say I hardly ever knew the promoters of a Bill more anxious to limit their powers to the necessities of their object and to meet the wishes of the Committee and the petitioners than the Birmingham Corporation were in this instance. With regard to what the hon. Member has said as to the rights of the public over these commons, I would observe that there is no such thing as the right of the public over common lands; they belong to the lord of the manor and the commoners; the public have no right. ("Oh, oh!") That is so; the rights are those of private ownership, and except on the Queen's highway the public have no rights whatever. They may have an easement; they may have a right of way; but as to a general right to wander over such unenclosed lands, it has no existence, and I believe it is not known to the English law. In this Bill we have rather extended than diminished any rights of the public.

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I do not think any of the Members who represent the Principality desire to deny the willingness of the Corporation of Birmingham to meet the natural necessities of the case, and to deal in a fair spirit with the demands made by the people of the locality; but, of course, this is a Bill of such an unusual character as to remove it altogether from the category of ordinary Water Bills, and it is therefore our duty to look more closely into details than might be necessary in other cases. While we recognise to the full the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) as to the desire to protect the interests of the people of the locality, we do not feel that that has been secured under the Bill. It will be observed that a copy of the bye-law is to be sent to the clerk of the County Council; but there the matter stops, and there is no power given to the County Council to take any action under the Bill. The difficulty would be met if the Council had some operative power conferred upon it. If the County Council had the power to call upon the Board of Agriculture to institute a local inquiry that would be something. I hope it is not too late to adopt some proposal in the direction of the clause.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): On behalf of the Corporation Birmingham I recognise the friendly spirit in which this matter has been dealt with by hon. Members. I am very glad to see there is no idea of antagonism to the Corporation, the intention being to protect the interests of the inhabitants as well as of the Corporation. I can confirm what has been said by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Sydney Gedge), that from the first the Corporation frankly said that their only desire was to obtain such rights as were necessary for their purpose to secure the purity of the water. If it were possible to arrange this without the acquisition of the freehold by the Corporation I should have been delighted to have avoided what I feel is an enormous responsibility. Now, the whole question has been considered by the Committee from this point of view, and the Committee have imposed on the Corporation certain changes in the Bill intended to safeguard local interests. Of course, if the Corporation had regarded the matter from a different point of view, though they might not have been able to resist the decision of the Committee, they might have accepted the conditions with the intention of restoring the Bill to its first shape during the progress of the Bill in another place. But the Corporation had no such intention; they accepted all the alterations which, after a full hearing, were suggested by the Committee, and they have no intention to endeavour to obtain any alteration of the concessions made. With regard to this, which is, after all, a minor point, I need only point out to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway that the Corporation are investing an enormous sum of money in this undertaking, and I am bound to say, speaking as one very much interested in the prosperity of Birmingham, that it is a painful necessity; that nothing less than the apprehension of a water famine would induce us to undertake such an enormous responsibility. But as we are about to expend six millions of money we must take care that we secure the purity of the water we supply. To that purpose are these clauses directed, and only to secure that do we in any way desire to interfere with the use of the commons; and in making these bye-laws, to insure that consideration shall be given to local wishes, it is provided that the bye-laws shall be submitted for the approval of the Board of Agriculture. The suggestion has just been thrown out that the Board of Agriculture should hold a local inquiry, if requested to do so by any of the County Councils interested, before confirming a bye-law prepared by the Corporation. This appears to me a most reasonable proposal; and in principle I shall be glad on the part of the Corporation to accept it. Of course, there is a difficulty in introducing just the right words at a moment's notice; and perhaps the hon. Member will now withdraw the clause, on the pledge given, that the representatives of the Corporation will consult with hon. Members below the Gangway with the view to the insertion, in another place, of an Amendment which will provide that a local inquiry shall be held when such, in the opinion of the Local Council, appears to be necessary.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Upon that understanding I will, with the permission of the House, withdraw this clause.

Motion, and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. MORTON: I have now to ask the House to adopt the Amendment, notice of which I have given to Clause 5—namely, to add the words—

“As are within the limits of deviation, and required for the reservoirs and works by this Act authorised.”

I am aware of the difficulty of inducing the House to make an alteration of this kind after a Committee has considered the Bill; but, however, an addition has been made at this stage showing that at any rate we are justified in giving consideration to these matters even now. As I understand the matter, the Corporation propose to take many thousands of acres more than they really require for their works; and I do not see why this should be allowed in this particular case, and I understand it is not usually allowed. I understand that when a railway company or other promoters are given powers to acquire land, then any surplus land left, after completion of the works, is sold within a certain time, or else the promoters lose that land altogether. It appears to me there is no sufficient reason why this Corporation should take large quantities of land they really do not require for the purposes of these works in any way whatever, and probably against the interests of the people of Wales. I am told, in the papers which have been circulated by the promoters, that this re-opens the large question with regard to the acquisition of land which has been considered by the Committee, and I am told also that in another clause they deal with this matter to some extent by proposing to let the land. But this does not appear to me enough. I quite agree that Birmingham ought to be allowed to get a good supply of water, although I am not certain that they ought not to be compelled to pay the Welsh people for taking this water from Wales, or, at any rate, to make compensation in some form, because the proposal includes something more than supplying water to Birmingham. The Corporation propose to supply water to other districts, so that to some extent it has the appearance of a gigantic speculation, upon which the Corporation are embarking with the money of the ratepayers. But I do not think they ought to speculate with the ratepayers' money, and, therefore, I propose to limit these powers of acquisition to land actually required for the authorised works. Perhaps we may have some explanation why this large quantity of land is to be taken, and, meantime, I move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 5, after the word “reference,” to insert the words “as are within the limits of deviation, and required for the reservoirs and works by this Act authorised.”—(Mr. Morton.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: To carry such a proposal would be absolutely fatal to the Bill. As the hon. Gentleman is probably aware, the whole matter was discussed on the Debate on the Second Reading, and it was very carefully gone into by the Committee. I believe I have the authority of the Chairman of the Committee to say that the Committee had no hesitation in agreeing to the contention of the Corporation that it would be impossible to successfully conduct this great scheme without the Corporation having full control over the drainage area.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I must correct one word used by my right hon. Friend. He says the Committee had no hesitation in accepting the view of the Corporation ; but the fact is, we had in one sense a great deal of hesitation ; that is to say, on the first blush—I speak for myself particularly—I was very much opposed to this acquisition of land. But the more the matter was examined the more did the necessity for this appear. The land, or a vast extent of it, is unoccupied ; it is not altogether waste land—it is pasture land ; and the interests affected are comparatively few. If we had seen any way of avoiding this large acquisition of land, we should have been glad to adopt it ; and we were fortunately able to suggest, on the initiative of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Sydney Gedge), a proposal to the Corporation that when the value of the land had been ascertained—purchased as it were—that then it should be given back on a 999 years' lease to those to whom it belonged if they chose to exercise their right. That seemed to us to meet the case, and to save the interests of those concerned, while securing to the Corporation that control which it was forced upon us day after day it was necessary the Corporation should have. That having been secured, I think the Committee at that stage, and when we came to our Report, had no hesitation or difference of opinion.

*MR. MORTON : Under the circumstances I will, with the permission of the House, withdraw my proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(3.40.) MR. MORTON : My next point refers to the same matter—it has relation to the rent to be charged for these lands we have been speaking about, and which are to be let on 999 years' leases. This rent is to be, according to the Bill, three per cent. on the cost of the land, including, of course, all the costs in connection with the taking of the land and the minerals under the surface. But in the conditions of the leases no mineral rights will be disposed of, so that the Corporation will not be re-letting all that they have purchased. It has occurred to myself and others that, considering the reservations made by the Corporation, two and a half per cent. would be sufficient to cover the actual cost of that which is re-let. I see that the promoters in their statement say that they will have to borrow the purchase-money at three per cent., and, therefore they ought to get three per cent. on the land purchased with the money. But as I have pointed out, they do not re-let all that they purchase, and should therefore make some allowance, which I think may fairly be calculated as the difference between three and two and a half per cent. •

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 16, to leave out the word “ three,” and insert the words “ two and one-half.”—(Mr. Morton.)

Question proposed, “ That the word ‘ three ’ stand part of the Bill.”

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN : The hon. Member has very frankly said, in moving this Amendment, that it has reference to the same subject as his last Amendment ; and as he was good enough to withdraw the last, so, to be consistent, I hope he will withdraw this also. I am sure he will be the more inclined to do so, for I hardly think he does justice to his own financial reputation. Let me point out to him the effect of the Amendment. The suggestion is that the Corporation of Birmingham, which will have to borrow the money at, I am sorry to say, three per cent., or perhaps a little more, shall then invest the money at two and a half per cent. Now, if they were to adopt such a financial policy as that, I think the Corporation would start on the road to the Bankruptcy Court.

*MR. MORTON : That is not my proposal.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : Further, it is to be observed that on the terms of compulsory purchase and conditions attached the owners will be at a great advantage in selling their land, and they are not compelled to take leases. I think the hon. Member must see his proposal is not a reasonable one.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain

*MR. MORTON: If I may be allowed to explain, I would point out again that, though the Corporation may have to borrow at three per cent., they do not re-let all they purchase; they reserve all mineral rights.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: The hon. Member is, I think, mistaken. If he will read the clause he will see that the three per cent. is not on the full purchase-money, but on such sum less the value of minerals, &c. Surely the hon. Member will not press his proposal?

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. MORTON: My next Amendment refers to the same matter, but to a different class of tenant. The Corporation are to let farms now occupied by annual tenants or by those who have short leases on leases of twenty-one years, rent and conditions to be arranged. Now, it occurs to me that if the Corporation are willing to let the land for a term of twenty-one years, then at the expiration of that term I do not see why the tenant, if he desire to do so, should not be allowed to take a fresh lease. I have not heard why a tenant should be turned out at the end of twenty-one years any more than at the end of two or three years. I think if the tenant has this right of protection for twenty-one years he has an equal right to that protection in perpetuity.

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 18, after the word "years," to insert the words "and shall renew the same from time to time for further periods of twenty-one years if demanded."—(Mr. Morton.)

(3.45.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am very sorry my hon. Friend, who takes such an interest in this question, did not attend some of the proceedings of our Committee upstairs, when he would have seen how careful we were to protect the interest of these very tenants. Apart from the usual and ordinary proceedings in Committee on a Private Bill, this Hybrid Committee called for independent testimony from the district without the intervention of counsel, and we had the account from themselves of some six, eight, or ten farmers who were to be affected under the clauses of this Bill, and in the result the Corporation agreed to meet the case by this provision of twenty-one years' leases. We were told that these tenants are annual tenants at present with no leases whatever and no fixity of tenure at all, but that they are well treated by their landlord and hold their farms at a very fair rent. They not unnaturally had a fear that this dreadful Corporation, coming in with mercantile ideas, might treat them in a severely commercial manner, and make their fate much worse than it had been. I think, having gone the extreme length of offering to a man who has no lease at all, and is absolutely uncertain as to his position, a twenty-one years' lease at the admittedly very moderate rent now paid, we have done as much as Corporation, Committee, or Parliament can be expected to do.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I do not know whether my hon. Friend intends to press this Amendment, but I take the opportunity to say that the right hon. Gentleman has rather exaggerated the generosity of the Birmingham Corporation in this matter. I do not doubt that the Corporation will make liberal compensation to the landowners, but I am certain that this treatment of the tenants is the very least which in equity should be given. It is quite true, and the truth is a scandal, that these tenants are in the position of being liable to be turned from their holdings at six or twelve months' notice; and it seems to me that to give them the security of a tenure for twenty-one years is the very least that should be given. I hope, even if the Amendment is not accepted in its present form, that, at any rate, in another place the Corporation of Birmingham will, in the case of land not required for the works, give present tenants the first choice in the renewal of leases; and, further, I make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, who has charge of this Bill, that in another place some consideration, some regard, shall be had to those tenants who actually will, under this Bill, be turned from their homes and sent adrift in the world. I find that it is, technically, not possible for me to move the clause with which I intended to deal with these cases; but I ask the right hon. Gentleman to say that liberal compensation shall be given to tenants who are to be turned from their homes after occupation extending over thirty, forty, and even in some cases more than seventy, years. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give some undertaking on these points—that, in cases where farms are not wanted, the present tenants shall have first choice of renewals of leases; and that where tenants are actually turned out liberal compensation shall be given them.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I can only pledge the Corporation to this: that they will undoubtedly be most happy to give the fullest consideration to any suggestion made by the hon. Member in the interval between now and the promotion of the Bill in another place. In regard to these particular cases concerned in the Amendment now before us, the tenants were, as the Chairman has said, fully heard, and I think I am justified in saying that when they understood what the Committee proposed to do for them, they went away absolutely and perfectly satisfied. At the same time, if there is any chink, any hole, any lapse in the proposal considered in Committee to which my hon. Friend will call attention, I can assure him that the fullest consideration shall be given to it by the Corporation.

MR. MORTON: As I understand the matter will be re-considered, I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: But do not let me be misunderstood. The proposal now is for perpetual renewal of leases, and this the Corporation must undoubtedly refuse.

MR. MORTON: I understand that consideration shall be given to the position of these tenants in consultation with my hon. Friend, and I will not press the matter further.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. ELLIS: Clause 53 has been amended in deference to opinions expressed in the House, and I confess that even as it is, it is not an admission of the rights of the people of the locality. But I would point out to the Chairman of the Committee, in reference to what he has said as to the desire of the Committee to protect the rights of the locality, that as the clause stands at present there is no real guarantee that the people in the district will have the rights and privileges referred to in the Bill secured to them. I venture to remind him of the experiences in regard to the Corporation of Liverpool in a similar matter. The clause has reference to the rights of fishing. Now, I am not a lawyer, and I am not quite certain whether there are actual rights of fishing to be proved by Statute Law, but this at any rate is certain: that from time immemorial the inhabitants of the district and the town of Rhayder have, unmolested, enjoyed the rights and privileges of fishing in all the streams in this tract of 34,000 acres of common land. My present Amendment is to insert after "rights," the words "and privileges," and this followed by a consequential Amendment to line 26 adding the words "hitherto enjoyed," so that there may be no doubt as to the rights and privileges hitherto enjoyed by the inhabitants and the town of Rhayader. There is, I believe, no record of an inhabitant ever having been molested by a landowner in the exercise of this privilege. It is said in this statement issued by the promoters that it is only a right enjoyed on sufferance; but whether it is or not it is a very substantial right or privilege; it is of great benefit to the people of the locality, and its abrogation will give rise to much expression of feeling. It is in order that there may not be that annoyance and litigation which have arisen in connection with the Liverpool Corporation reservoirs that I propose this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 44, line 23, after the word "rights," to insert the words "and privileges."—(Mr. T. Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and privileges,' be there inserted."

(3.55.) MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I think the Committee, so far as I can speak for them, were entirely in agreement with my hon. Friend, or in substantial agreement with him. We had a good deal of evidence on the point; and as to the right or privilege, whichever it may be called, of the people of the district of Rhayader and outside the particular water area, to fishing in the waters there, the Committee considered the question of inserting the words "and privileges," and we determined not to do so, our reason being that we did not wish by the Bill to create any new rights. We only wished to maintain and not to interfere with existing rights. Although there is this very free privilege of fishing, yet it has the nature of a privilege, and it was not for us to convert that into what my hon. Friend speaks of as a statutory right. As we understood, it was only reasonable to expect that the Corporation would be perfectly willing that people should continue to fish just as they have fished. I do not know that a man fishing on the banks of a stream will make any difference in the purity of the water supply. The view of the Committee was that they should not assent to the insertion of the somewhat vague expression "privileges." But I believe that all that is wanted by my hon. Friend is secured by the clause, and I would advise the House not to accede to the proposal to insert these words, which I may say was not very seriously put before the Committee.

MR. STUART RENDEL: I can assure my right hon. Friend that this is regarded in the locality as a very serious question. The privilege of fishing has, as my hon. Friend has said, been exercised in the district from time immemorial, and it is highly valued. This privilege is in danger of destruction under the Bill. We are not seeking to create anything new; we simply wish to maintain what admittedly exists. It may perhaps seem an unimportant detail to some hon. Members, but it really is an important matter in the district. I hope the promoters will agree to make this concession to local feeling, and surely it is undesirable to leave the matter open to vexatious litigation. I think we ought to press this Amendment.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): May I suggest to my hon. Friend that the words he proposes do not add anything in substance or force to the clause as it stands? The clause as it stands does not provide for what my hon. Friends want, nor does it give any protection to the class to whom they allude. The clause should read that the Birmingham Corporation shall not interfere with any person fishing in the district, except to prevent the pollution of the streams. The clause as it now stands in no way confers any right, and if the addition suggested by my hon. Friends is made, it will even then confer no right. They ought to secure that when the Birmingham Corporation take any proceedings for trespass, the matter should be investigated in some local Court, so that these Welshmen may not be brought up to London to have the fishing rights tested. In twenty years' time there will be a Corporation in Birmingham that know not Joseph, and they will not know the extent to which the right hon. Gentleman has pledged his word in this House. This Bill is to be passed for all time, and the Corporation might in the future take a very different view of their rights from that which is now expressed.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): The right hon. Gentleman who has charge of this Bill stated that he did not wish to confer any new rights. That may be so, but I think he also admitted that it was intended to commute the existing practice so far as it interfered with the object of the Birmingham Corporation. The existing practice is that the inhabitants have been in the habit of fishing in these rivers, but unfortunately they have no right of fishing. A right of fishing is not acquired by long usage like a right of way, and a right of fishing could never be gained in private waters. But despite that fact fishing has been practised without interruption from time immemorial, and the landlords never would have interfered with these rights, although they may not be legal rights. What we want is that this practice shall run no greater risk of being interfered with by the Birmingham Corporation than by the landlords. The Committee have to a certain extent recognised this fact in giving leases to the tenants, and I think a similar protection ought to be afforded in this matter. I cordially agree with the hon.

Member for North Longford that different words should be introduced in this clause, because the word "privileges" does not mean legal privileges, and will confer no real privileges in this matter. I hope the right hon. Gentleman who is in charge of this Bill will give some undertaking that will satisfy us that this practice, although a practice that is not compassed by law, shall not be interfered with in the future; and moreover that the Birmingham Corporation shall not have the power to interfere with those rights.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I do not know who is responsible for the drafting of this clause, but it seems to me to be a very onerous one so far as the tenants are concerned. It throws upon them the onus of proving that they have the absolute right of fishing in these waters. In the last line of the clause you have the words, "without interruption by the Corporation"; but to secure that freedom from interruption the tenant must prove that he has the absolute right to the fishing. This right does not exist, but it has been a custom from time immemorial, and we desire that these people should remain undisturbed, and that a right shall be given to them by Parliament to continue the practice of fishing in these waters. I hardly think the alteration proposed will meet the circumstances of the case; and I think it would be much better if the clause were made to read—

"The Corporation shall not interfere with any person fishing or cutting fern or turbary unless for the purpose of preventing pollution, or subject to the bye-laws authorised by this Act."

If the clause were passed in some such form as that anyone could claim the right or privilege of fishing, and it could be established in a Court of Law. The right should be given to the tenants to go on that land and fish in these waters as they have been in the habit of doing. The clause should not be agreed to as it stands, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) will be willing to communicate with those who are interested on behalf of the tenants, and see if a clause cannot be drawn up to meet the case.

Mr. Bryn Roberts

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I should like to point out that the Bill was drafted by the Corporation of Birmingham; that it was submitted to the Board of Agriculture, and was the subject of a local inquiry. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow some alteration to be made, so that the Bill may go to the House of Lords in proper form.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: An appeal has been made to me, but I thought that the whole of the facts and reasons had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). But the wishes of hon. Gentlemen seem to have changed whilst this matter has been before the House. What the Amendment asks for is not a matter of very great importance. It would not do the hon. Member much good and it would not do us much harm, and if it will shorten this discussion, and the hon. Member will meet me on the matter which proposes to give these gentlemen the right of fishing in the river—that provision would be absolutely impossible, because it would take away from the Corporation the control of the water—but if he will meet me on that I will meet him on this. Now, the question has been widened by the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), who has taken the Welsh Members under his charge, and constituted himself their voluntary legal adviser. He proposes to transform some doubtful privileges into an absolute and inalienable right. As I understand the question, the position which has been taken by the Committee was that they would go to the full extent of the limits of their power in order strictly to reserve any right or privilege that could be shown to exist; but, on the other hand, they thought they would be going beyond their powers if they created any new rights. And, if the hon. Member asks that a new right should be created for the first time at the expense of the Corporation, I cannot agree to it.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I think I understand that the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) told the House that while the Birmingham Corporation wanted the Welsh water, they did not want to take the Welshman's fish. As one of those who think that the right of fishing, which the inhabitants have exercised for years, ought not to be interfered with, and understanding the right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill (Mr. J. Chamberlain) to say that Birmingham wanted nothing but the pure water, I cannot see why he should not be satisfied with full power to keep the water pure by bye-laws. I hope the hon. Member will press this Amendment to a Division.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I do not think this is a matter that is worth contending about. The clause says :—

"All rights of fishing in the rivers Elan and Claerwen and their tributaries flowing through the Manor of Grange and the Manor of Builth above the upper end of the upper reservoirs and in the lakes adjacent thereto by the inhabitants of the district and the town of Rhayader and all rights of turbary and of cutting fern and rushes over such commonable land shall be preserved to the said inhabitants as heretofore and without interruption by the Corporation, subject nevertheless to the bye-laws authorized by this Act."

The Committee wished to protect to the full any existing rights, but it is not our business to create new rights or to alter the law so as to make into right what is now only custom.

MR. ABEL THOMAS (Carmarthen, E.) : It seems to me that this clause professes to give what it really does not give. There are no rights of fishing in these waters, and the clause only concedes the right in the future to those who possess it now. I understood that the Corporation was willing to concede this, and it seems to me that the proposition of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) will give us just what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) says he is anxious that the Welsh people should have. It cannot do the Birmingham people any harm, because what they want is only the clear and undiluted water, and the suggestion of the hon. Member for North Longford would exactly meet that. The Welsh people are not going to be trapped into the belief that this clause gives them rights, when, as a matter of fact, it does no such thing. We ought to have these rights, and I think the Corporation of Birmingham ought to meet the Welsh people in the matter.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wendesbury) : I have the greatest sympathy with the Welsh Members, but I must say that the proposal of the hon. Member for North Longford amounts really to a new clause to protect these fishing rights. I think I can say on behalf of the Committee that this question was most fully and elaborately considered by them. They called before them witnesses able to speak with even more authority than my hon. Friends who are not perfectly acquainted with the localities, and the decision the Committee came to was one which seemed to have gone to the extreme limit in protecting any fishing rights which exist.

MR. GEDGE (Stockport) : I would suggest that it is a pity to waste ten or fifteen minutes in a Division on this point. I think the right hon. Gentleman might very well agree to this Amendment, which after all makes no legal difference, and let us come to the third of these Amendments, which covers the point we are now discussing.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.) : It seems to me that we cannot deal with the question properly on this Amendment, and I think we had better come as soon as we can to the Amendment which raises the question. My own impression is that when we come to look practically at this question we shall find that the only way to deal with it is to appoint a Board of Conservancy for the whole of the district, and that these fishing rights shall be vested in this Board.

Question put.

(4.20.) The House divided :—Ayes 126 ; Noes 171.—(Div. List, No. 144.)

On Motion of Mr. THOMAS ELLIS, the following Amendment was agreed to :—Clause 53, page 44, line 26, after "thereto," to insert "hitherto enjoyed."

MR. THOMAS ELLIS : I beg to move the insertion after "Act," in page 44, line 30, of the words which stand in my name. The purpose of my Amendment is to create in the reconstvoirs in the common land the right of fishing for the people who live in the town of Rhayader. I understand from the expressions which have fallen from the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), and from a Paper which was circulated among Members this morning, that two great objections are taken to this Amendment. The first is, that it creates a new right; the second, that it does not safeguard the purity of the water in the reservoirs. In regard to the first objection, this is not the only new right created, or proposed, to be created, by the Bill; for after the passing of the Bill Birmingham obtains a property in the heart of Mid-Wales which will have a value for them in a few years of from three-quarters to one and a half millions. That is creating a new right and property which few Acts of Parliament have created for any Municipality. What we ask for is a quid pro quo for the people in this district, and I think it is a fair claim. By the preceding clause the Corporation admits that the people who live in this district have had, and should have, safeguarded to them in the future the right of fishing in the streams and lakes within the area of the common land. In this Amendment I ask for no right of fishing in reservoirs which will be made on land which will become the private property of the Corporation. They propose ultimately to make six or seven reservoirs, two or three of which will be in the area of the common land, and in these reservoirs, on common land created by the streams running through common land, where the people have hitherto had the right of fishing, I ask the House to vote that they should continue to have the right of fishing, and so give the people a simple and small quid pro quo for the loss they sustain by the passing of the Bill. I do not think the second objection will hold water; for by the preceding clause the House gives power to the people of the district to fish along the Elan and Claerwen for many miles in the water which will fill the reservoirs. This fishing will be safeguarded by bye-laws to secure the purity of the water in the streams, and surely the same bye-laws will efficiently safeguard the purity of the water in the reservoirs.

Mr. Thomas Ellis

I would also venture to appeal to the House on the ground of experience. In the Great Vyrnwy lake in Montgomeryshire, made by the Corporation of Liverpool, fishing with rod and line is granted by the Corporation to gentlemen from Liverpool, but is not given to any of the inhabitants of the district who had been fishing for years in the valley now submerged, and yet they would no more pollute the water than the gentlemen from Liverpool. Therefore, from the point of view of a simple quid pro quo, and from the point of view of the experience in connection with the Vyrnwy Lake, and from the fact that no pollution could take place if the bye-laws were carried out, I appeal to the House to give these people the right of fishing with rod and line in those two or three reservoirs subject to the bye-laws to be made by the Corporation.

Amendment proposed,

Clause 53, page 44, line 30, after "Act," insert "And whereas some portion of the commonable lands and the streams running through the same will be acquired for reservoirs, it is hereby provided that, in lieu of the rights and privileges of fishing in the streams so acquired, the inhabitants of the district and of the Town of Rhayader shall have and enjoy free right of fishing with rod and line on the banks of the upper reservoirs on the Elan and Claerwen, subject to the bye-laws authorised by this Act."—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

(4.40.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am sorry that I cannot agree to this Amendment, as it would seriously interfere with the rights of the Corporation of Birmingham. The hon. Member says it is a quid pro quo for something the people are expected to give up. They are expected to give up not the right, but the privilege or practice they have enjoyed on sufferance in so much of these small streams as will be needed for the purposes of the formation of the reservoir. That privilege is an almost infinitesimal one. There is no talk of taking away any right they have enjoyed generally, but only from that portion which will be required for the reservoir. Anybody who knows anything about these Welsh streams knows that the fish in them are extremely small, though they give very good sport, as I know by experience.

But if you are to substitute for these streams—where the fish are only two or three inches long—a reservoir in which pond trout of good size will be cultivated, the fishing will be a privilege which will be tremendously prized; and if the Corporation were bound to create a new right and let anybody who pleased go and fish in the reservoir, they would be establishing an interest in their property which would do them the greatest possible injury. I think we have sufficiently safeguarded the fishing by reserving all the rights and interests in the streams, and it is a little too much to ask that everybody should have a free right to enter on the works of the Corporation for fishing purposes.

(4.43.) MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.): The right hon. Gentleman takes a view of this matter which the case hardly warrants him in doing. May I venture to give the right hon. Gentleman a little piece of advice? He is one of the great pillars of law and order; and I would recommend him to grant this right to the people, for the sole reason that if he does not grant it they are extremely likely to take it themselves. The gentlemen in the neighbourhood are known to be extremely devoted to the sportsman-like art of fishing—not always, I am afraid, with rod and line—and I think, in the interests of law and order, I would recommend him to consider the question and accept the Amendment. I will not be responsible for the evils which may arise if he does not accept the Amendment.

(4.45.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Will the right hon. Gentleman not consent to a provision preventing a gate or trap being placed at the entrance to the reservoir, which would let the fish from the stream get into the reservoir, but would prevent them getting back into the streams?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is an entirely different matter, and I shall be very glad to consider the suggestion of the hon. Member.

(4.47.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I voted with the Welsh Members, but as I cannot sacrifice common-sense on the altar of friendship, I cannot vote for this Amendment. The reservoirs would be made at the expense of Birmingham; and if there should be any fish in them worth catching, they would be put there by the Corporation, and there is no doubt the Corporation will stock the reservoirs with trout. The Amendment proposes that the inhabitants should go along the banks of the reservoirs for fishing purposes, but anybody knows that few fish would be caught that way; it is necessary to go out in a boat, and that would be an invasion of the rights of the owners which I cannot support. There is one point I should like to refer to. When the reservoirs are stocked with trout no gate or trap would prevent the fish getting up the streams when a flood came, and I would suggest to my Welsh friends that they will get their compensation in that way. I do not quite agree that the trout in the Welsh streams are so small as suggested by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. If they are, I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman went, even for once in his life, after such small fry. It is very certain that the larger fish from the reservoirs will get up the streams, and the compensation of the people in the district will be that they will get a better class of fish.

(4.50.) MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): I wish to remove any misapprehension which the House may be under in consequence of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. I have fished in both these streams, and, instead of fish only two or three inches long, I have taken many fish over a pound in weight.

(4.51.) THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, Ormskirk): I can give the House some information on an analogous case. The Corporation of Liverpool impounded the head waters of the Vrnwy River, of course disturbing the fishing rights, and they reserved full control of the fishing rights on the lake so formed. They have stocked the lake, and have let the fishing under very strict supervision so that there may be no injury to the water. What was accorded to Liverpool ought to be accorded to Birmingham.

Question put.

(4.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 102; Noes 208.—(Div. List, No. 145.)

Bill to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

COLOUR SERGEANT FINN'S PENSION.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he will explain why Colour Sergeant Finn, of the 1st Volunteer Battalion, Cheshire Regiment, was discharged with a pension of sergeant instead of one of colour sergeant, after twenty-six years' service, in view of the facts that it is usual in such cases to give a colour sergeant's pension, and that Sergeant Wallace of the same battalion received a colour sergeant's pension?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The case of pensioner Finn has been referred back to the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital for re-consideration, with the view to the amendment of the pension.

THE WRECK ON BRIGG'S REEF.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the lifeboat authorities at Groomsport, as well as the coxswain and crew of the lifeboat, are of opinion that the wreck of the iron ss. Emily, wrecked in 1889 off Groomsport, would be a source of great danger to the lifeboat, especially at night, were the services of the crew required to assist a vessel on Brigg's Reef; and whether, as the conical buoy placed by the Commissioners of Irish Lights to mark this wreck is useless as a warning at night, and the cost of clearing away the wreck would be small, he will give directions for its removal forthwith?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I must refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave last week on the 16th instant to the hon. Baronet the Member for East Norfolk (Sir E. Birkbeck). I have no power to give any direction with respect to the wreck of the Emily, except upon a recommendation from the Commissioners of Irish Lights, and no such recommendation has been made to me.

COLONEL WARING: Arising out of the right hon. Gentleman's answer, I beg to ask whether he is aware that his officer who made the inspection, or who ever supplied him with the information, ever went near the place; and also whether it is a fact that another steamer has since been wrecked upon the same spot?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The officer who made the inspection is not my officer, but the officer of the Commissioners of Irish Lights, and I know nothing about the later wreck to which the hon. Gentleman refers. I would really advise the hon. Gentleman to communicate with the Commissioners of Irish Lights on the subject.

COLONEL WARING: Will the right hon. Gentleman with his experience of Ireland explain how it is possible to overcome the vis inertia of these officers?

BRITISH TRADE WITH BRAZIL.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether there would be any objection to state to the House the present state of the negotiations with Brazil as regards the preferential treatment accorded to the United States, and with the United States as regards the preferential treatment accorded to Brazil?

SIR F. MAPPIN (York, W.R., Hallamshire) had notice of the following question: To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that, in consequence of a Treaty, ratified in April, 1891, between the respective Governments of the United States of America and Brazil, goods from the former country are admitted into the latter country duty free, while the same description of English goods are subject to a duty varying from fifteen to twenty-five per cent.; and whether any steps are being taken by the English Government to place the manufactures of this country upon the same favourable footing?

for Hallamshire will permit me at the same time to answer his question. On the 19th February I answered a question of a similar character put by the hon. Member for North Manchester. I then informed him that communications had been made to the Government of Brazil, but that that Government had not been willing to enter into negotiations for a Commercial Treaty with this country; and I have nothing to add to that answer. With regard to the last sentence of the hon. Baronet's question, which only appeared on the Paper this morning, I have to say that no preferential treatment is being accorded by the United States to Brazil. No differential treatment is accorded to British goods as compared with Brazilian, and consequently no negotiations have been entered into on that subject.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: Do I understand that Brazil is accorded no preferential treatment by the United States?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The position of the matter is this: that Brazil gives preferential treatment to the United States as compared with goods which go from this country to Brazil; and the United States gives no preferential treatment to Brazil as compared with goods that go from this country to the United States.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any applications have been made by the Railway Companies to postpone further the operation of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888; and whether, before taking into consideration such application, the Board of Trade will give the traders an opportunity of stating their case in opposition to such postponement?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have received an application to postpone the operation of the London and South-Western Railway Rates Provisional Order Act until the 1st January next, at which time the schedules in the Provisional Orders now before Parliament will come into operation, and I have reason to believe that similar applications are likely to be made in the case of the other Railway Companies whose schedules were settled last year. It seems to me prima facie desirable, for many reasons, that all the schedules should come into operation at the same time. But I shall be happy to receive and consider any representations which may be made to me on behalf of the traders against such a course.

POLITICAL ECONOMY IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the speech delivered by Lord Dufferin at the annual dinner of the British Chamber of Commerce in Paris, wherein His Excellency is reported to have said—

"In modern times a very proper prominence is given in entrance examinations to political and economic subjects. Every year the Secretaries of all our Embassies are required to produce an elaborate Commercial Report, a duty which, as I have been able to judge, is carried out with zeal and diligence. Every week in Foreign Embassies our attention is drawn by the Foreign Office to questions affecting English trade with other countries"; and whether, in view of this statement by Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, the Government will consider the desirability of re-introducing Political Economy—which they have expunged from the list of compulsory subjects—as one of the necessary subjects for the entrance examination for the Diplomatic Service, so as to ensure that members of the Diplomatic Service, whether at home or abroad, may be acquainted with at least the rudiments of that science?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Lord Dufferin appears to have overlooked the change which has recently been made in the subjects of examination. They were adopted after very careful consideration as those best calculated to test the real qualifications of the candidates, and to afford as little room as possible for "cramming." There do not appear to be any sufficient reasons for making further change, but consideration will be given to the best means of encouraging the members of the Diplomatic Service to study such branches of Political Economy as would assist them in the preparation of their Commercial Reports.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER: Might it not be arranged that the examination in Political Economy should be placed on the same basis as the examination in International Law?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Yes, I think that would be a very desirable way of meeting the views of the hon. Gentleman and of many others who take an interest in this matter. It will require some careful consideration before it can be finally settled, and probably the Treasury will have to be consulted with regard to it; but it is in that direction the opportunity for examination will be afforded.

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) hon. I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to a letter from Admiral Erskine on the Polynesian labour traffic, which appeared in the Times of Saturday last, stating, as the result of three years' experience in command of the Australian Squadron, that—

"Even under the most stringent regulations wrongs and abuses occur in connection with the labour traffic, which invariably lead to bloodshed and accompanying complications and reprisals";

and whether, in view of the statement made by Admiral Erskine that, under the terms of the protectorate which he was authorised to promulgate,

"It was declared that the natives of New Guinea should not be taken from their country and compelled, under arrangements and contracts which they cannot possibly understand, to labour continuously for three years on Queensland plantations," the Government are taking any measures to protect the natives of New Guinea from being imported into Queensland?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): My attention has been drawn to the letter referred to by the hon. Member. It will be observed that the very valuable experiences of Admiral Erskine were confined to a period during which the irregularities connected with the labour traffic have been admitted. If the hon. Member will refer to page 210 of the Parliamentary Paper C, 5091-1, Vol. 2, he will see that—

"No deportation of natives is allowed either from one part of the territory to another, or to places beyond the territory, except under ordinances reserved for Her Majesty's assent and assented to by Her Majesty."

The removal of natives from the island is prohibited by a law passed in Queensland in 1887 as well as by a law passed in New Guinea in 1888. The latter will be found at page 234 of the Parliamentary Paper C, 5883.

MR. S. SMITH: In connection with that answer, may I ask whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman has been drawn to a letter by Admiral Scott, the present commander of the Pacific, in which he expresses his regret at the proposal to introduce this labour traffic from that Colony into the country, no power being given for looking after the interests of the natives?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I think the Admiral is in error. I have already said that the natives cannot be sent from New Guinea to Queensland.

MR. CLONINGHAM GRAHAM (Lanark, N. W.): What I want to know is whether, as a matter of fact, it is true that numbers of black people are at this moment being recruited from New Guinea, and also whether Her Majesty's Government have informed themselves that Clause 78 of the new Act of the Queensland Legislature requires that an armed boat should accompany the recruiting parties to the various islands?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I was not aware that recruiting is now going on in New Guinea. In fact, I have said that it is not going on. I do not think that the second part of the question arises out of the question on the Paper. An armed boat is required to accompany the recruiting parties for the purpose of protection.

MR. S. SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies question No. 11, and perhaps allow me to put it in the following manner: Whether he is aware that the

tive Assembly of Melbourne passed a Resolution yesterday, without a dissentient voice, condemning the action of the Queensland Parliament in proposing to renew the importation of Kanaka labourers into the colony, and urging the Government to resort to all the means in their power to render the protest of the Legislative Assembly of Melbourne effective; and whether Her Majesty's Government will re-consider their intention of not disallowing the Act of the Queensland Legislature?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The attention of Her Majesty's Government has not been officially drawn to the notice referred to, and to the resolution which it would appear, from a telegram in this morning's Times, has been carried; but the hon. Member will see that the question raised by that resolution is one which, however important, must be settled by these great colonies among themselves without the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. It may also be observed that this resolution is not framed against native employment on humanitarian grounds, but is against all foreign labour, coolie or native.

MR. S. SMITH: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, in connection with that answer, whether the Australian Colonies possess any means of preventing Queensland from renewing this labour traffic except through the intervention of the Home Government?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Certainly not. I am sure the hon. Member will see that a resolution passed by the Victorian Parliament could not—although, of course, it would be treated with all respect—influence Her Majesty's Government in the direction of not assenting to a Bill passed in Queensland.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: As this case involves, in the opinion of many, gross barbarities and a large quantity of bloodshed among these islanders, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this House or the Government has any power to veto—or has got any means of signifying their displeasure, should that be the pleasure of the House—this Act being put in force?

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial Office has in its possession the figures of the number of Polynesian Islanders landed in Queensland during each of the years 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, and 1890; the percentage of deaths among the islanders working on the plantations during each of those years; and the numbers returned to the Islands during each of those years; and, in that case, will he state them to the House?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The numbers of those landed and returned are as follows:—Landed: 1886, 1,505; 1887, 1,988; 1888, 2,291; 1889, 2,039; 1890, 2,459. Returned: 1888, 1,292; 1889, 1,814; 1890, 1,373. We have no Return from the colony showing the percentage of mortality asked for by the hon. Member. The total number of deaths reported to the Polynesian Department for the years 1886-90 inclusive will be found at Page 54 of the Blue Book just presented. If more precise information is required, the necessary Return will be obtained from the colony.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I understand the Colonial Office have no information with respect to the mortality other than is in the Return circulated this morning?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: That is so.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: The right hon. Gentleman is quite aware that it is admitted that the figures are not wholly sufficient?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Those are the only Returns we have. If he wishes to have a further Return, I will speak to my noble Friend the Secretary of State.

PARCEL POST BASKETS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the baskets used for Parcels Post and general Post Office work are now made and repaired on Government premises; and, if so, whether the work is done direct by Government employees or by private contractors on the Government premises; what a the.

rate of wages paid by either, or both, Government and contractors; and is the rate up to the recognised standard rate paid by employers in the open market?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): My right hon. Friend is absent on important public business, and he has asked me to answer this question, and to say that no new Parcel Post baskets are at present manufactured on Government premises in Great Britain, but a large number are repaired by workmen employed directly by the Department at its factory at Mount Pleasant, Clerkenwell. All the men, with two exceptions, receive fixed wages of sevenpence an hour, and they work fifty-four hours a week. They are kept in constant employment throughout the year, and have the advantage of a fortnight's holiday without loss of pay. The supply of baskets is divided between the Board of Works and the Post Office, according to sorts. The Office of Works purchases some from prisons, and also employs a contractor, who has been informed of the Resolution of the House of Commons. There are some also manufactured at certain Asylums for the Blind. In Ireland some of the baskets used by the Department are made and repaired at the Mountjoy Prison, and the Department pays certain fixed prices for this work.

THE EGYPTIAN DEBT.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government, considering the present favourable opportunity, will urge on the Egyptian Government the necessity of converting the Domain Loan into a Three-and-a-half per Cent. Stock similar to the Privilege Stock, thus effecting a saving of £75,000 per annum, and completing the financial programme of Egypt?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The Egyptian Government has most able financial advisers of its own, who have successfully carried out a very large scheme for the conversion of the Unified Debt. This was done of their own initiation and unaided by Her Majesty's Government. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government do not consider their intervention to be called for.

CASE OF ANDREW MORGAN'S WIDOW.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have received a memorial on behalf of Mary Morgan, aged fifty-seven, widow of Andrew Morgan, late coastguard in charge of Millisle Station, praying for pension or other assistance to enable her to support herself and two helpless children, now in a destitute condition; and whether, considering that Mrs. Morgan's claim has been supported by the Inspecting Commander of Donaghadee Coastguard Division and the Captain of H.M.S. Belleisle, and that Morgan entered the Navy in 1852, served at Sebastopol, and was awarded medals for bravery in battle, and for life saving and good conduct in the Coastguard Service, and would have been entitled under the Rules of the Service to a pension of £62 per annum and a good conduct gratuity of £20 had he lived six months longer, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty will favourably consider the claim of this woman, and grant her such remuneration as will enable her to support herself and her children without having recourse to the workhouse?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Mrs. Morgan's application for assistance has been considered by the Admiralty, but, so far as I know, no pension or gratuity can be granted out of Naval or Greenwich Hospital funds to her. The widows and children of seamen and marines are not entitled to receive any such assistance, unless the husband or father is killed on duty or dies from the direct effects of extraordinary exposure or exertion on service. The late Andrew Morgan's death was due to natural causes, and the Admiralty have so far been unable to accede to the widow's petition for direct assistance.

Mr. Causton

IRISH POST OFFICE ASSISTANTS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether attention will be paid to the claims of the Irish Post Office assistants who perform the general work of the General Post Office and are not recognised by the Department; whether, many have upwards of eight years' service, and do from ten to fourteen hours daily, and frequent night work; whether these assistants are engaged and dismissed by the Postmaster; and whether, under the circumstances, an inquiry will be made into the alleged grievances with a view to their redressal?

SIR J. GORST: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this question. Assistants are employed by the Postmaster of the smaller post offices in Ireland in the same way as in England and Scotland, and are usually young persons in training for established appointments, which they often receive after a comparatively short period of service. In fact, it is a common complaint of Postmasters that, after having trained their assistants, they cannot retain them, as they so quickly obtain appointments elsewhere. There may be cases in which assistants have, for one reason or another, not obtained appointments—possibly have not desired or deserved them—and have remained in their original employment as long as stated; but it is not known that their hours are unduly long, and no complaint has been received on the subject. Assistants are often occupied partly in the post office and partly on the private business of the Postmaster, whose servants they are, and by whom their services are engaged and dispensed with. It is not thought that there are any general grievances of the kind alleged, but if any particular office can be specified in which hardship is believed to exist, inquiry will be made with a view to its removal.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a memorial has been recently forwarded from the local post offices, signed by upwards of two hundred and forty of these Irish Post Office assistants, calling attention to these grievances? I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the fact that this memorial has been sent forward and has been received by the Post Office, it will receive the consideration due to it and to these men?

SIR J. GORST: No; I gather that my right hon. Friend knows nothing at all about that. But if any such memorial has been received no doubt it will be considered.

ACCOMMODATION FOR STRANGERS IN THE HOUSE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will consider whether it is possible to provide accommodation for overcoats, umbrellas, &c., for strangers under the Gallery and in the Distinguished Strangers' Gallery?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I have considered the matter very carefully, and consulted the authorities of the House on the subject, but I am sorry to say that there is really no place where provision could be made for such accommodation for strangers under the Gallery and in the Distinguished Strangers' Gallery. I should be very glad to provide such accommodation if I could, but really I have no means of doing so.

MAILS FOR THE NORTH-WEST OF IRELAND.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why the mails for the north-west of Ireland are so long delayed at Dundalk; and why after their arrival at Enniskillen letters are so long in being delivered that it is impossible to reply by mid-day mail to the English correspondence?

SIR J. GORST: My right hon. Friend the Postmaster General has asked me to state that he has not received the information which would enable him to answer the question, and that he will communicate with the hon. Member when he has received it.

CADASTRAL SURVEY OF BEHAR.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the Bengal Board of Revenue, and very nearly all the divisional and district officers of Bengal, who have been consulted about the proposed Cadastral Survey of Behar, have reported in a sense adverse to it; whether protests against the undertaking have been received by the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal from all the leading Native Associations of the Province, including the Association representing the occupying tenants as well as that representing the landholders; whether the recorded opinions of the Board of Revenue, of Mr. Secretary Cotton, of Mr. Halliday, and of the other leading officials of Bengal, together with the memorials of the various Native Associations of the Province, will be considered by the Secretary of State before finally sanctioning the survey; and whether copies of those opinions and memorials will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The Secretary of State has seen the Reports of the Board of Revenue and other Bengal officers, some of which doubt the expediency of the survey. I stated the other day, in answer to a similar question, that representations against the survey had been received and publicly answered by the Government of Bengal. The Reports in question, with the exception of Mr. Cotton's, which has not been received, have been considered by the Secretary of State, and are included in the Return now being printed. Copies of the memorials of Local Bodies have not yet reached the Secretary of State, though he has seen mention of them in the newspapers.

SALARIES OF INDIAN SCHOOL INSPECTORS.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the actual salary of the Rai Radhika Prasanna Mukarji, Bahadur, formerly a Deputy Inspector of Schools in the subordinate education service of Bengal, who was promoted to be an Inspector of Schools in the superior or graded service for long and exceptionally meritorious work, was the ordinary salary of the grade to which he was promoted; will he state what is the amount of the annual yearly increment of salary in that grade, to which every European officer so appointed is entitled; what amount of annual yearly increment of salary was recommended by the Director of Public Instruction to be granted to the Rai Bahadur; what amount was actually sanctioned for him; and how much less has he received, in consequence of these orders, since his promotion, than what he would have received if he had been a European officer?

MR. CURZON: A European appointed by the Secretary of State as Inspector of Schools in the graded service receives Rs.500 a month, rising annually by Rs.50 a month to Rs.750. A native receives under the rules two-thirds of these amounts—namely, Rs.333, rising to Rs.500. The Rai Bahadur, a Deputy Inspector of Schools, was receiving Rs.460 a month when promoted, and he continued to draw that amount after promotion, with a special annual increase of Rs.10 a month for every year in the graded service. The recommendation of the Director General of Education was that natives promoted to the graded service, instead of coming under the two-thirds rule, should rise on the same scale as Europeans to the third grade, but should be ineligible for promotion to the second or first grades; but this plan was not adopted. The officer in question appears to be drawing Rs.570 a month. A European, appointed at the same time, would be drawing the maximum of Rs.750.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Arising out of that answer, I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman if the Secretary of State will take the opinion of the Local Authorities as to the advisability of granting this exceptionally meritorious officer the same terms as he would have obtained if he had been a European officer?

MR. CURZON: I shall be glad to answer that question if the hon. Gentleman gives notice of it.

POST OFFICE DEPOSITS IN IRELAND.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of Post Office deposits in Ireland and the rate of interest allowed on same to the depositors; what is the amount of loans issued by the Board of Works in Ireland, and the rate of interest charged to public Boards in that country, on advances; and if he will state what is the average profit made by the Board of Works in advancing Irish money for Irish undertakings?

MR. GOSCHEN: The amount of Post Office Savings Bank deposits in Ireland on 31st December, 1891, was £3,966,000. The rate of interest allowed on deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank is two-and-a-half per cent. per annum; but the expenses of administration amount to about a half per cent.—making a total expense of about three per cent per annum. The deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank are invested in British Government Securities, and the rate of interest earned is barely more than sufficient to cover the three per cent. for interest and expenses. The amount of loans made by the Irish Board of Works and outstanding on 31st March, 1891, was £7,700,000 in round figures. The rates of interest charged on such loans range from three-and-an-eighth to five per cent.; but the average rate of interest actually received is less than three-and-a-quarter per cent. The loans made by the Board of Works are made out of the Local Loans Fund, which is Imperial, and not specially Irish. If the hon. Member wishes to have further information about the amount of profit or loss made on loans in Ireland, I will make further inquiries.

CURE FOR SHEEP SCAB.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any further steps will be taken in Ireland to stamp out the disease of sheep scab; whether he is aware that this disease has been successfully overcome in Australia and New Zealand; and why more effective steps have not been taken in Ireland by the Veterinary Department to provide some remedy against this disease?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am not aware of any necessity for further steps in regard to the sheep scab in this question. Ample provisions are at present in force for dealing with the disease, if duly carried out by the Local Authorities and owners of sheep. These provisions render necessary an immediate notification of the existence of the disease, then a continuing report thereon by the local Veterinary Inspector, to be made both to the Local Authority and to the Veterinary Department. Owners are required to apply remedial treatment, and the Local Authorities have large powers to secure complete isolation of affected or suspected sheep. Numerous prosecutions have been instituted by the police at the instance of the Veterinary Department where owners have failed to report the existence of the disease. I have no official information as to whether the disease has been successfully dealt with in Australia and New Zealand.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has received a communication from the President of the Agricultural Society dealing with the question, and whether in view of the fact that the disease has been successfully overcome in Australia and New Zealand, the remedy which has been found successful in those countries cannot be obtained and extended to Ireland for the benefit of the sheep dealers, notably in the Counties of Cork and Galway?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that any information on the subject has been received, but if any information is received I shall be only too glad to communicate it.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman have inquiry made of the President of the Board of Agriculture, and find out what is the best remedy, and if possible place it at the disposal of the Veterinary Authorities in Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir.

MR. LERESCHE AND THE PENDLEBURY COLLIERIES.

MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the statement which was made by Mr. J. H. P. Leresche, Stipendiary Magistrate, in the course of hearing a charge of assault at the County Police Court, Manchester, on Tuesday, the 10th inst.—

"The colliers of Pendlebury have for a long time past been notoriously devoid of moral sentiments, and have thought they can do just as they like";

and to the fact that Mr. Leresche, having been requested by the miners' agent of the district to withdraw his statement, has declined or omitted to do so, and has not denied the accuracy of the report of his words; and whether it is his intention to take any notice of the language used by Mr. Leresche?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have called the attention of the learned Stipendiary Magistrate to this question, and he informs me that he did not at any time, either in so many words or in substance, use the language imputed to him; and that he has been frequently assured by those who were in Court at the time that the words were never used by him. It is not my intention to take any action in the matter.

LICENSING CLUBS AND PUBLIC-HOUSES.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is able to form any estimate as to what would be the probable effect on the Revenue of placing clubs where intoxicating liquors are consumed, in the matter of Licence Duty and Inhabited House Duty, on a footing similar to that now occupied by the premises of licence holders?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am sorry I cannot form any estimate as to what would be the effect on the Revenue of placing clubs where intoxicating liquors are consumed on a footing similar to that now occupied by the premises of licence holders.

WEST INDIAN TARIFFS.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies when the Papers with reference to the tariffs of the West Indian Colonies, which were promised on 17th March, will be distributed to Members?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The Paper had already been sent to press when a fire occurred at the printers', by which the type was destroyed. The type is being re-set, but I cannot yet say when it will be possible to distribute the Paper.

THE JEBU EXPEDITION.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies when the Papers with reference to the negotiations and disputes with the Jebus, which were promised on 24th March, will be distributed to Members?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: It is proposed to give the Papers as soon as despatches reporting the recent occurrences have been received and considered by Her Majesty's Government. Until these Papers can be given the correspondence will necessarily be incomplete.

GUNNERY DRILL SHIP AT SHEERNESS.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is intended that a battleship is to be stationed at Sheerness as tender to the new gunnery establishment at the Naval Barracks?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The question of fitting a ship for drill purposes in connection with the Gunnery School at Sheerness is now under consideration, and no definite decision has yet been arrived at. The ship so stationed at Sheerness would have a "care and maintenance crew" on board. The gunnery establishment would provide the staff necessary for training.

DISTRIBUTION OF BADGES TO POSTMEN.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state when the distribution of good conduct stripes or badges to meritorious postmen, which was promised by his predecessor last Session, will be made?

SIR J. GORST (who replied): The distribution of good conduct stripes has been completed up to date both in London and most of the districts throughout the country. In one district, however—that of Nottingham—it is not quite finished.

Mr. Roby

PROVINCIAL POSTAL INSPECTORS.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has had under his consideration for some time past the position and scale of pay of Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors of Postmen in provincial offices ; and whether he is able to state what decision has been arrived at ?

SIR J. GORST (who replied) : The matter is not yet settled. It is still under the consideration of my right hon. Friend.

EARL COMPTON : Is the right hon. Gentleman able to state whether it is likely to be decided before the Estimates come on ?

SIR J. GORST : I am afraid I can hardly tell that.

EARL COMPTON : I will put another question.

SOLDIERS AND SHOPS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM : I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if soldiers of regiments are compelled by the War Office Regulations to deal at any particular shop or stores designated by their commanding officers, or if they have the same freedom as other citizens in this respect ?

*MR. BRODRICK : A soldier is perfectly at liberty to resort to any available shop or market, unless the commanding officer for some special reason and to safeguard the interests of the men thinks it necessary to declare a particular house out of bounds.

METROPOLITAN POLICE INSPECTORS' RETIRING FUND.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM : I beg to ask the Secretary of the Home Department whether he has any intention to compel the Metropolitan constables to subscribe to a private retiring fund for Inspectors ; and whether the present voluntary funds have the sanction of the Police Authorities ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.) : There is no intention to compel the Metropolitan Police to subscribe to a private retiring fund for Inspectors. The present subscriptions are purely voluntary, and have the sanction of the Commissioners.

THE FISHERIES AT LOUISBURG.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a resolution of the Westport Board of Guardians, impressing upon him the importance of having the town of Louisburg, the nearest town to the best fishing grounds on the Mayo coast, connected by telegraph with the Irish and English markets, and urging him to use his influence with the Congested Districts Board to assist in supplying the necessary local guarantee to the Post Office ; and whether, having regard to the extreme poverty of the Westport Union, and its inability to bear any additional local burden, he will make a representation to the Congested Districts Board upon the subject ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : The Congested Districts Board have not so far adopted a scheme for the development of fisheries in the immediate neighbourhood of Louisburg. The question, therefore, of whether it would be expedient for them to give a guarantee to obtain a telegraphic extension to that place is not ripe for consideration.

THE LAND PURCHASE ACT.

MR. W. O'BRIEN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been directed to the fact that both the landlord and the evicted tenant of the lands of Tearnea, Parish of Ruan, County of Clare, are anxious to avail themselves of the 13th clause of the Land Purchase Act of last Session, but that their application has failed through expiry of time ; is he aware that a police protection party has been maintained on the evicted farm at heavy expense to the Government and to the local ratepayers, and that the dispute has been the cause of considerable disturbance and ill-feeling in the district ; and whether the Government will offer any opposition to a short Bill extending the 13th clause so as to meet such cases ?

MR. JACKSON: I have caused inquiry to be made into the case of the evicted tenant referred to by the hon. Member, and find the facts are as follows:—On the 27th July, 1885, the tenant, Robert O'Brien, referred to, was evicted from the lands of Tearna for non-payment of rent. He owed some four years, amounting to £230. The farm after eviction was farmed by the landlord, Mr. P. A. Dwyer. In 1888 his caretaker, Patrick Hallinan, went to live on the farm under police protection, but on the 3rd May the protection was discontinued. Patrick Hallinan left and was without protection till 1st September, 1890, when he was fired at and seriously wounded by John Brodie and Patrick Hartigan, who were convicted on the 22nd December, 1890, and sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude. Robert O'Brien, the evicted tenant, was then arrested on the same charge, and on the 12th March, 1891, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for conspiracy to murder. I cannot think that this is a case in which the House would feel itself called upon to pass special legislation of the nature in question.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the landlord agreed, if possible, to take advantage of the clause, but that it is impossible for him to do so, and that, in this case, it has been the cause of very considerable disturbances?

MR. JACKSON: It is not in accordance with the information that came to me that it has been the cause of disturbances in the district. I do not see how the landlord and tenant could enter into negotiations, because the tenant is at present in prison. But I believe there have been some communications between the mother of the prisoner and the landlord, with a view to the mother taking the farm.

THE PERSIAN TOBACCO CONCESSION.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Persian Tobacco Corporation gives up all its property to the Persian Government in consideration of receiving £500,000 for the £350,000 alleged by the Corporation to have been spent by it; whether he can state in what that property consists; and whether any estimate has been submitted to Her Majesty's Government as to its actual value?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The Corporation is to hand over to the Persian Government its stock of tobacco, house property, furniture and machinery. These assets must be proved to the satisfaction of the Persian Government to have cost £139,000. The amount stated by the Company to have been expended in Persia on account of installation, travelling, salaries, rents, printing, telegrams and postage is £55,000. This is in addition to the Company's expenditure in London.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then how does the right hon. Gentleman make up the difference between the amount that he stated and £350,000?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I think the hon. Member is under a misapprehension. It is not part and never has been any part of the duty of the Government to make up anything in the matter. The claim was made by the Corporation who asked for arbitration. The Persian Government were not prepared to enter into arbitration in this matter and preferred to make an arrangement with the Corporation. That arrangement was made, and that is the arrangement of which the hon. Gentleman complains, and as to which the Government acted as mediators between the two parties concerned.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Do I understand that when they acted as mediators between the two parties, the Government did not express the opinion that the amount of £500,000 was a fair and legitimate demand?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir, Her Majesty's Government expressed the opinion that they thought it was a fair demand to make. The Corporation had first of all demanded £650,000. The Persian Government did not feel themselves at liberty to meet that demand, and offered a lower sum. Eventually a compromise was arrived at for £500,000, a compromise which Her Majesty's Representative in all the circumstances of the case considered a fair amount.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I would ask the hon. Gentleman upon what data Her Majesty's Representative proceeded in stating that this was a fair and legitimate sum?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: If the hon. Member will have a little patience and wait a few days until the Papers are produced, he will then see exactly the course which Her Majesty's Representative at Teheran took in this matter.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Does the hon. Gentleman guarantee that I shall have an opportunity before the end of the present Parliament of dealing with this question, if I do not raise it on the Vote on Account?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The duration of the present Parliament does not rest with me.

THE DAUGHTERS OF NAVAL WARRANT OFFICERS.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty will consider the case of the daughters of Naval Warrant Officers, with a view to their being considered eligible for compassionate allowances when left in distressing circumstances consequent upon the death of their parents, in like manner as provided for daughters of Commissioned Officers of same relative rank in the Navy and Army, seeing that the principle has been already conceded in the case of daughters of Warrant Officers who are killed in action, or whose death has been caused or hastened by exposure on duty, &c.; and whether existing regulations can be modified to meet their claims to be placed on a footing of equality in this respect with the daughters of other officers whose widows are entitled to pensions?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The alteration in the Army Regulations on this subject has been recently brought to the notice of the Admiralty, and the question of any Amendment in the existing Naval Regulations will be taken into consideration. Similarity of practice in the two Services may be desirable, but the conditions generally of Naval Service, so far as pensions and allowances are concerned, are more liberal than in the Military Service.

PETROLEUM IN THE SUEZ CANAL.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can inform the House what regulations were considered by the Inter-Departmental Committee at the Foreign Office in December last in relation to the proposed provisional regulations for the transport of bulk petroleum in the Suez Canal; what additions were framed by the said Committee with the object of safeguarding navigation, but only part of which were accepted by the Suez Canal Company; and to define the substance of such recommendations as were made by the Inter-Departmental Committee and which were declined by the Suez Canal Company?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: It would be impossible to reply to the hon. Member's questions within the limits usually assigned to an answer. The several matters as to which the hon. Member inquires will appear clearly from the Papers which are being prepared.

MR. FENWICK: Will these Papers be laid on the Table before Whitsuntide?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir; I hope before Whitsuntide.

MR. D. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in regard to the proposed authorisation of the passage of bulk petroleum through the Suez Canal, which in the opinion of English experts threatens the security and safety of navigation in the Canal, whether, in view of Article 8 of the Convention between Great Britain, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Spain, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Russia, and Turkey, respecting the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal, signed at Constantinople 29th October, 1888, in which it is laid down that the agents in Egypt of the Signatory Powers of the present Treaty shall be charged to watch over its execution, in case of any event threatening the security or the free passage of the Canal, and that they shall inform the Khedival Government of the danger which they may have perceived, in order that that Government may take proper steps to ensure the protection and the free use of the Canal, Her Majesty's Government will instruct its agent in Egypt to call the attention of the Egyptian Government to the threatened dangers as aforesaid?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The only ground for interference, under the Convention referred to, by any of the Signatory Powers thereto, is the occurrence of—

"Any event threatening the security or the free passage of the Canal." By Article 1 "The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free, and open in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war without distinction of flag. Consequently the High Contracting Parties agree not in any way to interfere with the free use of the Canal in time of war as in time of peace. The Canal shall never be subjected to the exercise of the right of blockade."

In the opinion of Her Majesty's Government the passage of petroleum tank ships under the regulations issued by the Suez Canal Company does not threaten "the security or the free passage of the Canal," and consequently Her Majesty's Government have no ground for interference.

THE ALLEGED ASSAULT ON LOUGHRAN.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what has been ascertained, and what the Government have done or directed to be done, with reference to the attack on the boy Loughran, at the Queen's Island Works, Belfast, detailed in his statement reported in the Belfast Irish News of Monday last?

MR. JACKSON: I have made very careful inquiry into the matter of this question, and the simple facts are these. On Thursday night the boy Loughran, a boy Elliott, and some other boys were going home, and the boy Loughran, apparently, complained that Elliott had trodden on his foot. He then struck Elliott on the face; Elliott retorted and struck Loughran on the face; they had a fight, and Elliott got rather the worst of it. On the following morning during the breakfast hour Elliott went to Loughran and asked him what he meant by the action he had taken the night before, and proceeded at once to knock Loughran down. A ring was formed while the boys fought, and the two boys fought it out. Loughran got the worst of it. These are the material facts of the case. I do not think any importance attached to it beyond an ordinary fight between two boys of about fourteen years of age.

MR. SEXTON: Is it the fact, as stated by Loughran, that some six weeks ago, long before this occurred, when he first went to the yard, he was threatened that if he dared to come back to the yard after the holidays he would lose his life?

MR. JACKSON: I am told that there is no truth whatever in that statement.

MR. SEXTON: Is it the fact—"Order!" and "Oh!"—I can quite understand these cries after the speech of the Marquess of Salisbury—that Loughran on Friday and Saturday last gave to three members of the Belfast police force the names of his assailant Elliott and of several men, who according to Loughran also assaulted him; and have the police taken any steps to obtain information on oath?

MR. JACKSON: I do not know anything about the police taking steps to obtain information on oath; I should say not. But I have taken every pains to inform myself, and have obtained reports from three distinct quarters which state the facts, and I have given the simple upshot of these reports to the House. The statement made by Loughran as to his having been assaulted by others than the boy Elliott, I believe, judging from the reports I have received, to be absolutely untrue. It is stated by several persons who were witnesses of what took place that nobody attacked Loughran except the boy Elliott, and both boys are between fourteen and fifteen years of age. I believe some Members of the House can remember the time when probably about that age they had a similar experience themselves, and when the result, as in this case, did not always come out on the one side. But I can assure the House that, as far as I can form a judgment from the reports, which I shall be happy to show to the hon. Member if he desires it, there is absolutely no importance to be attached to this beyond an ordinary boys' fight, which took place on two occasions. In one case the result was on the one side; in the other case it was on the other.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman—"Order!"—well, you will have it for the evening unless I am allowed to proceed—whether, if it is the fact, having regard to the circumstances of the second section of the Crimes Act in Ireland, that this poor boy has not only been beaten, but deprived of his means of living by being driven away from the yard by threats of violence, and by intimidation, the right hon. Gentleman will leave this question to be determined by Magistrates, or will the right hon. Gentleman constitute himself a Court of Law; and whether, if information on oath is laid, the ordinary course of the law will be followed?

MR. JACKSON: If any information on oath is laid, of course it will, I presume, be the duty of somebody to take action upon it; but I doubt very much whether such a result will arise out of the circumstances. So far from there being any truth in the statement that the boy has been driven out of the works, it appears from the reports supplied to me that the foreman told the boy to go back to his work, and that he would take care—

MR. SEXTON: He was afraid to go back.

MR. JACKSON: Of course, he cannot compel the boy to go back to his work; but I do not think I can add anything to what I have said.

MR. SEXTON: Do I go too far—"Order!"—one Gentleman on the other side is trying to distinguish him self in a very extraordinary manner. Do I go too far in asking for an assurance that if an information is laid on oath—the boy having told the police that he has been deprived of his living by intimidation—the ordinary course of the law will be followed, and that the decision in the matter will be left to the Courts, and not to the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. JACKSON: Unquestionably the ordinary course of the law will be followed.

POST CARDS AND HALFPENNY STAMPS.

MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the regulation which forbids a card with a halfpenny stamp upon it being transmitted without excess payment by the recipient could be amended without loss to the Revenue?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): It will be very difficult to distinguish between the cost of distribution and the profit realised on the sale, but the amount is not large.

TELEGRAPHIC CHARGES.

MR. BIGWOOD: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the regulation which at present exists with reference to the single or double charge in telegrams upon all double words, such as "Herne Bay" and "Herne Hill," could be removed without inflicting injury or loss upon the department?

DR. TANNER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to include "Earl's Court" in his answer?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: All such double names could not be charged as one word without a considerable loss of revenue.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS OF EXCISE.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why second class officers of Excise, though they perform duties identical with those of first class officers, are restricted to a salary with a maximum of £150, whilst first class officers go on to £250; and on what grounds the Board of Inland Revenue do not acknowledge the right of an assistant or second class officer of Excise, or anyone entering the service at present, to claim salary beyond the £150 limit?

MR. GOSCHEN: There are broad general distinctions between the duties and responsibilities of second class officers of Excise and those of first class officers, and there is naturally a corresponding distinction between the salaries attaching to these classes. The conditions of the salaries are known to all persons entering the Service. There is no right in that or any other Service to any salary on a higher scale than that laid down in the Regulations.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the objections to a progressive salary for officers of Excise from the minimum of £115 to the maximum of £250; and whether an arrangement could be made whereby the salary of a second class officer would go on increasing until he was offered promotion to the rank of first class, the increment to cease in case of non-acceptance?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have frequently stated that in the interests of good discipline and for the due organisation of the Service, it is absolutely necessary to maintain the principle of classification in the Excise Service. It would not be possible to adopt the arrangement which the hon. Member suggests in the latter part of his question.

A REPORTED MASSACRE IN UGANDA.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has any information as to the reported massacre of Bagandas in Uganda; and, if so, who were the instigators of the massacre; will he inquire whether their assailants were armed with quick-firing rifles; whether, as is stated, the perpetrators of the massacre were assisted by soldiers from Rampala, and equipped with a Maxim gun; and, whether steps will be taken to prevent the recurrence of such a massacre?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Perhaps the hon. Baronet will allow me to reply to this question. As I have already informed the House, no reliable information has been received from Captain Lugard since the date of the alleged massacre. From the known character and antecedents of that officer, it is impossible to believe that he was directly or indirectly a party to it. The next series of despatches from Uganda will probably contain a full account of the events which are supposed to have occurred about the end of January last.

THE TRANSFER OF RICHMOND PRISON.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will grant the Return relating to the transfer of Richmond Prison to the War Office, and the sums expended on the prison by the Dublin Corporation?

MR. JACKSON: I understand there is no objection to a Return asking the Dublin Corporation to state the sums expended by the Corporation on the site and buildings of the Richmond Prison, the date thereof, and the acreage covered by the prison and the grounds. This appears to have been what was promised by the First Lord of the Treasury and the Financial Secretary to the War Office. I do not think there is any connection between the expenditure on Mountjoy and Richmond Prisons, and the amount expended by the Dublin Corporation. But there is no desire to withhold any information which the hon. Member or the House may wish, but perhaps it would be more convenient to give that information if he would put a question as to the expenditure for the last three years or for any period of time he likes as to the expenditure on Mountjoy Prison. There is no objection to state what has been the expenditure, but we wish to keep separate the two questions, because the Irish Government could not admit that the expenditure on Mountjoy is in any way connected with the removal or change of prisons.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will raise the question of the additional expenditure on Mountjoy on the Vote on Account, if that is a convenient way. May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to answer that portion of the question which asks how much advantage the War Office or the Government estimate they have gained by getting a free barracks for their troops? And I may remind him that, while the Dublin Corporation maintain that the Government got a £100,000 property without any compensation, the Government hesitated, nay, absolutely refused, to give more than £10,000—I believe not

tive Assembly of Melbourne passed a Resolution yesterday, without a dissentient voice, condemning the action of the Queensland Parliament in proposing to renew the importation of Kanaka labourers into the colony, and urging the Government to resort to all the means in their power to render the protest of the Legislative Assembly of Melbourne effective; and whether Her Majesty's Government will re-consider their intention of not disallowing the Act of the Queensland Legislature?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The attention of Her Majesty's Government has not been officially drawn to the notice referred to, and to the resolution which it would appear, from a telegram in this morning's Times, has been carried; but the hon. Member will see that the question raised by that resolution is one which, however important, must be settled by these great colonies among themselves without the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. It may also be observed that this resolution is not framed against native employment on humanitarian grounds, but is against all foreign labour, coolie or native.

MR. S. SMITH: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, in connection with that answer, whether the Australian Colonies possess any means of preventing Queensland from renewing this labour traffic except through the intervention of the Home Government?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Certainly not. I am sure the hon. Member will see that a resolution passed by the Victorian Parliament could not—although, of course, it would be treated with all respect—influence Her Majesty's Government in the direction of not assenting to a Bill passed in Queensland.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: As this case involves, in the opinion of many, gross barbarities and a large quantity of bloodshed among these islanders, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this House or the Government has any power to veto—or has got any means of signifying their displeasure, should that be the pleasure of the House—this Act being put in force?

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial Office has in its possession the figures of the number of Polynesian Islanders landed in Queensland during each of the years 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, and 1890; the percentage of deaths among the islanders working on the plantations during each of those years; and the numbers returned to the Islands during each of those years; and, in that case, will he state them to the House?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The numbers of those landed and returned are as follows:—Landed: 1886, 1,505; 1887, 1,988; 1888, 2,291; 1889, 2,039; 1890, 2,459. Returned: 1888, 1,292; 1889, 1,814; 1890, 1,373. We have no Return from the colony showing the percentage of mortality asked for by the hon. Member. The total number of deaths reported to the Polynesian Department for the years 1886-90 inclusive will be found at Page 54 of the Blue Book just presented. If more precise information is required, the necessary Return will be obtained from the colony.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I understand the Colonial Office have no information with respect to the mortality other than is in the Return circulated this morning?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: That is so.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: The right hon. Gentleman is quite aware that it is admitted that the figures are not wholly sufficient?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Those are the only Returns we have. If he wishes to have a further Return, I will speak to my noble Friend the Secretary of State.

PARCEL POST BASKETS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the baskets used for Parcels Post and general Post Office work are now made and repaired on Government premises; and, if so, whether the work is done direct by Government employees or by private contractors on the Government premises; what a the.

he is aware that the penalty of five shillings inflicted on parents for the non-attendance of their children at school has lost its force in consequence of the abolition of school fees, and that it does not repay the costs incurred by the authorities of a school in prosecuting an offender; and if he will endeavour to provide a remedy?

MR. MATTHEWS: The abolition of school fees does not appear to me to have any bearing on the sufficiency of the five shillings, which is the limit of penalty, and costs, for breach of an attendance order. That sum was frequently insufficient to defray the costs actually incurred by a prosecuting School Board before the abolition of fees, and will be so still, but I do not think that these extra costs ought to be defrayed either by the parents of the defaulting child or by the ratepayers of the county or borough.

TREES ON THE TERRACE AT WESTMINSTER.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works why orange trees and some palms cannot be obtained from Kew Gardens and placed on the Terrace, as well as other shrubs, flowers, and plants suitable to the season? I also wish to ask whether he will include eucalyptus trees in the list?

MR. PLUNKET: I am afraid we have not got any orange trees or palm trees at Kew Gardens that could be spared for the purpose described by the hon. Member, even if it were desirable. I think there are very few seasons of the year in which the orange trees would not be subject to the south-eastern winds, and I do not think they would be an appropriate addition to the Terrace.

DR. TANNER: Does the right hon. Gentleman not know that eucalyptus trees or orange trees may certainly be placed in the open in these countries from the end of the month of April to the end of the month of September: and whether, in view of the fact that it can be done, he will inquire from the authorities at Kew if some are not available in order to embellish a singularly deserted place?

Mr. Ainslie

MR. PLUNKET: I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. Member about that.

PAUPER ALIENS.

COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, S.W., Bootle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, when the United States authorities decline to receive emigrants from various parts of Europe on the ground that they are pauper lunatics, the Atlantic Steamship Companies bring these persons back and turn them loose on the Liverpool docks; whether he is aware that the maintenance of these alien pauper lunatics costs the ratepayers of the Borough of Bootle £350 per annum; whether he is aware that other harbour towns are put to similar expense; and whether he will include provisions to remedy this grievance in the promised measure to prevent the immigration of pauper aliens?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information, nor, I understand, have the Local Government Board as to the facts alleged in the question of my hon. and gallant Friend; but I have no reason to doubt their accuracy. I may add that the Government measure will apply to the grievance he refers to.

DISTURBANCE IN LONDONDERRY BARRACKS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether his attention has been called to the fact that a fight took place in Londonderry Barracks on the 23rd inst., between the Derry Artillery Militia and the Lancashire Regiment, and that twenty of the former were injured, six of them seriously; and whether he can give the total number of men injured on both sides, and the cause of the quarrel?

*MR. BRODRICK: The General Officer commanding the Belfast District has reported that the accounts of the disturbance have been grossly exaggerated. The disturbance lasted for about ten minutes; the injuries were slight, and no man is in hospital. The regiment marched out yesterday in good order. A Court of Inquiry has been held, but the report of the proceedings is not yet to hand.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that seventy people have been arrested; and does that bear out his answer that the injuries are of a slight character?

*MR. BRODRICK: It is not according to the information we have received.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Will the hon. Gentleman say what is the origin of his Report?

*MR. BRODRICK: I am afraid I cannot.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Then I must ask the Question again.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MEETINGS ON THE HYDE MARKET GROUND.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been directed to a special Regulation of the Market Committee of Hyde, Manchester, passed to prevent the Fabian Society from holding meetings on the market ground; and if this is legal, as all other bodies are allowed to use this ground for meetings?

MR. J. W. SIDEBOTTOM (Cheshire, Hyde): Before this question is answered, may I ask whether it is not a fact that no objection whatever can be offered to meetings of the Fabian Society on the Hyde Market Ground if the Society conform to the rules and regulations of the Town Council, and whether it is not the fact that all other bodies using the ground conform to the rules and regulations?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied): I am asked to say that the Local Government Board have no information on this subject, but that they will cause immediate inquiries to be made with regard to it. In answer to my hon. Friend, I may say I have no doubt that the inquiry will embrace the matter referred to in his supplementary question.

NIGHT MAILS TO ABERDEEN.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will consider the practicability of accelerating the night mails from London to Aberdeen, so that the mail train now leaving Euston at half-past eight p.m. should arrive in Aberdeen earlier than it now does, considering that at present this train occupies twelve and a half hours on the way, whereas the passenger train leaving Euston at eight p.m. occupies only twelve hours, and having regard to the fact that an acceleration of the night mails might enable the delivery to callers on Sunday forenoon to take place at the same hour as the week day delivery?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The night mail train from Euston Station to Aberdeen was accelerated by about an hour in the summer of 1890, and it does not seem practicable to obtain any further acceleration. It is true that the eight p.m. passenger train performs the journey in half-an-hour less time than the mail train, but, owing to the large quantities of mails to be transferred on the way, more time is required for the station duties in connection with the mail train. There are, moreover, a number of branch trains which bring mails for transfer to the mail train, and in the event of one of them being late it is arranged for the main line train to wait for a few minutes in order to prevent delay to the mails. It is only with great difficulty and the utmost exertions that the present hour can be maintained.

THE STATUS OF COUNTY SURVEYORS.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he would, before the Local Government Bill enters on the Committee stage, lay upon the Table of the House a Return, or short statement, of the legal status of county surveyors, which statement would explain how far the county surveyor is bound to follow the rulings of the Grand Jury or of Presentment Sessions, and in what points, as to passing of repairs, &c., he can act on his own initiative or judgment?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I shall be glad to afford the hon. Member all the information in my power in reference to this matter. The duties of these officials are pretty clearly defined by the Grand Jury Act, but if the hon. Member wishes for a statement I shall be glad to furnish it.

THE TAX ON RICE CROPS IN CEYLON.

MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Excise Paddy Tax of one-tenth of the rice crops in Ceylon has been abolished, while the corresponding Customs Duty of ten per cent. on rice imported from India is retained; and whether, as a consequence, about one-half of the native population will be eating rice free of taxation, while the other half, including some of the poorest Ceyloneese living in the towns, will be paying ten per cent. ad valorem on their staple food to the Government?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The reasons for the recent measures regarding the taxation of grain in Ceylon will be found very fully stated in a despatch of the Secretary of State of 12th February, 1892. This appears in a Paper laid before the Legislative Council of Ceylon, copies of which will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses, and a copy of which will also, if he wishes it, be forwarded to the hon. Member.

REFRESHMENTS IN KEW GARDENS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been directed to the entirely insufficient provision of catering and attendance in the new refreshment rooms in Kew Gardens on Sundays and holidays; and why the major number of waiters there employed are Germans, unable to understand the English language?

MR. PLUNKET: I have not heard of any complaints for a long time as to the arrangements with regard to the supply of refreshments at Kew. The truth is that owing to the uncertainty of the weather it is difficult to foresee the number of persons who may go to Kew Gardens on Sundays. So far as I can see, the refreshment department is conducted as well as can be expected.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that only last Sunday people were really helping themselves in consequence of the bad attendance there? I should also like to ask how it comes to pass that German waiters have the preference over English waiters?

[No reply was given.]

Mr. Madden

DR. TANNER: I shall call attention to the matter on the Vote on Account.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

MR. RICHARD CHAMBERLAIN (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware of the serious loss that is being occasioned to all carrying on business in the Metropolitan Cattle Market, to the graziers in the Eastern and Midland Counties, and in Scotland, and to the Canadian cattle trade, by the prohibition, under the 'Pleuro-Pneumonia Act, of the removal of all beasts that have been exhibited in the above market beyond the Metropolitan Police district except for slaughter within four days, thus rendering practically valueless the one great staple market; and whether, seeing that the London cowsheds are the only source of danger from which pleuro-pneumonia can be spread, the prohibition might be directed solely to the cowsheds, and thus prevent the continued sacrifice of large and important interests to one comparatively small?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): It is erroneous to suppose that the London cowsheds are the only source of danger from which pleuro-pneumonia can be spread, and though of course I am aware that the restrictions which are necessary if pleuro-pneumonia is to be eradicated cannot be imposed without inflicting loss, which no one regrets more than myself, it would be premature in my opinion, and prejudicial to the ultimate success of our efforts, to adopt at present the course suggested in the question.

IRELAND AND THE CHICAGO EXHIBITION.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Attorney General if any sub-committee has been appointed to promote the representation of Irish industry at the Chicago Exhibition; and, if so, who are the members of it; what portion of the $60,000 granted to the Royal Commission for the Chicago Exhibition is to be devoted or has been devoted to Ireland; whether any statement has been made of the receipts and expenditure of the Royal Commission; and, if not, when it will be made public; and, what the heads are of the expenditure of the Royal Commission, what revenue do they derive from advertisements printed on the official prospectus, and if it is a fact that no postage is charged on their letters?

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Before the Attorney General answers this question I wish to ask him whether the grant of money has been increased from £25,000 to £60,000; whether the charge for space has been abolished; whether the Commission have appointed a Committee in Dublin with a salaried secretary; whether the Commission have been enlarged by the addition of representatives of Irish exhibitors; and whether the right hon. Gentleman or the Commission can suggest any further means whereby Irish interests in the Exhibition may be assisted?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In reply to the hon. Baronet I have to say that a sub-committee has been appointed to promote representation of the Irish industries at the Chicago Exhibition, but I have no list of the names. The Committee was, I believe, appointed in Dublin by the action of the Chambers of Commerce, the Corporation of Dublin, and the Royal Dublin Society. No portion of the grant to the Royal Commission will be specially allocated to Ireland, but a very considerable amount will be expended in connection with Irish industries and exhibits from Ireland in accordance with their requirements. No statement has yet been made public of the receipts and expenditure of the Royal Commission, but the Secretary, Sir Henry Trueman Wood, will be only too glad to give the hon. Baronet, or any other gentleman interested in the matter, full information. It is a fact that no postage is charged on outgoing inland letters. On foreign letters the postage has to be paid. In reply to the questions of the hon. Member for South Tipperary, I am able to state that the grant has been increased from £25,000 to £60,000. Steps are being taken for the purpose of providing an increase of Irish representation on the Commission. The charges for space have been abolished. The opinion of the Irish exhibitors was taken on the question of providing a separate Irish exhibit department, and they were almost unanimously opposed to such an arrangement—only two, I believe, being in favour of it.

CHILDREN IN RAILWAY TRAINS.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps this year to prevent the recurrence of accidents, many of them fatal, to children's excursions, such as occurred last year on the London, Tilbury and Southend and the Great Eastern Railways?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have been asked to reply to this question. As I explained to the hon. Member in answer to a question put by him last year, I think those who are in charge of children's excursions by rail ought to arrange that some person old enough to keep the children out of mischief should be put in each compartment. I am now informed that the Great Eastern Railway Company have issued a circular suggesting a due distribution of the adults of each party. I think that the accidents to which the hon. Member particularly refers arose from children opening the carriage doors by the handles inside, and I understand that the Great Eastern Company will, as far as possible, avoid the use of carriages fitted with such handles in children's excursions. In these circumstances, I do not see what further steps can be taken to secure the safety of the children.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman communicate with the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Company to see if they have done the same as the Great Eastern Railway Company, as the excursion season is now commencing, and children frequently go out in thousands from the East End in the excursion trains of that Company?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will see what can be done in the matter.

THE SCOTTISH CHURCHES.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government intend this Session to introduce legislation for the re-union of the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland upon a national basis, and the re-distribution of ecclesiastical endowments in that country, in order to carry out the Resolution of the hon. Member for Inverness, adopted by the Government on Tuesday night?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I observe that the Resolution passed on Tuesday states that it is highly desirable that the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland should be re-united upon a national basis. That is the opinion expressed by the House and shared by the Government, who would be glad to introduce legislation to smooth the way towards the ultimate consummation of the wish expressed in the Resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to bring in a Bill?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that any legislation is required at the present moment, or that the question is ripe for legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Are we to understand that the course taken by the Government on Tuesday was not meant to convey any intention of giving practical effect to the Resolution?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The Resolution expressed the opinion that a certain object was desirable, but in order that that object might be attained, it would be necessary for the Presbyterian Churches themselves to take steps towards re-union. Legislation must be preceded by some spontaneous act on the part of the Churches.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention has been called to a report in the Times of to-day of the proceedings of the General Assembly of the Established Church in Scotland, and whether he has observed that when a motion similar to that of the hon. and learned Member for Inverness was brought forward a large and important minority, led by leading Churchmen like Dr. Story and Dr. Donald MacLeod, divided against the resolution, and would have nothing to do with it?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the report referred to, but I am glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman that the action to which he has drawn attention was only the action of a minority.

Mr. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): Will the right hon. Member undertake to re-introduce the Bill proposed in a former Session by the hon. and learned Member for Inverness, or to introduce some Bill like it?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask that notice be given of the question.

Dr. CLARK (Caithness): Cannot the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether there is likely to be legislation on the subject?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already explained that some action on the part of the Churches concerned is required before legislation can be initiated. At all events, I am not in a position at present to propose legislation dealing with the subject.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Then the right hon. Gentleman, on behalf of the Government, assented to the Resolution without the least intention of carrying it into effect?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: On the contrary, I have expressed my desire that it should be carried into effect.

Mr. BUCHANAN: The right hon. Gentleman had no such intention—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SUBORDINATE CUSTOMS' OFFICERS.

Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a case which appeared in the Daily News of the 12th instant, where a Customs' officer was summoned at the Thames Police Court by a seaman for detaining twelve ounces of tobacco and a bottle of Florida water, and to the comments of the Magistrate on the proceedings of the Customs' Authorities; whether, in the inquiry held by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1891, into the complaints of the officers of the Outdoor Department of the Customs, that while superior officers receiving large salaries were granted substantial benefits, the subordinates—namely, boatmen, receiving very low pay, were granted nothing, but sustained pecuniary loss by the abolition of classification, and that, in consequence, a great deal of discontent prevails amongst the officers of this class; and whether, in view of the temptation to improper exercise of their duties which is caused by the low scale of salaries, the Treasury would grant an improvement in the position of these officers?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have nothing to do with the question put by the hon. Member.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I have had the question on the Paper for more than a week, and I should like to have an answer to it.

[No further reply.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury how many Votes, irrespective of the Vote on Account, have already been taken on the Army and Navy and the Civil Service and Revenue Estimates, and how many remain yet to be taken?

SIR J. GORST: There have been taken two Army Votes, two Navy Votes, and one Civil Service Vote—total, five. There remain to be taken sixteen Army Votes, fifteen Navy Votes, and one hundred and eleven Civil Votes—total, one hundred and forty-two.

MOTIONS.

TELEGRAPHS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision respecting Telegraphs.”—(Sir James Fergusson.)

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): Can the right hon. Gentleman give us some information with regard to the meaning of this Bill. If it is intended merely to remedy some defect in another Bill, I have nothing further to say; but if the whole question of the telegraphic system is to be opened up by it, we shall require some fair opportunity of discussing it. We are now approaching the Whitsuntide holidays, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not fix the Second Reading of the Bill before the Recess. I would call his attention to the fact that a Committee in 1888 inquired most carefully into the whole question of the telegraphic system of the country, and that the late Mr. Raikes then admitted publicly and privately how much advantage he derived from the labours of that Committee. I would make the suggestion that a Committee should go into this question. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give us some information with regard to it, and also allow us a reasonable time before taking the Second Reading of the Bill.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The short title of this Bill is a little misleading. The measure really refers to telephones, which, by a judicial decision, have been included in telegraphs. It is intended to carry out, as far as any legislative provision is required for the purpose, the scheme which I explained to the House a month or two ago. But, as only a small part of the scheme requires such legislative provision, a Treasury Minute will be laid upon the Table setting out the whole scheme, and I hope that this will be done before the Second Reading of the Bill is moved. It is the intention of the Government, after the Second Reading, to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. I hope it will be possible to read it a second time before the Whitsuntide holidays.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir James Fergusson and Sir John Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time.
[Bill 377.]

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not press the Second Reading of this Bill too early, as it is one which requires some consideration. I hope it will not be taken till Friday.

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: It will be set down for Monday, and can, if necessary, be postponed.

POST OFFICE ACT (1891) EXTENSION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Post Office Act, 1891, in relation to its application to Scotland, and to apply that Act to the Isle of Man and to the Channel Islands."—(Sir James Fergusson.)

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): I think it is most unfair to the House to bring in this Bill, when the original Bill has not been discharged.

*MR. SPEAKER: The original Bill will be discharged when we come to this Bill, which will be substituted for it. This is being done in order to prevent irregularity.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I submit that the proper course would be to first move the discharge of No. 8.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir James Fergusson and Sir John Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 378.]

ACCESS TO MOUNTAINS (SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to regulate the Access of the Public to Mountains in Scotland."—(The Lord Advocate.)

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): May I ask the Lord Advocate whether this Bill will be printed and circulated before the Recess? Many of our constituents are deeply interested in this matter, and we wish to have an opportunity of consulting them in regard to it. Perhaps the Lord Advocate will follow the example of the Postmaster General and give us now a slight sketch of the scope and contents of the Bill. If he is unable to do that, will he give us a full opportunity of discussing this Bill on the Second Reading.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I have no doubt the House will have full opportunity of discussing the Bill. I cannot undertake to have it printed and circulated before Whitsuntide, but I will do my best.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 379.]

SUPERANNUATION.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Anstruther be a Member of the Select Committee on Superannuation."—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I wish to call the attention of the House to the peculiar position in which we are placed with regard to this Bill. Its principle has never been discussed.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman can only object to the names of the Committee, and cannot refer to the merits of the Bill.

MR. STOREY: My argument is that, as the principle of the Bill has not been discussed at any of its stages through the House, it is extremely important that the Committee which has to consider it should be more liberally constituted than it is at the present moment. Therefore, I object to the first name. There has been no explanation given of the Bill—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is no reason why the name of the hon. Gentleman in question should be objected to. The Question is, "That Mr. Anstruther be a Member of the Committee."

MR. STOREY: I object to the name of Mr. Anstruther being added to the Committee, because the Committee as proposed will give a preponderance to one set of opinions and make the decision of the Committee practically settled before it meets. As proposed, there will only be three independent Liberal Members upon the Committee and one Irish Member; while, on the other hand, there are seven Members who have practically made up their minds on the subject, four of them being more or less officials. It would be extremely inconvenient and unfair that this Committee should be thus constituted. Instead of Mr. Anstruther, I contend there should be placed on the Committee another Member of the minority in the House, so that there should be some fair sort of discussion. I shall vote against the name of Mr. Anstruther being added to the Committee.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I hope the hon. Member will not persist in his opposition. The Government, as a matter of fact, instead of being over-represented, are under-represented on the Committee, and have a majority of only one. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that our only desire with regard to this Bill is that it should be amply discussed in Committee.

(6.30.) Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 248; Noes 76.—(Div. List, No. 146).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Bristowe be a Member of the said Committee."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I venture to suggest to the First Lord of the Treasury the desirability of adding two other Members to this Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) takes great interest in this question, and he has shown that interest during all the stages of the Bill. I think he ought therefore to be included in the Committee. If the right hon. Gentleman will to-morrow or the next day add two more members the question might probably be settled.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: The First Lord of the Treasury would have no objection to add two Members to the Committee. I should, however, like to point out that the Committee was constituted a small Committee at the request of hon. Members on that side of the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Craig, Mr. John Ellis, Sir John Gorst, Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Mr. Hunter, Mr. King, Mr. Jackson, Mr. MacNeill, and Sir Matthew White Ridley nominated other Members of the Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMENDMENT BILL [Lords.](No. 182.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): It is not my intention to trespass at any length on the time of the House in reference to this matter, and I think the First Lord of the Treasury will bear witness that I and those hon. Members who are acting with me abstained from all discussion of this measure on the Report stage. I then asked the First Lord if he could fix a day for the consideration of the Bill, when, so far as I was concerned, the discussion would be slight. He did not do me the honour of acceding to that request, and now on a Government day, when important matters in reference to a Vote for the country are coming on, he puts this Bill first on the list. It is neither fair to the right hon. Gentleman's supporters, nor to the other Members of this House, to place a measure which must be subject to slight discussion before a Vote of that kind, and to which we are looking forward with great interest. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would facilitate matters if he postpones this Bill until to-morrow. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman will accede to my request, and so I will reserve my right to address the House.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): If the right hon. Gentleman agrees, I should be pleased not to interpose with my important Amendment, which is on the paper. Therefore, I appeal to the First Lord to consent to the adjournment.

MR. MAC NEILL: On a point of Order, I reserve my right to address the House.

MR. SPEAKER: Both hon. Gentlemen having spoken, they therefore cannot, according to the Rules, speak again. The Question is, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

THE COURSE OF BUSINESS.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): The Committee and Her Majesty's Government will feel at the present period of the Session, and in the circumstances of Parliament, that we have reached a point at which it is not unreasonable that the House should be desirous of further information in respect to the probable course of Business and intentions of the Government with regard to finance and its measures, and so far foreshadowing the probable termination of the Session, and what may follow their termination. We have reached a period of the evening at which I doubt whether there will be more time perhaps than to discuss the variety of subjects which we have notice hon. Members intend—and in many cases with good cause—to introduce to the notice of the Committee. I should be sorry to say or do anything that would in any way retard the progress of the financial business of the Government, and I would, therefore, venture to make a suggestion which I think might be for the convenience of the Committee. I believe that it is advisable that those Gentlemen who feel it necessary to call the attention of the House to special subjects should, as we have now reached 7 o'clock in the evening, have the field open to them for that purpose, so that I do not propose to enter upon any general question, or invite any general declaration from the Government on the present occasion. But I think the Committee will feel that the time is approaching when such a declaration may reasonably be expected. I do not desire them to name a particular opportunity or a particular date; but the time is approaching, and I am not so anxious for its early arrival as I am that the statement when delivered to the House should be so far as possible an explicit statement to enable us to form a fair and reasonable judgment upon what we have to expect. There will be no difficulty in finding opportunities for the purpose, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman, that so far as I am concerned, in pointing to an eventual explanation of this kind, I do so not in the slightest degree with the idea or desire that it is likely to be made the subject of any prolonged Debate, but merely with the idea, on the other hand, that it may be simple and short, and that it will be greatly to the convenience and advantage of all portions of the House without any distinction of Party. I do not know whether the Government intend to follow up this Vote, if it is reported, with an Appropriation Bill. If they do, a stage of the Bill may offer a convenient opportunity at some future and not very distant date. If not, it may be found that there are demands by the Government for further appropriation of the time of the House, and there could be no difficulty by arrangement, and by a general amicable understanding, in thus making provision. I, therefore, confine myself at present to repeating that the time is coming, and I am sure the Government will feel it is so when some explicit information should be given to us as to the progress of public business, and the measures with which it is intended to persevere, and the probable time which those measures and proposals are likely to occupy. The time is coming—and when it does come it is not likely to fall into the category of what we call contentious matter—when an opportunity may very easily be arranged and full notice given to the House for such explanation as may be necessary. Perhaps when it does come it will be sufficient for the guidance of the House to reasonable and practical conclusions upon the future. I do not wish the Government to say now if they will do it on a particular day. I do not know precisely when the Whitsuntide recess is to commence, nor on what date it is likely to terminate—and I do not ask them to fix a particular day when this explanation is to be made; I only ask them to recognise it in principle, and to give the House an assurance that there will be no wilful loss of time in giving the explanation to the House, with a view to enable Members to form their judgment, and to enable the country also to form judgment upon pending events.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think we have reason to be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the moderation of the tone of his observations. He raises the view that the time is approaching when some explicit declaration on the part of the Government would be desirable in the public interest, and is to be expected by both sides of the House. And he does not propose to pin the Government down to a particular day or week, and he expresses his own opinion that at any rate the time cannot be far distant. Well, Sir, I agree with my right hon. Friend in the views he takes on this matter. I think with him that a proper occasion may be easily found, by mutual arrangement between the two sides of the House, when the statement he asks for may be given; and, in the meantime, following out the suggestion which he has hinted at, rather than explicitly made, it would, perhaps, be best to defer until that occasion arises any statement on the part of the Government with regard to the state of public Business.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): As we are now approaching the question of the Vote on Account I have a point to raise before the Committee deals with the Colonial Vote, and I am obliged to anticipate my hon. Friend.

LINLITHGOW PALACE.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I rise to Order. I have a Notice on the Paper referring to a Vote which comes before that referred to by the hon. Member, and I presume I shall be allowed to go on with it. I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by £100. I do not desire a Division on this matter. All I want is some information from the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) as to the intentions of the Government respecting Linlithgow Palace. On several occasions during the past few years I have called attention to the bad state of repair which the palaces and public buildings in Scotland have been allowed to fall into. There is a general opinion in Scotland that ever since the Union it has been the policy of the British Government to permit those places to go to ruin, with the view of getting them out of the way as soon as possible. With regard to this particular palace, I may say that the Edinburgh Architectural Association, and other associations in Scotland, have expressed the opinion that the sum of £250 which is proposed to be spent both this year and another £250 next year is not anything like sufficient to put this palace in a proper state of repair. I have had a number of letters from these associations which I will not take up the time of the Committee in reading, although I should like to quote one or two extracts just to show what is the opinion of these bodies on this matter. Referring to Linlithgow Palace the Edinburgh Architectural Association passed the following Resolution:—

“That the association feels that the buildings of the palace are presently in a critical state and express a hope that without delay such steps will be taken by the Government as will prevent the further internal decay of the palace through exposure to the weather and remove the immediate risk of the masonry falling, and thereby causing serious destruction to the remainder of the fabric.”

I may here mention that I have read that this building was wantonly destroyed to a large extent by British troops in 1746, and has never since been put into a thorough state of repair. Within the last few days I have received a copy of the Report of the Committee of Council of the Edinburgh Architectural Association, signed by the hon. sec., in which they say—

“Looking to the extent of the buildings the sum of £500 which the Committee understand is proposed to be included for repairs, by two instalments in the Estimates of this year and next, is quite insufficient to ensure the safety of the buildings.”

I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give a full and complete answer as to what is proposed to be done in this matter, and that he will also consider the representations made by this Association, which are well worthy of his attention. No doubt other hon. Members take as much interest in this question as I do, although my profession is such as leads me to notice public buildings especially.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Item of £15,000, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, be reduced by £100.”—(Mr. Morton.)

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The state of matters with regard to Linlithgow Palace I can very easily explain to the hon. Member for Peterborough. The grounds upon which we have asked for £250 for this year are that the whole matter has been carefully considered by our surveyor in Scotland—who is a very able officer—and he has reported to us that £500 will be sufficient for the purpose of preserving the palace from decay and further ruin. Another proposal which has been made to us is that the palace should be practically restored, and made in point of fact a habitable building—that it should be restored to the position of a palace of dignity and rank. Well, Sir, that is a proposal I cannot undertake to entertain. We believe that the sum we have asked for is sufficient for the time for which it is asked to preserve the building from any real danger of decay or accident. If, however, the hon. Member (Mr. Morton) should submit to me on the part of the various Associations he has referred to, or any other body, any reasons for thinking that the plans we have proposed and the money we have asked for are not sufficient to maintain in safety and preserve intact the natural beauty of the ruins of the palace, I shall be happy to consider them, but I cannot on behalf of the Government undertake to entertain any proposals that may be made for the restoration of Linlithgow Palace.

MR. M'LAGAN (Linlithgow): The right hon. Gentleman has stated that a proposal has been submitted to him for restoring this palace again to the position of a habitable Royal Palace. I do not go that length, but I think a part of it at least should be so far restored as to be made available as a museum. There was one statement which the right hon. Gentleman made that I received with pleasure—namely, that if the sum voted to-day is not sufficient to put the buildings in order and preserve the ruins, he will be prepared to ask the Committee to vote a larger sum. At the same time, if he could see his way to carry out my suggestion, and add to its attraction as a beautiful ruin that of a museum, I think it would be of great advantage to the people who visit it.

MR. MORTON: I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for what he has said, and I wish to ask him if he will let the Association have a copy of the Report of the surveyor in Scotland he referred to. The right hon. Gentleman, I presume, quite understands that the Association I have referred to do not consider £500 sufficient to put Linlithgow Palace into such a state of repair as to preserve it; and I will take care that they shall have an opportunity of presenting to the right hon. Gentleman any further observations they have to make on this important matter. I now ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I should like to point out that although what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) said was very satisfactory as far as it went, he did not express any opinion upon what I understand to be the main point of the position. The Edinburgh Architectural Society are of opinion that there is only one possible way by which the ruin can be preserved, and that is by roofing it, and that this £500 falls short of what is required.

MR. PLUNKET: In answer to the hon. Member for Peterborough I may say it is not usual to lay these Reports on the Table of the House. I shall, however, have pleasure in informing him of the substance of the report of the Surveyor in Scotland, but I have not a copy of it with me just now. As regards the point raised by the hon. Member who has just sat down, I cannot undertake to promise to put a new roof on this building, but we will protect it in every way necessary to preserve it from further decay.

Kew Gardens.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I want to say a word in reference to Kew Gardens. Up to somewhere about 1888 people were not allowed to take into Kew Gardens a basket or a packet of sandwiches, for fear they might throw paper on the walks or grass, and in that way damage these gardens. Well, Sir, after a good deal of trouble, the Government consented to the erection of a kiosk, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the management of it is distinctly bad. The tea is poured out from a big tin can, in which it is all boiled together, and this vile concoction, and coffee just as bad, is sold to the public, and served by German waiters, who are almost ignorant of the English language. I paid a visit to these gardens last Sunday, and I heard a great many people complaining about these things, and I hear that the management is just as bad on public holidays when people from London go down there to enjoy themselves. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to look into this matter. Then I should like to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of making the ordinary summer houses in Kew Gardens brighter. With the manifest advantages Kew Gardens possess, they might be made very much more attractive. I hope the First Commissioner will look into these matters, for when he does he generally finds we are in the right. We had to agitate some time for the kiosk before it was erected, but now we have it we desire to see an improvement in the existing state of things. I might add, too, that the kiosk is not large enough for the public requirements on holiday occasions, especially when we are blessed with such waiters as are now employed there. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will direct his attention to this matter and give us a satisfactory reply.

MR. EDWARD HOLDEN (Walsall): I could hardly believe the other day that the right hon. Gentleman was serious when he stated that in order to benefit students Kew Gardens are not open to the public before noon. To-day I went to the National Gallery, and I found that although students were at work the public were admitted. Why should not the same thing be allowed at Kew Gardens? These Gardens belong to the public—not only to Londoners, but to the whole country; and I say it is a perfect disgrace that they should not be open before twelve o'clock. On one of my visits to Kew Gardens, I asked some of the workmen whom I saw about whether there was any reason why the Gardens were not open earlier—I generally find one can get from the lower officials more information than from the higher—and they told me they did not know of any reason. I asked if they had ever seen students at the Gardens, and they said that occasionally they saw some. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to be considerate towards the public, and I most strongly press upon him the desirability of opening Kew Gardens not later than eight or nine o'clock in the morning.

MR. PLUNKET: The hon. Member for Mid-Cork (Dr. Tanner) has some locus standi for bringing forward his complaint, because he is really the author of the kiosk in Kew Gardens, and I may add that it has been a very popular institution there. Since he put his question respecting Kew Gardens on the Paper I have instituted inquiries, and I must say that so far as I can learn the hon. Member must have been unfortunate in the particular moment he was there, and in the waiters he had to address, because I am sure that the general opinion is that the refreshments at Kew Gardens are as good as can be expected in such a hurried entertainment, and that the same can be said of the waiters. It is impossible for the caterer to always have at hand a large staff of waiters, and, considering how the number of visitors to Kew Gardens fluctuates, some allowance should be made. Then I am asked about opening before twelve o'clock. The only demand so far as I know that the Gardens should be opened before that time comes from people who live in the immediate neighbourhood.

MR. E. HOLDEN: I live in the South-west, and I have not been able to get in when I desired.

MR. PLUNKET: The reason why the Gardens are not open earlier is because it would be necessary to increase the staff. We should have to engage more men if the public were admitted in the early morning, but if there were a substantial demand on the part of the public generally, the additional expense would not be allowed to stand in the way. The view that we take is that Kew is not only a place where the public can go to enjoy the pretty sights and pleasant gardens, but it is a great school of horticulture, not only for England and the Colonies, but for the whole world. There is no other place like it in the world, and very often students come from long distances to avail themselves of the advantages which the Gardens afford. I may say that any person who wishes to go there to take photographs or for any purpose of that kind will find no difficulty whatever, and I promise the hon. Member that if he will apply to the Director, he will at once receive the permission without any difficulty.

MR. E. HOLDEN: What about the new guide?

MR. PLUNKET: It is approaching completion, and will, I believe, be published in a few days.

(7.32) DR. TANNER: I should like to suggest that the tea at Kew Gardens should be served in small tea-pots instead of being drawn from one of those horrible apparatus which are in use in prisons, as many of us know. I should also like to suggest with respect to Hyde Park that at certain times in the day, at least, cabs and bicycles should be permitted to go through. Perhaps at a certain time of the day the aristocracy must be permitted to use the parks at the expense of the people, but I think during business hours cabs and hansoms should be allowed to drive through. The congestion in the Brompton Road, at Hyde Park Corner, and even at the Marble Arch is something terrible, and now that the timber pavement is up people are put to great inconvenience. The opening of the park would greatly relieve the obstruction, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider the matter. Then there is another matter in which I am not the only person who takes an interest, that is the question of plants on the Terrace. The matter was mentioned in 1883, and there is no doubt that something could be done. This portion of London is not particularly exposed, and is no colder than Paris, where orange and lemon trees are cultivated with great success. I have spoken to some of the officials at Kew and they tell me that plants could be placed along the Terrace without any difficulty. Hon. Members might have smiled when I put the question this afternoon. I think we ought to have some eucalyptus trees in pots on the terrace. You have plenty of them at Kew, and they would make the Terrace much more attractive. I should like also to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the want of ventilation in the Ministers' lobby.

THE CHAIRMAN (MR. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): Order, order! That does not arise on this Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER.

(7.43.) DR. TANNER: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider the question of plants that I have mentioned. Yesterday afternoon and evening this place was turned into a sort of flower garden for the benefit of some friends of the Home Secretary, and anybody who saw that display will know that what I want can easily be done. Then I should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a sanitary matter. The gallery outside is really in a pestilential condition, and I am sure hon. Members will bear me out that during the warm weather of the last few days the atmosphere has been very bad. There is no top ventilation. The same remark applies to the lobbies outside the Committee Rooms, and owing to the absence of ventilation there the atmosphere is in a dangerously bad state. I say this is an absolute disgrace. I have gone thoroughly into the drainage system of this House, and I say that it is not what it ought to be. The main system is good, but there should be traps to all the smaller lavatories. We hear complaints of the atmosphere at the east end of this House, and that arises from the want of traps. This is a matter of great importance, and I hope some practical improvement will be achieved.

*MR. MORTON: I have a notice of Amendment down; but, as time is limited, I will not press it. But I should like to ask a question about the salaries of the lower class officials of this House. I think they are not sufficiently well paid, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take that matter into his consideration. We have heard that the Home Secretary had a party or soirée on the Terrace yesterday. I am only interested to know whether any part of the expense will appear in the Estimates, and also whether we may invite our constituents to a soirée on the Terrace and make use of the precincts of this House?

MR. PLUNKET: I have nothing to do with the salaries of the officials; I have to do with the buildings.

MR. MORTON: Who has?

MR. PLUNKET: In answer to the hon. Member for Cork, I may say I am afraid he will not make much impression on me personally, because I am opposed to the introduction of plants. The scheme was tried, but the plants were taken away. My own personal feeling is that they would not be any improvement to the general effect of such a building as this; but if there were an expression of opinion in favour of the plan by a majority of the Members I should not allow my own personal opinions to interfere.

DR. TANNER: On the subject of the kitchen I should like to say that I have heard a large number of complaints. The money advanced through the office of the Serjeant-at-Arms, £1,000, is not sufficient, and we shall never get the service properly effective until we grant a larger amount. I do not suppose I should be in order in moving an increase in the Vote; but I think another £500 ought to be added, and I hope the Government will take this matter into consideration, and see that the convenience of Members is properly studied.

MR. PLUNKET: The kitchen does not come under my Department, and I am not a member of the Committee, but I will communicate what the hon. Gentleman has said to the Chairman of the Committee.

THE PERSIAN TOBACCO CONCESSION.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I asked a question the other day of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and, allowing myself to be carried away by my feelings, I made use of language for which I was very properly rebuked by Mr. Speaker. I therefore think it my duty to lay before the House the facts in regard to the intervention of Her Majesty's Government in regard to this Tobacco Corporation in order that they may form an opinion as to whether I was right or wrong in the allegations I made. On the 8th March, 1890, the Shah of Persia gave a concession to a Mr. Talbot, who engaged to pay out of the profits of the concession when it was carried into effect a sum of £15,000 per annum to the Government of the Shah, and one-quarter of all profits. I do not believe that Mr. Talbot actually paid anything to the Persian Government, and his promises were all prospective.

arising out of profits to be made. On the 3rd May Mr. Talbot sold this concession to the Eastern Concessions Syndicate Company. The usual thing when persons wish to bring out companies, and wish to withhold their own names, is that they call themselves a syndicate, and get up a company more or less bogus. Then these syndicates, unless they are intended to bring out other companies, disappear entirely from the face of the City. It is not stated what amount Mr. Talbot was paid for the concession which he sold to this Eastern Concessions Syndicate Company, and, judging from the dates, I should think that in all probability this company and Mr. Talbot were the same individuals. On the 3rd of November the Eastern Concessions Syndicate Company sold this concession, for which absolutely nothing had been paid, for £300,000 to the Tobacco Corporation of Persia. A portion of this money was paid in cash and a portion in shares. But not only were they to receive this amount, but they were also to have a number of founders' shares, which were to draw half of all profits over fifteen per cent. On the same day a prospectus was brought out asking the public to subscribe to the shares of the Imperial Tobacco Corporation of Persia, with a capital of £650,000. The prospectus is much after the usual manner of prospectuses, except that it seems to me rather more exaggerated in its statements than prospectuses usually are. The people who were unwise enough to take shares were asked to imagine that the profits were likely to reach as much as £371,000 per annum, or, in other words, that the Corporation was going to give a return of more than one hundred per cent. on all the capital really expended. In the present year the Government of the Shah found that the people of Persia were indignant at this concession altogether. The effect would be to raise the price of tobacco about one hundred per cent., and really the thing was, in fact, a regie. All tobacco cultivated was to go into the hands of the Corporation, who were to sell it, it appears, at any price they liked. In any case the price must have been excessive if they were to make this large profit. When the people almost rebelled against this concession, the Shah re-considered the matter and determined to abrogate it, and now comes in the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. I have asked for the contract, but have not been able to obtain it; but we were told at one time that there was a clause in the contract permitting arbitration. But the Shah refused or objected to arbitration, and, therefore, the good offices of Her Majesty's Government were employed on both sides. We have not got this contract, but common sense tells us that if there was any arbitration clause it was not put in with any idea that the Government of the Shah intended to abrogate the concession. What occurred in Persia we do not exactly know, because, although papers have been promised, we have not yet got them. I have elicited that the Persian Government were advised by Her Majesty's Government to pay the sum of £500,000 to the Corporation in consideration of having abrogated the contract. Have the Government looked into the contracts; have they estimated the value of the property of the Corporation; have they discovered what part of the £350,000 has been bonâ fide expended in giving effect to the concession? I gather that they have done absolutely nothing of the kind. The Corporation asked for £650,000, and then said that they would be satisfied with £500,000, and without making any inquiries Her Majesty's Representative at Teheran advised the Shah to pay that sum. We know the pressure put upon the Shah in this matter. We know perfectly well, from what appeared in the Times, that he thought he would have recourse to the Russian Government to get this money which was being extorted by the British Government for the benefit of these extraordinary speculators. Look at the position of the Corporation. None of the £350,000 really passed; and when I asked about that sum to-day, I was told that the Corporation had expended about £150,000 in Persia, so that between these sums there is an enormous difference. The Shah will receive what the Corporation says is worth about £100,000 in buildings and tobacco. I ask the Committee whether, under these circumstances, it was proper for the Government to interfere?

When Lord Rosebery was head of the Foreign Office a Circular Despatch was sent round to Her Majesty's Representatives telling them they should be exceedingly careful in taking up cases of concessions and endeavouring to obtain money from foreign Governments. I think in all cases where a concession like this is obtained it must be left to the person who gets it to negotiate with the foreign Government, as the matter does not concern us. If it is desirable that these speculators should receive the support of the Government it seems most extraordinary that the Government, with these facts before them, and being able to see the contracts, should have pressed the Persian Government to give £500,000. The Persian Government will not get the money at less than five per cent., and so the unfortunate people of the country will have a charge of £25,000 a year imposed on them to pay a sum the greater portion of which has not been spent by these speculators who will simply divide the spoils among themselves. I have laid the facts before the Committee, and I think it will agree that I have been justified in what I have said.

*(8.7.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): I regret that the hon. Member did not wait to see the Papers before making what I cannot but call an attack on the Government. I have already explained to the hon Gentleman and the House that negotiations are still proceeding; the matter has not yet arrived at an issue, but I have very little doubt that very shortly a decision will be arrived at. Papers are in an active course of preparation, and will be immediately presented to the House. In the meantime, I may point out one or two mistakes into which the hon. Gentleman has fallen. In the first place, I maintain that the Government and Her Majesty's Representative were in no way called upon to inquire into the financial status or proceedings of this Corporation. A concession had been granted without the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government, which took no part in it. The concession was sold by Major Talbot to a Corporation—the Persian Tobacco Corporation. The Corporation got to work and expended a certain amount of money in Persia, and for a considerable time affairs went smoothly. Then the occasion arose when, in consequence of disturbances, it seemed good to the Persian Government to cancel the concession. Thereupon, a decree was issued by the Government against the concession. The concession contains an Arbitration Clause under which, in the event of misunderstandings arising between the concessionaire and the Government, the matter is to be referred to arbitration, and the words clearly cover this case. What was the action of the Corporation? The Corporation came to Her Majesty's Government and said, "This concession, which it has seemed good to the Persian Government to grant, and from which it may be presumed they were going to derive some benefit, has been suddenly abrogated. We would wish to submit the question of compensation to us to arbitration." The proper course—the only course—which Her Majesty's Government could take—and which they did take—was to suggest to the Shah and the Persian Government the desirability of submitting the question to arbitration. Negotiations went on for some little time. The Corporation pressed for arbitration in the matter; they were perfectly ready to refer their whole claim to arbitration. The Persian Government were not prepared at that time to accept arbitration, and negotiations went on between the Persian Government and the Corporation. The demand by the Corporation of £650,000 for compensation was met by an offer on the part of the Persian Government of £300,000. The two parties, however, did not agree, and negotiations still went on. Her Majesty's Government were again asked to press on the Persian Government the desirability, as they would not agree, of submitting the whole question in dispute to arbitration, and Sir F. C. Lascelles brought that consideration before the Persian Government. Soon after that the Persian Government and the Corporation agreed upon the sum of £500,000. The hon. Member spoke of the £500,000 being extorted; Her Majesty's Government never pressed for that or any particular sum, all they pressed for was that the whole claim should be submitted to arbitration. The Persian Government did not see their way to arbitration, and made an offer to pay £500,000, and take over the assets. That offer has been accepted. I am afraid it is impossible for me to go into further details as to what has passed since. As I have said before, the matter is not yet concluded, therefore it would be improper on my part if, while negotiations are going on, I said anything further. I assure the hon. Gentleman that Papers are almost ready for presentation, and we expect a settlement will be arrived at in a very short time between the Persian Bank—who are acting for the Persian Government in this matter—and the Corporation. As soon as that settlement is arrived at a full account of the part the Government have taken in the matter will be laid before the House.

*(8.17.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): We have now had three accounts—that of the Times; that of my hon. Friend below the Gangway, and that of the hon. Gentleman opposite, and they all agree. From the very first moment I had an opportunity of reading an account of the transaction in the Times, I felt, I must say, that it was a very doubtful case, and might become a very painful one. The first point on which no explanation has been given by the hon. Gentleman opposite, and the point on which I think the public would wish to have an explanation, is: Into whose pocket did the real money go—the money, that is to say, which some private influence on the Persian Government has put into the pockets of one or more private individuals? I accept the statement of the hon. Gentleman that the influence was not the influence of Her Majesty's Government; but it was the influence of someone belonging to this nation, and someone whose cause has been taken up by the Government. I do not think the British Government ought to have taken up this case at all unless they were prepared to give the House of Commons and the country explanations which would set the national conscience at ease. What has happened? Some private jobbers have got from the Persian Government a concession which it is very difficult to estimate at a less value than three or four millions, and with a nominal capital of £650,000, and a real capital of £300,000, the prospectus promised profits of £370,000 a year. That would be a net profit of about £300,000 to be taken from the Persian people, and given by the Persian Government to one or more private individuals for motives of which we know nothing whatever. The Government should have inquired—perhaps they have inquired—as to what those motives were before they took up the cause of these gentlemen. Anyone who has read the Oriental history of the last twenty years knows what tremendous pressure can be exercised by Ministers upon one of these small countries, and on a country which, to some extent, is a dependent country, as this story proves. If the Government had left the matter alone these jobbers would have got certainly not more than £300,000 in what is called compensation; I very much doubt if they would have got anything at all. Now, my belief is that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has as high a standard with regard to financial matters as any man in the House, and I should be very glad indeed if he would look into this matter himself. We must remember that this power of pressure in commercial matters on the part of the British Government is a most valuable one when used in protecting legitimate commerce, and it should never be misused by doing injustice to half-organised and weak countries for the sake of people who cannot be thought to be pursuing legitimate commerce. The hon. Gentleman opposite used one expression which I was glad to hear—he said the thing had not come to a definite issue. I hope that means that the transaction is not complete, and I trust that the action which my hon. Friend has taken to-day will prevent the Persian Government being taxed, not to the extent of £25,000 a year, for the money would not be borrowed at five per cent., but to a far larger extent, to the end of time.

*(8.23.) MR. SEYMOUR KEEL (Elgin and Nairn): I was surprised when the hon. Gentleman opposite<sup>attach</sup> us that the individual who origi<sup>represent</sup>- got this concession was Major Talbot. There are so many Talbots engaged in the different stages of this affair that I think he must have made a mistake. I do not think he could have meant Major A. C. Talbot, who is the Political Representative of the Indian Government in Persia. I take it that it would be perfectly absurd that he, in his official seat, should have taken up this concession.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: It is not the same person. There are two gentlemen named Major Talbot. The concessionee is Major G. H. Talbot.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: As a matter of fact, Major A. C. Talbot and Major G. H. Talbot are brothers, and they are family connections of Lord Salisbury, which, no doubt, made the management of the private negotiations much easier. I think my hon. Friend put the case too mildly when he said that pressure only came in when the question of £650,000 or £500,000 was at issue between the Corporation and the Persian Government. My belief is that the transaction took place something in this way. Major A. C. Talbot, Her Majesty's Representative in Persia, gets out his brother, letting him know that something very fine indeed is to be got by a little judicious management.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: At the time the concession was made Major A. C. Talbot was not in Persia.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I have known Major Talbot for a quarter of a century, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that he has spent an enormous part of that time in service in or near the Persian Gulf, and his absences have not been long. I think I remember that he has occupied some position there longer than eighteen months. He has long been acquainted with Persia, and had all the opportunities I have mentioned, if he chose to use them, and could put up his brother and aid him in getting a very good thing if he went out to Persia. A Political Resident is all-powerful where such private and semi-private matters are concerned. I know this, having seen something of the Hyderabad-Deccan scandal, which was the subject of an inquiry in this House, the P&W was in Hyderabad in time to be the first to expose the swindle. In my mind the getting out of this brother and putting pressure on the Persian Government to entertain the matter of the concession was probably compassed in exactly the same way as the Hyderabad Government was duped into practically giving away a million of money for nothing at all to certain Europeans. As the hon. Gentleman did not inform us to the contrary, we must assume that Mr. G. H. Talbot went to Persia with the knowledge of his brother, now Her Majesty's Representative in the Persian Gulf. We are now told he went there unknown to Her Majesty's Government, and obtained this gigantic concession unknown to the Government. Is the hon. Gentleman prepared to say that he obtained it unknown to his brother?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: His brother was not in Persia at the time; he was an Anglo-Indian official in Turkish territory.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I do not know what he was doing in Turkish territory, as he has always been engaged at or near the Persian Gulf. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell us in what part of Turkish territory he was; how long he was absent from Persia; and what was to prevent him knowing what his brother was doing? There is no reason why the affair should not have been planted between the two brothers, and the Government have made no inquiries on the point. Or if they have made any inquiry, the hon. Gentleman has not told us that Her Majesty's Government are prepared to advise the Indian Government to take due notice of such a matter having been arranged between their public servant and his brother. Although he was not at that moment technically Her Majesty's Representative, he had spent years in service in Persia, and must be held to have a thorough knowledge of matters which would enable him to plan out such a concession and bring the required pressure to bear on the Persian Government.

(8.30.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Whether this was the case of a "plant" between these two brothers or not is a question which I do not intend to go into. But the Government have admitted enough to give much cause for suspicion. The first point which was left in doubt by the Under Secretary of State, and which I think suggests some serious questions, is: What is the nature of this Arbitration Clause? An arbitration clause in a contract usually is a clause providing for a reference to arbitration of differences that may arise between the two parties to the contract; but here we have a suspension of the contract altogether. Here the contract itself is nullified and put to an end by the Persian Government. The hon. Gentleman has not told us, and I should say that it is unlikely, according to the usual practice in these cases, that the Arbitration Clause is one which contemplates a suspension of the contract. Such a clause usually comes into force should a difficulty arise in the interpretation of the contract. Therefore, I do not think that the Committee will be in a position to form a correct judgment upon this matter till we see the Arbitration Clause. The hon. Gentleman tells us that the Persian Government refused to go to arbitration, although the Corporation was willing to do so. Why did the Persian Government refuse? Who suggested this arbitration? I do not think the Persian Government would have fared worse by going to arbitration than it eventually seems to have fared in the arrangement that was made, because the Persian Government was asked by the Corporation to pay compensation to the extent of £600,000, and ultimately they paid £500,000, although at first they offered them no more than £300,000. And I must say, judging from the facts, that that was very ample compensation, because it seems to be very far in excess of what the actual business of the company was worth, including the stock-in-trade and the expenditure which the company had incurred. Therefore, when we find that the Persian Government persisted in offering only £300,000 and then suddenly gave £500,000, we must conclude that the operation was only owing to the beneficent intervention of Her Majesty's Government, because nothing less would have induced the Persian Government to acquiesce in what was an exorbitant demand. If that is not pressure I do not know what pressure is. Surely nothing less than pressure applied by a powerful State, such as Great Britain, would be sufficient to induce the Persian Government to make such a concession to this Corporation as to pay them £200,000 extra. The hon. Gentleman has adverted to the circumstances under which this was done. I am bound to say if there is any case of a country where the power of the Foreign Office ought to be carefully used, it is the case of a country like Persia. Persia is a country which occupies a very peculiar position. It lies between, so to speak, two great Powers. One of these great powers is Russia, and the other is the Indian Empire; and if Persia is dependent upon any country, it is dependent no less upon its Indian than upon its Northern neighbour. Under these circumstances, our Government ought to be very careful not to press Persia unduly, not to make the Government of this country unpopular in Persia, and not to urge undue demands. Considering what the attitude of the other neighbours of Persia is, I should have thought that this was one of the cases in which the general principles that guide the Foreign Office in dealing with other Powers ought to have been very scrupulously applied. The Committee knows what are these principles. If hon. Members will consult the Papers laid before the House in 1886, they will find there laid down, following the Circular issued by Lord Granville in 1881, the principles that ought to be applied by the Foreign Office in its endeavours to support British subjects in pursuit of their commercial enterprise abroad, and especially in their efforts to obtain concessions from Foreign Powers. It was there laid down by Lord Granville, and afterwards by Lord Rosebery, and so far as I know it has hitherto been uniformly followed by both Parties in the State, that attempts to obtain concessions ought to be dealt with by the Government, and by Her Majesty's Representatives abroad, with most cautious care and tact, not only because it is desirable not to waste our influence, which should be reserved for political purposes, upon mere pecuniary matters, but also because a great deal of suspicion is likely to attach to the Foreign Office and its Representatives if they endeavour to press the claims of their own subjects. These are the principles which will be found to be in force, and the cases stated in the Despatches amply justify the view I take. I put it to the Under Secretary that the action of the Government was not taken in obtaining a concession but in endeavouring to obtain compensation.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: In obtaining arbitration.

MR. BRYCE: I must repeat that I look at the matter by the result. What is contended on the part of the Government is that all our Representative did was to ask the Persian Government to go to arbitration. What we see is that the Persian Government which offered £300,000 found itself obliged to pay £500,000; and we can only account for that change by attributing it to the pressure and undue influence exercised by Her Majesty's Government through their Representative. I submit therefore to the Committee that in a matter of this kind, so far as my present information goes, the principles which ought to guide the Foreign Office seem to have been transgressed; and that that influence, which ought to be reserved for purely political cases, or at any rate for the promotion of commercial enterprise and not for the purpose of promoting mere personal speculation, has in this instance, so far as I can learn, been abused. Her Majesty's Government will be bound, when the proper times comes, to give a much more complete justification than they have given to-night for conduct which on the face of it has the appearance of being unfriendly towards Persia and calculated to bring Her Majesty's Government into disrepute both in Persia and wherever else it is known.

*(9.10.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I wish to say a few words on the tobacco concession in Persia, and I should not have said anything at all about it but for what has been stated in this House. I think this is too grave a matter to pass without a protest against the very insufficient explanation that has been given by Her Majesty's Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He began his speech by saying that my hon. Friend the Member for

Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had been guilty of several inaccuracies. But, Sir, so far as I heard, I failed to find a single point upon which any inaccuracy was pointed out. On the contrary, as the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman went on, the case appeared to me to be graver and graver, and to require more and more explanation. I wish to state what the facts are as they appear to me, without any knowledge of them beyond what has passed in this House to-night. Two gentlemen, said to be brothers, alleged to be officers of the Queen, one of them holding high diplomatic service, hailing from Hatfield, stated in the Debate to be relations of the Prime Minister — statements not denied — a concession obtained from Persia, upon what terms? Talk about company-mongering! I have the published prospectus in my hand. Here is a capital of £650,000; a profit estimate of £558,000 a year; 80 per cent.; Persia to have £15,000 a year and a small share of surplus profits out of it, and to be got out of the unhappy Persians for the payment of shareholders' £543,000 net profit. You have to go back, in my opinion, to the old days of the jobbery under the East India Company to find anything more utterly atrocious than this affair. Then you find popular indignation in Persia aroused; the Persian Government quite unable to withstand it, and I do not wonder at it. Even in a country like Persia there is such a thing as public opinion. Poor Persia, obliged to cancel the concession, offers £300,000 to buy off these robbers, and it is refused. Why? Because they have got the English Foreign Office at their back. It has been owned by the right hon. Gentleman that our diplomats, our representatives, in Persia pressed upon the Shah's Government that they ought to refer this thing to arbitration. Why did they not turn round and say: "This thing is a swindle; £300,000 is double the money you have spent; take your plunder and go?" The explanation given to-night casts a slur upon officers and public men, casts a slur upon the English Government, and casts a slur upon the Diplomatic Service, and cannot rest where it is. It must be cleared up—I sincerely hope it can be cleared up—and I think these Papers must be produced at once. They have been promised; we must have them at once, and we must have the fullest explanation. There is only one other thing that I want to say, and that is that these Papers and this explanation must come before a settlement is completed, and not after. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the matter was not completed, and it ought not to be completed. If there is any truth in the facts as they appear to any impartial man who has heard the Debate, and has heard the lame and impotent explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, I say that, for the honour of England and for the honour of our statesmen, the transaction ought not to be allowed to be completed until the Papers are before us, and until a full explanation has been given of the facts.

*(9.15.) MR. MORTON: I do not desire to prolong this Debate, because I understand that Papers have been promised, but it must be quite obvious that the matter cannot rest where it is at the present moment, because it has been proved, so far as you can prove these things, that the influence and power of the British Government have been used to induce, in some way, the Persian Government to find a large sum of money, said to be £500,000. It is also mentioned that some of the parties concerned in what you may fairly and properly call plunder are not only officers of Her Majesty, but relations of the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman—I am not making any accusation against the right hon. Gentleman, who not only answers questions very fairly, but is also always very courteous—whether the statement that these officers who have been mentioned are relations or connections of the Prime Minister of this country. It is just as well to tell us at once, because you cannot conceal it for very long, and we ought to know. There is another reason why I think this matter should be sifted to the bottom. We ought to take care that no wrong is done so far as we can help it. It is all very well for the power of this country to be used against a weaker and smaller Power for getting money in this way, but it always leaves a bad feeling behind, and it may be the cause of war at some future time. There is hardly one of the many little wars in which we are engaged from time to time which is not due to some extent to the ill-feeling created at some time in connection with money affairs. It is very unfortunate with regard to Persia, because the Russian Government is brought into the matter in some way, although we are told that the Persian Bank is going to find the money. But the Persian Bank will not find the money without it has security of some kind, and it is very likely that ultimately it will be British money that will be found to pay this large sum. I hope this Committee and the House of Commons will take care, if these statements are true, that the power and influence of this country are not in any way used to benefit these speculators or company-mongers, or whatever you like to call them. I am satisfied that if I, or any other humble Member of this House like myself, were to be engaged in trade, and wanted the Government to assist in collecting our debts, they would very properly refuse to do so. Are these favourites of the Government, and relations of Ministers, as it has been said, who use the power of this Government to compel smaller and weaker Powers to find these large sums of money? I think it is high time, not only for the interests of the country, but for the honour of the country, that we should put a stop to it if it is so. I do not propose moving a reduction in this case, as Papers have been promised, but I trust these Papers and the fullest possible information on the subject will be forthcoming at an early date.

(9.20.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, S.): The question before the House has, I think, taken a very serious and grave aspect; and before another step is taken by Her Majesty's Government in a matter which appears, at all events, to gravely compromise the honour of the Government, there should be a special and searching inquiry before a Committee of this House as to the nature of this concession—not merely as to the circumstances under which it was granted, but as to the consideration for which it was granted, and as to the position of the Persian people. It does not seem to come within the category of those legitimate mercantile or commercial transactions which deserve the assistance of the Government. It is a strong measure for a Government to interfere to promote private interests in foreign countries. That is not the object of the establishment of diplomatic relations; and although undoubtedly diplomatic pressure may in certain circumstances legitimately be employed for legitimate commercial transactions, it is most important that the Government should not go one hair's breadth beyond what would be recognised by everybody as an honest and fair commercial transaction. But what is this? On the face of it an impecunious gentleman goes out to the Government of Persia. It so happens that his brother had for many years occupied the very influential post of British Representative in these dominions. We are told that at the moment when this transaction occurred the brother was not actually there, but it is impossible to disregard the fact of the Persian Government having entered into negotiations with Mr. Talbot. That is a matter which should be searchingly inquired into. But it is not all. Mr. Talbot gives no consideration for this concession. It is nothing more nor less than a conspiracy entered into between Mr. Talbot on the one hand and certain officials of the Shah on the other, to extort unreasonable and monstrous prices for tobacco from the people of Persia, the greater part of the plunder to go to Mr. Talbot and the smaller part to the Shah. The Persian people dealt with it as we should have dealt with it. They rose in rebellion against it, and I believe it is entirely due to the extortions practised by the concessionaries that they did so. Had they been moderate they might have been successful, but they wanted to make £370,000 a year for no consideration at all. Having regard to the relationship which exists between the gentleman who got the concession and his brother, a British officer closely connected with Persia, and having regard to the relationship existing between these brothers and the Foreign Secretary, it seems to me that this was of all cases in the world one in which the Government ought to have been very careful about interfering. "Cæsar's wife ought to be above suspicion." The answers which have been given are not satisfactory or sufficient, and we ought not to wait for Papers, but, before another step is taken, or the honour of this country is compromised any further in this equivocal and apparently discreditable transaction, the whole subject ought to be made a matter of inquiry before this House.

*(9.26.) MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I think that hon. Gentlemen have magnified the matter very considerably, certainly so far as the part which Her Majesty's Government have taken in the proceedings. Hon. Gentlemen have asked whether Mr. Talbot is a relative of the Prime Minister. I believe he is, but allow me to point out that the concession which has been referred to was obtained without the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government were not informed that it had been applied for, they knew nothing whatever about it, and therefore I do not exactly see the relevancy of that suggestion. The action of Her Majesty's Government in the matter of compensation was called for after the concession had been rescinded — not before. The Corporation proposed that the question of compensation should be referred to arbitration.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): Did the proposition for arbitration come from Her Majesty's Government?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: No, it came from the Corporation. There was an Arbitration Clause in the agreement, but even assuming that there had not been, was it not a reasonable suggestion that the question of compensation should be a matter for arbitration? The Corporation admittedly had spent considerable sums of money on the faith of the concession by the Persian Government. They said they had spent no less than £139,000 or £140,000 in Persia; they had in addition purchased the concession for £300,000; they had also spent in salaries £55,000; and if hon. Members will add these figures together they will find they reach very nearly the sum of £500,000. I can only repeat that the proposal to refer the whole matter to arbitration seemed to Her Majesty's Government to be decidedly reasonable, and they therefore supported it. I have been asked what were the reasons of the Persian Government for refusing to submit the matter to arbitration, but I am not in the counsels of that Government, and I am afraid I cannot answer the question. No statement was ever made by the Representative of the Persian Government about the reason for that refusal. It seemed to Her Majesty's Government to be a reasonable and proper way to arrive at compensation, but the Persian Government for reasons of their own preferred to make an offer of £500,000, taking over all the assets. The Corporation were anxious that the matter should be referred to arbitration, and that was a proposal which Her Majesty's Government supported. Thus it was that the arrangement was arrived at between the Corporation and the Persian Government—an arrangement for which Her Majesty's Government are in no way responsible. The Persian Government did not see their way to accept the proposal that the matter should be referred to arbitration, and therefore the terms of arbitration were not entered upon.

POLYNESIAN LABOUR IN QUEENSLAND.

*(9.31) MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): This is a question of some importance, and I shall move the reduction of the Colonial Office Vote by £500—

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman for further information with regard to the subject we are now discussing. I should like to know whether I should be precluded from doing so, if the hon. Member (Mr. S. Smith) raises quite a distinct question.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would not be possible to go back to it.

MR. CREMER: I would ask then that my hon. Friend should give way.

*MR. SMITH: I am willing to give way now if thereby I do not lose the right of speaking on this question. I am quite in the hands of the Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not for me—it is for the hon. Member to decide for himself.

*MR. SMITH: I think I must persist, and go on with my Amendment.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): I submit that as no reduction has been moved on the general Vote—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. SMITH: I have moved that the Vote be reduced by £500.

MR. HEALY: Is it in the power of one Member to shut out all other Members of the House—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It is for the hon. Member (Mr. S. Smith) to determine whether he should give way or not.

MR. HEALY: If the hon. Member does not give way, are all other Members to be prevented from calling attention to questions in which they are interested?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Mr. Smith.

*MR. SMITH: This is a matter of very great importance to the public, and many questions have been put in this House with the view of eliciting information as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to it. I think it is the feeling of all who sit on this side of the House, and of many who sit on the other side, that the answers of Her Majesty's Government have been very unsatisfactory, and that the papers which were placed in the hands of Members this morning do nothing whatever to diminish the dissatisfaction which has been caused by the action of Her Majesty's Government in regard to this question. My intention now is to direct the attention of the Committee to the whole subject of the revival of the Polynesian labour traffic with Queensland. I hold that the Polynesian labour traffic for the last twenty years has been as cruel as the slave trade of Africa in the worst period of its existence, and I hope that I shall have the support of my hon. Friends in laying the matter before the country, and in pressing upon the Government to take a totally different action to that they have hitherto taken with reference to it. It will now be my painful duty to refer to some of the disclosures which were made to the Royal Commission which sat in 1885. I will quote one or two paragraphs from the Report of that Commission, which will call the attention of the House to the characteristics of the trade, and which, I believe, are by no means absent at the present day.

"The love of home of those Islanders amounts to a passion, and the recruiting agents had to overcome dislike to practical exile by the assurance that they would not be absent for any length of time; whenever there was pronounced unwillingness on the part of the natives to go in the boats, or remain on the ships, they were too often impressed by threats."

The Commissioners go on to say—

"The Government agents seldom seem to have informed themselves by personal observation and inquiry that the voluntary recruits understood the nature of their engagements."

They further state—

"So far as we could discern, when the recruits were brought on board ship, the Government agents sometimes tied a piece of calico round their necks, sometimes they entered their names in the official logs; very rarely indeed did they take any trouble to learn whether the recruits really appreciated that they had entered into an engagement, or the purpose of it."

Now that was the general conclusion which was come to by the Commissioners, who made a most extensive inquiry into the whole question of engaging Pacific Islanders for this traffic. They decided that the system from root to branch was one of fraud and deception, that the natives were not voluntary agents, that they were totally ignorant of the purposes for which they were engaged; and that, in fact, they were virtually kidnapped. The Commissioners were directed to make inquiries with reference to six ships, and they spent thirty days in the investigation. They examined no less than 280 of the Polynesian labourers, and I will read from their Report what they say about the manner in which the recruits were obtained. The Commissioners state—

"Our opinion is that all the recruits brought by the 'Cobra' on this voyage were seduced on board by false pretences, that the nature of their engagements was never fully explained to them, that they had little or no comprehension of the nature of the work they had to perform, and that the period for which they agreed to come was in no single instance for three years."

Mr. S. Smith

They further say—

"Our opinion is that a system of deliberate fraud was practised in engaging all recruits during this voyage. . . . None believed they had agreed to remain in Queensland for three years."

I will not weary the Committee by reading other extracts. They are all to the same effect, but in the case of the "Hopeful" a much worse charge is made.

"The history of the cruise of the 'Hopeful' is one long record of deceit, cruel treachery, deliberate kidnapping, and cold-blooded murders. The number of human beings whose lives were sacrificed during the recruiting can never be accurately known."

Now the monsters who were engaged on the "Hopeful" were tried for these murders. They were found guilty, and were condemned to penal servitude. But what happened? A strong petition was got up in the colony asking that their punishment might be remitted, and after a few years' imprisonment the wretches were let loose. It was even proposed to give them a public dinner when they came out of prison; but this, however, was dropped. I have now an observation to make as to the mortality amongst these unfortunate islanders. From twenty to twenty-five per cent. of them died in one year. A gentleman who has been through the plantations of Queensland, and who had made close inquiries into the condition of the labourers there—Mr. Hume Nisbet—assured me that in the course of ten months the men were practically used up, and that they generally fell into consumption. If that is not a deplorable state of thing, I do not know what is. These men were taken to the plantations in good health, but the hospitals were soon crowded with them, and very few of them returned to their homes in a healthy state—the majority of them were sent back to die. I have one more fact to add to this tale of horror. In some cases, when they were sent back, they were landed on hostile islands, where they were killed and eaten by the savages, who were cannibals. That was the state of things for twenty years before the year 1885, and no one can rise up and say one word of apology for this abominable traffic. I have had an opportunity of discussing this question with an old sailor, who explained to me the method of recruiting these labourers. He said that the chiefs at the islands were offered an old musket and ammunition for three slaves, which was the regular tariff. The islanders were then taken on board ship, where the Queensland agent asked them questions in English, of which they did not understand a word. Three fingers were then held up by him signifying that they were to be engaged for three years, but the men did not understand what it meant. Their names were then entered in the log-book, and the unhappy people were taken away to Queensland. That is how the abominable traffic was carried on. During the whole period up to 1885 most admirable regulations were in force on paper. No better regulations could have been made; and I believe that the provisions telegraphed to us the other day were substantially the same as the old regulations. All the vessels were provided with agents, who were to explain to the recruits the nature of the traffic. Yet, in spite of them, the islanders were kidnapped without the slightest idea that they were to be taken to the sugar plantations, or that they were engaged for more than three months. The consequence was that, parted from their wives and families for three years, their hearts broke, and they became miserable wrecks, being afterwards sent home to die. That is the plain, unvarnished story of what is called the Polynesian labour traffic for twenty years up to 1885. We have been told that since then all these things have come to an end, and that no abuses now exist. But it should be remembered that the trade is carried on under almost the same regulations as before 1885. I have paid a good deal of attention to this question for some years past, and I am well acquainted with the splendid work done by the New Hebrides Mission and its apostle, Dr. J. G. Paton, and I know that down to the present time these ships take away labourers from the islands—separating husbands from wives, wives from husbands, parents from children, children from parents, and that such things have been going on up to the present day.

Here is a letter from Dr. J. G. Paton, who has lived as noble a life as anyone since the days of the Apostle Paul, and who has done as much for the New Hebrides as Livingstone did for Africa. Writing to Sir Samuel Griffith, the Premier of Queensland, and speaking of the year 1890, when the traffic was suspended for about two years, he said—

"The minimum of the traffic evils in 1890 were appalling to all out of Queensland, and to some in it. Taking children from parents and parents from children, wives from husbands and husbands from wives, may appear to some a minimum evil in such a traffic, and all in the trade know that this is the common practice of every labour vessel to Queensland and all other places to which they are taken; and who knows how many were murdered in getting them away from their island homes."

He further says—

"Shortly before you closed the traffic one of our missionaries was requested by a number of men on his island to go with them to a labour vessel, which had got a considerable number of their wives on board, and had them confined to take away; but the captain and agent refused the application to give any of them up, and took them all away. The missionary was abused for pleading for them, and though one of the fathers held up his infant child, pleading for the mother to be given back to it or it would die, yet the slavers would not give the mother to the infant, or the infant to the mother."

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): May I ask the hon. Gentleman what he is quoting from?

"MR. S. SMITH: The letter of Dr. Paton to the Premier of Queensland. I could quote similar letters, but I will only refer to two others. Admiral Erskine wrote in the Times the other day—

"Three years' experience in command of the Australian Squadron impressed upon me two important facts, viz., firstly, that even under the most stringent regulations wrongs and abuses occurred in connection with the labour traffic, which invariably led to bloodshed and accompanying complications and reprisals."

Admiral Scott, at present in command of the same squadron, when also applied to for his opinion on the subject of re-opening the trade this year, replied—

"I regret that it is proposed to introduce labour from the islands where there is no form of government to look after the interests of those who are recruited."

He goes on to say—

"The men engaged in the vessels and the recruiting agent should be wholly honourable and trustworthy men."

Then mark the next few words—

"It is a difficult matter to find men who are fit for such a service."

These are guarded words; but they contain a great deal when one reads between the lines. I agree with these two Admirals, that no means that can be applied would prevent these abuses. There is no practical difference between the present regulations and those which existed before. The labour agents, who have to see that the regulations are carried out, are mostly young men of roving dispositions—often failures at everything else—and they have to live for months together with the captain and the crew. It is not human nature that they should withstand the pressure which is brought to bear upon them to neglect, or, at least, to take a perfunctory view of their duties. Now, all that the labourers get for their work is £6 a year and their keep, and they used to have to wait till the end of three years before they were paid. This is the reason why the Queensland Government will not apply to India or China for labourers. The coolies of India and China would not work for £6 a year. The reason why the Kanakas go so quickly into consumption is not through the want of food, but chiefly because they are separated from their wives and families, and their hearts are broken. Their position is far worse than that of negroes, who are sturdy and accustomed to hard work. These Islanders, unlike the latter, are a soft race, unaccustomed to manual labour, and live in a primitive state on the fruit of the earth. Hard work kills them, and the traffic with Queensland was formerly the traffic of a slaughterhouse; it produced a far more rapid extinction of human beings than the slave trade of old. Some Members of the House may have seen a remarkable letter which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette yesterday. It was written by Mr. Hume Nisbet, from whom I have already quoted, and who thoroughly understands this matter, having himself visited the islands in a labour vessel. He also travelled through Queensland a few years ago, and has thus had opportunity of ascertaining the facts. I believe he is perfectly correct when he says—

"The past year's crammed hospitals, equally crammed graveyards, and human wrecks which are packed back to the islands to die after their three years of slavery are over, are conclusive enough proofs to anyone who has seen the plantations of Queensland that the Kanaka is as little suited to the work as the white man."

Now mark the following words:—

"I never yet saw a healthy South Sea Islander after his three years were up, although they mostly come to Queensland strong and healthy enough."

I say this is a terrible indictment, and the nation should be despised that allows such wrongs to go on without making a protest. I ask whether the people of Queensland are to be trusted with the absolute control of this helpless race? Has their past history shown them fitted? Is it not notorious, and does not the House know, that the aborigines used to be shot down like dogs, and were rooted out with ruthless ferocity, and that but few survive? Thousands have been murdered in cold blood, and who has heard of a white man being punished for the murder of a black man?

BARON H. DE WORMS: May I interrupt the hon. Member, and ask for the name of his informant?

*MR. S. SMITH: Mr. Hume Nisbet gave me many of these particulars, and published a book of his travels.

BARON H. DE WORMS: What date?

*MR. S. SMITH: He travelled in Queensland in 1886, and I believe the same facts have been stated in Rusden's History of Australia. I happen myself to have a friend who tried to employ a few of the aborigines, but the white labourers refused to work unless he dismissed them. That shows the feeling. We have been told that the sugar plantations cannot be cultivated for want of Polynesian labour; but, as I have said, coolies can be got from India and China. The Indian coolies would, however, have to be treated very differently, and the Chinese coolies know how to take care of themselves. These, however, require higher wages, and, therefore, they are not engaged. Unless we can stop this traffic of South Sea labour we shall see those islands completely depopulated; indeed, many of them are already half depopulated. Just as the population of the West Indies faded away under the Spanish conquerors, so, too, will be the case of the Pacific Islanders unless some strong hand is put out to protect them. It lies especially on this country to engage in the sacred mission of protection. It is quite true we cannot interfere with self-governing Queensland; but we do exercise a protectorate over a great part of the Pacific, and surely we have a right to say that the Union Jack shall not be employed in the carrying out of a disguised form of slavery. Here we have just signed the Brussels Act against the slave trade, and yet we are going to allow our flag to float over a kind of slavery in the South Seas. I am told that interference with a self-governing colony is a difficult matter. I feel the force of that statement, and I think the Government have felt its force so overwhelmingly that their eyes are closed to everything else. But I see some considerations on the other side. We have been told that if we interfered with Queensland we should have all the Australian Colonies in revolt; but I am glad to read in the Times of to-day news from Melbourne that the Victorian Parliament has without a single dissentient passed a resolution condemning this traffic out and out, and calling upon the Government to put an end to it. I think we should have the approval of the great bulk of the Australian people in an endeavour to defeat this wretched policy. I am informed that in Brisbane and elsewhere many meetings have been held to protest against the revival of this Pacific labour traffic. In Brisbane I believe that public opinion is strongly opposed to it, and that all the Churches of Australia will aid us in putting it down if necessary. It is one of those cases in which we ought to grasp the nettle, for those interested in the traffic are only a mere handful—a few Queensland planters. I doubt if one per cent. of the Australian population have any direct interest in it. I say it is impossible for this nation to stand supinely by and allow the revival of a species of slavery. And here it is worthy of remark that, after nearly quarreling with some European Powers on the question of slavery, we are going to allow in our own Colonies a veiled form of slavery. I believe the Government have dealt with this matter in a very feeble manner. I have read through the Blue Book, and I only find a single protest—a letter from Lord Knutsford. On the 3rd May he wrote—

"I observe that it is stated in the Press that the Act permitting the resumption of Polynesian immigration has been passed by both Houses of the Queensland Parliament, and has received your assent, and I trust that it contains complete provision for the protection of the natives, both during their conveyance to and from the colony, and when at work on the plantations, so as to prevent the recurrence of those regrettable abuses which were on some occasions perpetrated before the labour traffic was prohibited."

These are proper words, but they are feeble words. They amount to almost nothing, and no Colonial Government would be influenced by them. Surely you might have taken up a stronger stand against a traffic which a few years ago was execrated by all civilised Powers. I do not believe that the action of the Government is in harmony either with the wishes of this country or of Australia, and I hope this House will put a little backbone into the Ministry. If the Turks had been guilty of atrocities such as marked this traffic a few years ago the country would have rung with denunciation from one end to the other. I urge the Committee to show that the old hatred of oppression has not died out of England, and that we are worthy descendants of those who in former days struck the chains from the slaves. I beg, Sir, to move a reduction of £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £7,000, for the Colonial Office, be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Samuel Smith.)

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I am sure that all hon. Members who have listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) will feel that he spoke from the bottom of his heart in condemning those atrocities which we, with him, deplore. He was, however, not dealing with the present but with the past, and I venture to say that if such were not the case we should not this evening have to discuss this Bill passed by the Queensland Legislature. I claim for our brothers in the Colonies an equal amount of human feeling, an equal amount of civilisation, and equal detestation of wrong and oppression as we ourselves possess. I am sure that if one tithe of the atrocities recited by the hon. Member to-night had been or could be practised in Queensland at the present moment, the Queensland Legislature would not under any conditions whatever have sanctioned a resumption of the traffic. I interrupted the hon. Member and asked him who was his authority for the statement that a permit had once been granted by the Queensland Government for the killing of blacks, and, further, for the name of his informant with regard to the massacre, which he said had taken place, of ten thousand Kanakas.

MR. S. SMITH: Not Kanakas; aborigines of Queensland.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: He gave me the name of Mr. Hume Nisbet, but I did not gather that Mr. Hume Nisbet gave to the hon. Gentleman the name of his informant. At all events, if he did, the hon. Gentleman did not communicate it to the House. These charges are too grave, too terrible, to be submitted to the House of Commons without the fullest proof that they are based on credible evidence. Considering the nature of them, we are entitled to ask for the fullest, most complete, and absolute evidence of the truth of the statements alleged. Without in the least degree desiring to disparage the hon. Gentleman, I must say that such evidence has not been given to us. Passing from that for a moment, I turn to another point the hon. Gentleman raised—namely, that the answers given by me with regard to this question were unsatisfactory. If that is so, I regret the circumstance very much, but at all events I gave to the House all the information at my command, and I gave the facts as supplied me by those who had the best opportunity of knowing them. If that information was insufficient I cannot but regret it. I cannot, however, agree that the Blue Book presented to the House also contains but a meagre statement. Every document in our possession relating to the case as it now stands is embodied in this Blue Book. Neither do I understand how the hon. Member can say that we do not express ourselves sufficiently strongly to the Queensland Government in face of the despatch, a portion of which I will read to the Committee, written by the Secretary of State to Sir Henry Norman. On the 3rd May, Lord Knutsford said—

“I observe that it is stated in the Press that the Act permitting the resumption of Polynesian immigration has been passed by both Houses of the Queensland Parliament, and has received your assent, and I trust that it contains complete provision for the protection of the natives both during their conveyance to and from the colony and when at work on the plantations, so as to prevent the recurrence of those regrettable abuses which were on some occasions perpetrated before the labour traffic was prohibited.”

I want to know how the Secretary of State could say more in addressing a representation to the Ministry of a great self-governing Colony? He expresses his hope that these regulations would be ample, and I am bound to say, in view of the fact that since 1885 there have been but very few, if any, abuses—and later I will show this by facts and figures—that there was reason to be satisfied that, with the already stringent regulations now made still more stringent, these few abuses would cease altogether. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Victorian Parliament had passed a Resolution against the introduction of Kanakas into Queensland. I dealt with this subject in answer to a question put by him to-day, and I regret that he should have thought it necessary to again recur to it after that explanation. The Resolution of the Victorian Parliament was not directed specially against the importation of Kanakas into Queensland. It was a general Resolution against the importation of alien labour of whatever nature; and as I pointed out then, however important that Resolution might be, and whatever respect it was entitled to, it was impossible for Her Majesty's Government in dealing with a question so grave as the disallowance of an Act passed by the Queensland Legislature to taken into consideration a Resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, not directed against native employment on humanitarian grounds, but against all foreign labour, coolie or native.

MR. S. SMITH: In place of being a totally different subject, it contains direct reference to the action of the Queensland Parliament in sanctioning the resumption of the importation of Kanaka labour.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I explained that the Resolution was directed against the general importation of alien labour. The Committee will, I hope, consider that I am not trespassing on their time and patience if, in dealing with this grave question, I first call their attention to the history of the traffic. The first batch of Islanders was brought to Brisbane in 1863. At first there were no Government regulations applied to the recruiting vessels, and as the trade, generally speaking, was in disreputable hands, great abuses occurred. A strong agitation sprang up in Queensland on the report of these abuses, and general indignation meetings were called. The result was that in 1868 an Act was passed by the Colonial Legislature which made provisions for the supply of food and medicine during the voyage, and for the appointment of Inspectors of the Polynesian labourers. Two inquiries were held into the working of the Act, the first in 1869 and the second in 1876; and the general conclusions were that the labourers were properly obtained and that they were willing to come to the Colony. In 1880 the Act of 1868 was repealed and another was substituted, which contained much more elaborate provision for the protection of the labourers, with power to the Governor in Council to make regulations for the due execution of the objects of the Act. In the same year, 1880, an inquiry was again made into the treatment of Polynesian labourers on the plantations, and the Government recognised the importance of hospital treatment. In 1884 an important set of regulations was framed amplifying and augmenting those contained in the Act. In 1885 an inquiry into the "Hopeful" and other cases was held, which disclosed eight instances in which the vessels had committed gross abuses and violations of the Imperial Kidnapping Acts of 1872-5. These cases occurred just about the time of the enactment of a Queensland Statute, which enabled Polynesians to give evidence without taking the oath, as they did not understand the nature of such an obligation. In the same year, 1885, after the issue of the "Hopeful" Report, an Act was passed that no licences to introduce Polynesian labourers should be issued after the end of 1890. I have thought it right to give to the Committee this brief history of the labour question, because it goes far to show that the Government of Queensland, from the very beginning of the importation of Kanaka labour into Queensland in 1863, up to the terrible events of the "Hopeful" in 1884 and the subsequent inquiry, have endeavoured by every means in their power to so regulate the traffic as to prevent the possibility of atrocities which we are all united in condemning. Since 1885 there have been no cases of atrocities whatever.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: It depends upon what you call atrocities.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: More than that, the alteration of the law, that is to say, the rescinding of these licences, which came into force in 1890, was not caused in the main by the fact that atrocities had been committed, but for perfectly different reasons. I am prepared to show by the debates which took place in the Colonial Parliament on this Act of 1885, that there is little reference made to the "Hopeful" case, not because the speakers in any way palliated these atrocities, but simply because they found that the regulations then in force were sufficiently stringent. The principal arguments for this Act were based upon general objections to the introduction of any coloured labour into the Colony—an objection similar to the present Resolution of the Victorian Parliament—and the belief that the change would lead to the splitting up of large sugar estates into small estates, on which white labour could be employed. That view was shared by Sir Samuel Griffith. Sir Samuel Griffith is a man who has earned a reputation as a statesman, and he thoroughly deserves it; and having come to the conclusion that Kanaka labour could again be introduced into Queensland, I think he must, first of all, have thoroughly convinced himself that the safeguards by which he intended to surround the new Act were adequate to prevent the recurrence of those terrible abuses. Now, the reasons given by Sir Samuel Griffith for passing the Act of 1885 were hardly based on the atrocities at all, but were these—first, because he considered that the system then in existence tended to encourage the creation of large landed estates, owned for the most part by absentees and worked by gang labour, and so to discourage actual settlement by small farmers working for themselves; secondly, because it led to field labour in tropical agriculture being looked down upon as degrading and unworthy of white races; and, thirdly, because the permanent existence of a large servile population, not admitted to the franchise, was not compatible with the freedom of political institutions in the colony. To these reasons was added, so far as Polynesian labour was concerned, the discredit that had been brought upon Queensland by the abuses that for some years prevailed in the South Sea Island trade. These were the reasons which led to the Act of 1885 and the abolition of licences to recruit after the expiration of 1890. But between 1885 and 1890 several causes arose which led to the introduction of the present Act, and I think it only right to give to the Committee a general statement of what those reasons were. In 1889 a Royal Commission in Queensland inquired into the causes of the depression of the sugar industry, and in the course of that inquiry included some questions relating to the importation of Polynesians. It was stated that the capital invested in that industry in the colony was £5,000,000; that in Mauritius sugar was grown by coolies whose wages were one shilling a day without rations; that in Java the cost of labour was sixpence a day, and in China probably less; and that in Fiji the coolies were paid one shilling per working day. Now, the hon. Gentleman stated that the wages of the Polynesian labourers were only from £6 to £7 a year. He will, therefore, be surprised to hear that in Queensland the cost of a Polynesian labourer is sixteen shillings or seventeen shillings a week.

MR. S. SMITH: That includes his food.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The amount I have stated is the actual cost of the labourer.

MR. S. SMITH: Is it not the fact that £6 a year is all the amount paid in money?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: That may be so. The Royal Commission recommended that Polynesian labour should be permitted, as otherwise the capital invested in the sugar industry would be wiped out of existence, and the whole population now dependent upon that industry for a livelihood would for a time be thrown out of employment. Annexed to the Report was a Return respecting the vessels engaged in the recruiting trade during the period 1886-1888, from which it appears that seventy-nine voyages were made in that time, and that only in one case had any irregularity occurred which was attributable to the crew. That was the case of the "Forest King," which was brought back at the request of the Government Agent owing to the insobriety of the crew and the want of control over them by the master. The inquiry, however, disclosed no outrage on the islanders. When, therefore, I stated that the hon. Member (Mr. S. Smith) appeared to have brought before the House certain cases which he had not proved by the ordinary rules of evidence, I think I have shown that I was justified in that statement. The hon. Member at the outset of his remarks said that the traffic during the last three years exhibited the very worst form of slavery.

MR. S. SMITH: No, not quite so. What I said was that the traffic of the last few years still retained many of the vices that belonged to former periods—not the more extreme and violent ones.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: At all events, as far as the last three years are concerned, the hon. Gentleman cannot furnish the Committee with one single authentic case of cruelty in reference to this importation of Polynesians, and as far as the preceding years are concerned, I have shown the hon.

Member from official statistics that in seventy-nine voyages there was not a single case of cruelty reported. Sir Samuel Griffith has been accused of changing his policy in supporting the present Bill, and as having done so simply in the interests of the sugar planters. I think it is only fair to Sir Samuel Griffith that I should remind the Committee of what that gentleman's own reasons are, as given by himself, with regard to the present
Bill. He said—

“Amongst the working population, whose interests I had perhaps too exclusively in view, there has arisen a body of men, claiming to be leaders of thought, who have by their speech and action rendered it impossible that the experiment of the employment of white labour in tropical agriculture should be fairly tried. There are not at present in Queensland a sufficient number of Europeans able and willing to do the necessary work and to take the place of the Polynesians who are gradually leaving the colony, and of whom no more can be introduced under the existing laws.
Yet every opposition has been offered to the introduction of any additional labour, the opinion has been promulgated that field labour in tropical agriculture is degrading, and the employment of white labour in that industry has been denounced except at rates of wages which the industry cannot pay. In short, these men will neither engage in the work themselves nor, so far as they can prevail, allow anyone else to do so.”

Under these circumstances the Prime Minister of Queensland felt that something must be done, and what did he do? He made more stringent regulations than those which had been sufficient to prevent any outrage from 1885 to the present time, and he felt that with these safeguards he could again import Polynesian labour; and having introduced it, he would be able once more to revive the sugar trade of the country, which was rapidly dying out. I say that with these safeguards, and presuming them to be sufficient, he was perfectly justified in the course he took.
The hon. Member says it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government not to allow this Bill until they see whether or not the safeguards are sufficient. But does the hon. Gentleman know that the disallowance of this Bill would not prevent the traffic? Even if Her Majesty's Government were prepared to take that extreme step—which they are not—the traffic would continue just as it does now.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon.
Gentleman says “No”; but I will explain the position in a few words. It is expressly stated in the Pacific Islanders' Protection Acts, 1872, Section 8, and 1875 that compliance with the requirements of the Queensland Statutes as regards the obtaining of licences to carry labourers from an island to a colony shall be sufficient.
The issue of licences to “carry” in this sense has never been prohibited; and if no such licences were granted in Queensland they could, under the Imperial Acts, be applied for in any other Australasian colony. What the Act of 1885 did prospectively prohibit was the issue of licences to “introduce” Polynesians, and it will be seen from a perusal of the Act that a licence to “introduce” is not the licence granted to a master of a vessel to “carry,” but a licence to a planter to engage and bring from the vessel into the colony. This is, however, a matter of local concern. If Her Majesty's cruisers have no power to stop recruiting by Queensland vessels—and no such power would result from the disallow-ance of the Act—Her Majesty's Government could not, by taking such a step, prevent Polynesians from being taken into and employed in Queensland. There would, it is true, be an Act on the Colonial Statute Book prohibiting such employment, but Her Majesty's Government could not secure its enforcement; and if the Colonial Government were driven to an attitude of defiance the only result might be that Polyne-
sians would be employed without any restrictions on the planters.
Therefore, the hon. Gentleman will see that, even if Her Majesty's Government were prepared to adopt the extreme measure suggested, they would not be able thereby to stop the introduction of Polynesian labour into Queensland; so that nothing would be gained except that they would have done something which, so far as I know, never has been done with respect to a large self-governing colony. I will now deal with one other question before I leave this branch of the subject. The hon. Member has pictured what he alleges to be the terrible condition of the Kanakas; but I think I shall be able to show, on the best possible authority, that the informants of the hon. Gentleman have misled him. I do not say that they have done so wilfully; they may have considered that they were justified in making such statements, but I hope to satisfy the Committee that those statements are not based on facts. There have been cases of irregularities in the Western Pacific brought to light since 1885; but either, as in the case of Edmunds, who was recently charged with murder and kidnapping in the Solomon Islands, they have occurred on a vessel which was not licensed by or connected with Queensland; or, as in the cases of the Queensland labour vessels "Hector" and "Forest King," they were cases of drunkenness and insubordination amongst the crew. That such cases have been discovered and reported upon shows that Her Majesty's cruisers and the colonial authorities, including the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific, now watch carefully and efficiently the manner in which the traffic is conducted, and therefore strengthens the presumption that grave cases of violence have not occurred. Seven years have now elapsed since the Report on the "Hopeful" and other cases was issued; and during that time, up to and including part of 1891, the introduction of Polynesian labourers was vigorously prosecuted, there being a rapid increase after that date in the numbers imported. Thus in 1886, 1,505 were introduced; in 1887, 1,988; in 1888, 2,291; and in 1890, 2,459. These figures indicate the continual and growing demand for such labour and the impracticability of the idea which underlay the Act of 1885 that the sugar plantations can and will be worked by white labour. Now while there has been a steady increase in the number reported, there has been a sustained decrease in the number of deaths reported. Thus the deaths for the five years ending 1890 were given as follows:—1886, 573; 1887, 520; 1888, 482; 1889, 481; 1890, 417.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Will the right hon. Gentleman give the numbers amongst whom these deaths occurred so as to show the proportion?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Of course, there were a great many Kanakas in the colony at the time, but I cannot for the moment give the proportions.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): The figures are given in the Reports, and the proportions are about sixty to the thousand.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I especially want to meet the allegation that these people are dying by thousands. Between 1869 and 1889 23,700 Kanakas were returned to their homes on completion of their engagements. These would naturally explain to their neighbours the conditions of their life in Queensland. There is no general allegation that the islanders have been ill-used on the plantations. Public opinion would make itself promptly felt if cases of cruelty occurred, and there is always an influential party in the Colonial Parliament which is ready to inquire into and denounce any such cases. Large numbers of islanders return to Queensland and some have settled down there. Thus in North Rockhampton there is a colony of them, some of whom have married white women, have carts of their own, and compete with Europeans. At Bundaberg there are at least 300 who have engaged themselves for short periods. It is said that these people receive a miserable pittance for wages. In the Government Savings Bank there was a sum of £17,659 on 31st December, 1890, to the credit of 3,060 islanders. Considering that it is alleged that these people receive no more than £6 a year each, they must have been extraordinarily thrifty to have been able in so short a period to accumulate so large a sum. I think these facts and figures dispose of the principal allegations of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith). Towards the end of his speech the hon. Member quoted the views of a missionary, doubtless a very excellent man—Mr. Paton, and I think I shall only be doing my duty by showing that many of the statements of this gentleman are absolutely misleading and incorrect. The charges of Mr. Paton are so many in number, that I cannot deal with them all; but I will select one or two. In 1889 Mr.

Baron H. de Worms

Cowley, the Member of the Queensland Legislature for Herbert, and at present the Minister for Lands, made the following speech in his place in the Assembly:—

"In December, 1881, Mr. Paton published a long letter in the Melbourne Argus, which contained charges so grave that Captain Bridge, of Her Majesty's ship "Espiegle," was instructed by Sir Arthur Gordon to investigate them. Two of the principal charges, together with the official Report on them, are printed in the Argus."

This was one of Mr. Paton's charges—

"A labour vessel decoyed a Christian native teacher on board. Word was then sent to the young men and boys of the school that their teacher wanted to see them. So soon as one hundred were collected the vessel sailed away."

This was the official Report—

"A native teacher left by a native vessel, but he went voluntarily. He was not decoyed. Word was not sent to collect the scholars. None were entrapped. There was no such kidnapping incident."

Another of Mr. Paton's charges was—

"That two tribes that were fighting placed their women and children on a reef; that a labour vessel stole in, got the women and children into the boats, and sailed away, despite the firing of the men and the pleading of the women."

This was alleged to have occurred at Tanna. The official Report was as follows:—

"The Rev. Messrs. Watt and Neilson have been long on Tanna, and both say they never heard of any such thing occurring on that island."

Mr. Cowley, on the same occasion, further said—

"What do the people in our country say—the ministers of all denominations in our midst? I would refer to one man who has lived amongst the people of North Queensland, the Bishop of North Queensland. He has travelled through the whole North, not excepting the plantations. He has been among the islanders for days at a time, inspected their houses and food, and seen how they were treated. I know that his opinion is that those people are well looked after, and are benefited by being brought to this country. There is no doubt that there has not been any complaint from any minister of the Gospel of any denomination whatever, who has made it his duty to go among the islanders and see the way in which they are treated."

Again, the Annual Report of the Department of Pacific Island Immigration for 1889, in speaking of the mortality, stated—

"This has been of a normal character, and there has been no epidemic among the islanders."

The Report for 1890, the latest forwarded to this country, said—

"The death reports, I am pleased to state, show a decrease in the number of deaths year by year. The deaths for the past year have been of the usual character, there having been no disease of a special nature amongst the islanders."

To show that the Islanders are not averse to labouring on the plantations in Queensland, the following figures from the same Report for 1890 may be referred to:—New introductions, 2,577; re-agreements, 2,760. And it is added—

"This must, it is thought, convince impartial persons that there can be no 'slavery' in this form of service; otherwise the labourers would insist on their right to be returned to their islands instead of re-engaging for a further term."

The Right Rev. W. Saumarez Smith, Bishop of Sydney and Primate of Australia, has declared himself as not opposed to Kanaka labour under rigid supervision; and the Rev. Alexander C. Smith, the Convener of the Queensland Presbyterian Heathen Mission Committee, in a letter which appeared in the Brisbane Courier of 26th March, 1892, after speaking in warm terms of the condition of the Kanakas he had met with in his tours in the colony, continued—

"In conclusion, let me say I deeply regret, I deplore, that that protest (Mr. Paton's) has been made at all, and especially in the terms in which it has been couched. It is, as a whole, hasty, and, through defective knowledge, in many respects without foundation. It is calculated to wound and offend all right-thinking people, and grieve the hearts of most, if not all, Christian men and women in the colony. It is fitted to give a wrong impression of our whole colony as a Christian country throughout the world."

I think this testimony, coming from men of such eminence, is at least equal in weight and authority to that which the hon. Member has adduced. I do not like to weary the Committee, but I feel I have an important duty to perform, which is to vindicate not only the action of Her Majesty's Government, but also the honour of the Colony of Queensland, and I hope the Committee will bear with me while I read a quotation from a letter written by Commander Heath, of the Royal Navy. This gentleman was Chairman of the Marine Board of Queensland, and being at the same time the officer in charge of the harbours and lighthouses, he annually visited the ports and rivers of the colony throughout its long sea-board; and the inspection of vessels licensed to carry Islanders is performed by officers attached to his Department, and acting under his orders. He says—

“Admiral Erskine seems to have forgotten the fact that when some doubts were felt as to whether the New Guinea natives who have been brought to Queensland in 1884 properly understood the length of time for which they had been engaged, Sir Samuel Griffith chartered a steamer, collected the whole of the remaining natives, and sent them home at the public expense, carefully landing each native at his own village. The Admiral seems, moreover, to be unaware that no natives from New Guinea have since been brought or proposed to be brought into Queensland. Since the year 1884, to which he refers, the whole system has been changed, and no person could have done more to put an end to all possible abuses previously connected with the importation of South Sea Islanders than Sir Samuel Griffith. The master or mate of any vessel against whom the slightest charge of drunkenness or other misconduct can be substantiated is prohibited from being again employed in the Service. The cubic space allowed to each passenger is the same as under the Imperial Passenger Acts. The dieting scale is ample, while the length of the voyage is only a few weeks—sometimes they are on board only a few days—while a representative of the Government is on board to see the regulations carried out, and that the natives understand their agreements. From the constant passage of Islanders to and fro they now know at which ports they are best treated, and at which plantations they are most comfortable, and they have also their favourite vessels by which they prefer to take their passage to Queensland. When on the plantations their hours of work and rates of pay are fixed by Act of Parliament or regulation, while their wages are paid through the Polynesian Inspector of the district, who is a Magistrate of standing, and who periodically visits the plantations to ascertain if the men have any complaints to make.”

This is the condition of slavery alluded to by the hon. Member, and this is the foundation of the terrible charge levelled against the Government of one of our Colonies, on the evidence of persons who are unable to give the names, dates, or position of their informants. It is on such flimsy evidence that Her Majesty's Government are asked to disallow a Bill passed by a great self-governing colony. If the hon. Member had wished to find evidence the other way, a little research would have yielded some facts in favour of those he has so bitterly attacked. The hon. Member has quoted the evidence of ministers of religion. I do the same, and of men with better opportunities of judging than those to whom he has referred. I have shown from official sources that the statements made by the hon. Member are not founded on fact, and that they are disbelieved by those who have the best opportunity of judging whether they are true. I will only make one further quotation from a letter of a man whom everyone reveres, and who has spent his life in teaching and in doing good amongst the most barbarous races in the world—I refer to Bishop Selwyn, late Bishop of Melanesia. This man, who has passed his life in a great and good cause, has expressed in a letter, with much power and eloquence, his view that these statements are not founded on fact, and ought never to have been made. We cannot neglect the evidence of such a man.

An hon. MEMBER: Read his words.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I will read his words, and those words I should certainly say are not only those of experience, but of truth; and I trust that when we take into consideration the great facilities he has had for knowing, and his sacred mission, which certainly teaches him, as it teaches all men, to do unto others as they would that others should do unto them, you will agree that we cannot accuse him of being likely to excuse or conceal slavery in any form. We must take his evidence, perhaps, as the most weighty of any I have been able to give, and as proving that this whole system, bad as it was, terrible as it was years ago, has ceased to be bad and terrible now, and that the Queensland Government are justified in importing, under the safeguards which now exist, Kanaka labour for the purpose of promoting colonial industry. If we were to follow the argument of the hon. Member we should be debarred from employing negroes, because in the old days before Wilberforce they were slaves. But slaves were freed by the voice of this House ; and in the case of Queensland, the humane and wise dispositions of the Colonial Legislature have freed the Kanaka traffic from the curse of slavery. I think, therefore, they have a right to import, under these safeguards, that labour which they consider necessary. I maintain that the hon. Member has in no way made out his case, and he has proved no infringement of the Rules and Regulations which the humane sympathies of the Queensland Government have passed for the protection of the Kanaka labourers. With these words of Bishop Selwyn I will conclude my remarks. He says:—

“ I cannot help feeling that the indiscriminate condemnation of the traffic that has been expressed is likely to do more harm than good. It was true of the traffic in its beginning ; it is not true of the traffic as it is now conducted.”

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: What is the date of that letter ?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The letter is published in the Blue Book just issued. It was written by Bishop Selwyn about a fortnight ago. He continues—

“ These restrictions if faithfully enforced would go far to remedy the abuses now existing, and with them I think the traffic might be worked to the benefit of the Islands and of Queensland.”

*(11.5.) MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): The right hon. Gentleman has given us a most interesting résumé of the history of this matter, but I venture to say that the effect produced by his speech on the minds of many of those who listened to him must have been the same as it made on mine. Why should the Government of Queensland have found it necessary from time to time to make these regulations, to amend them and revise them ? Because the regulations have proved insufficient to remedy the abuses they were framed to meet. I think the right hon. Gentleman entirely misconceives the position of the whole matter. The presumption is against the recommencement of this traffic. The Blue Book I hold in my hand was the outcome of the Commission appointed in 1885, and was the result of a very careful inspection by a member of the Queensland land Legislature, a barrister at law and a police magistrate in that country. The Blue Book teems with evidence as to the atrocities under the regulations that are in existence at this moment. The right hon. Gentleman cannot deny that what is stated in this Blue Book with reference to what took place in these five vessels happened under the existing regulations. Therefore it is for the Government to show why they did not disallow and prevent the renewal of this traffic ; the onus probandi lies with those who wish to revive the traffic. It is not sufficient for them to call on us who object to this revival to show that cases of the kind we allege have occurred. I admit that the evidence that there have been atrocities and enormities since 1885 is meagre, but I think we are entitled to complain very strongly of the action of Her Majesty's Government in not placing us in possession of information. The right hon. Gentleman has quoted very largely from a Blue Book which was issued to Members this morning, but we only got that Blue Book in consequence of a question which was addressed to the Government from this side of the House. We ought to have had earlier information laid before us. The right hon. Gentleman, in reply to a question this afternoon, gave me some figures with respect to the deaths among the Kanakas, but they were by no means complete, and it was very pertinently pointed out by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) that we not only want to know the number of deaths, but the number of people amongst whom those deaths arose, and on that subject the Blue Book contains no information. During the three years 1888, 1889, and 1890 the number of Islanders imported into Queensland was 6,782, and the number who returned to the islands was 3,849. The deaths reported were 1,380, but it is admitted that there were a large number of deaths which were unreported ; and that there are places where there is no Inspector, and where the deaths which occurred are not entered in these figures of 1,380. It is admitted on the other hand that 6,782 represents more than the number of persons to whom the number of deaths applies, and I think anyone going through the figures carefully will find that the death rate in in the three years is something between seventy and a hundred per thousand. I venture to submit that that admitted fact, drawn from official sources, is a matter which requires further inquiry. I say, further, that if the right hon. Gentleman contends that no case of atrocity has occurred in recent times he cannot have studied the Blue Book. Page 39 of the Blue Book will reveal to him that there were many instances of firing from boats, and firing no doubt takes place on both sides. One outrage gives rise to another, and there is no doubt whatever that there is still going on a great deal that one must deplore. The right hon. Gentleman has read to us a number of letters from persons in Queensland; but I think they would have carried more weight if they had been from independent persons, instead of from persons who were to a certain extent implicated in the allegations that have been made. The letter from Bishop Selwyn is honoured with a place in the Blue Book. I will read a few lines from a letter from another Bishop, who has been in Australasia some years. Many of us knew him by reputation before he went out, and he is the son of that distinguished architect who erected this pile of buildings. I refer to Bishop Barry, a man of the highest honour and experience. The letter appeared in the Guardian newspaper of the 4th May, and is very pertinent to this matter. He says—

"It is with reluctance and pain that I find myself forced to make these quotations."

These are quotations from the Commission which was appointed in 1885.

"Let it be clearly understood that I have no doubt that the Queensland Parliament and Queensland Government fully intended to provide, and thought that they had provided, adequate safeguards against all cruelties in the labour traffic and all injustice and oppression on the plantations. But to make good laws is one thing; to enforce them under all the circumstances is altogether another. Certainly the history of the past shows the difference only too clearly. Accordingly I deeply regret the revival—I see by Sir S. Griffith's letter the reluctant revival on his part—of a traffic which I believe to be injurious in itself, and which is evidently so liable to abuse and atrocity. I have the privilege of knowing Sir S. Griffith, and I have full confidence that, warned by this past experience—of which no one has spoken more indignantly than he himself—he will do his best now to mitigate or remove all abuses. But even if this can be done, I must repeat that I believe the whole traffic to be bad in its effect, and that I have grave fears as to the provision against abuse in the future. Therefore I have said that all must be done, here and in the Pacific itself, to see that the cause of humanity be sternly defended, and the hands of those who fight for it strengthened in every way."

I have only read one or two sentences from Bishop Barry's letter, but he is a man of the highest authority in everything that appertains to Australasia.

BARON H. DE WORMS: Bishop Barry lived in the Polynesian Islands.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS: But he had to do with the Continent as well, and this is the direct testimony of a man who never allowed anything that affected Australasia to escape his notice while he was out there as Bishop. I set that authority to a certain extent against the other. The right hon. Gentleman passed very lightly over the remarkable testimony quoted by my hon. Friend (Mr. Smith) from Admiral Erskine and Admiral Scott. What authority at the present moment could be higher than that of Admiral Scott? Admiral Scott, writing with all the authority of his position, says—

"Before making any remarks on recruiting labour from the Pacific Islands, I would venture to observe that I regret it is proposed to introduce labour from countries that have no form of government to look after the interests of those who are recruited."

Again he says—

"Proper supervision of recruiting in the Islands appears to be a very difficult matter," and "It is a difficult matter to find men for such service."

The letter from a commander in the Royal Navy which was quoted by the right hon. Gentleman must give way in point of authority and in point of responsibility to such a letter as that from Admiral Scott. Therefore, the case has been established to this extent. The onus probandi lies on those who seek to revive this traffic. Then we are confronted with regulations, and told that they are amply sufficient; but the Agent General for Queensland, in a letter to the Times, has admitted that all the evils have taken place under the regulations which are now in force. Why the Act of 1880, under which they are framed, occupies pages of the Blue Book just presented. They contain five parts, eleven Schedules and provisions without number, but they will be useless unless you have men who are determined to carry them out. In the letter of Bishop Selwyn quoted by the right hon. Gentleman, it is pointed out that further regulations are needed, and suggestions are made which really amount to another Revised Code. The Agent General for Queensland was so impressed by this letter in the Guardian of the 4th May that he at once sent it to the Government of Queensland and expressed the hope that they would adopt the suggested regulations if the traffic was to go on. Therefore, the Agent General admitted that the regulations might be improved to the extent the Bishop suggested, thereby admitting that even the revised regulations, of which we have heard so much, are inadequate. What is the reason given for re-opening this traffic? We find it put in a letter from Sir Henry Norman. The last lines in the opening letter in the Blue Book are—

"This, as your Lordship is aware, is a reversal of the policy adopted a few years ago, and will, I have no doubt, greatly help to revive the declining sugar industry of this Colony."

I venture to say that it is the old story. I doubt if this country or Queensland has any moral right to go to these islands in the manner proposed in order to develop any industry. There is too much trade about the matter, and I think we have a right to demand that the policy of the Government shall have less regard for the development of trade and more regard for the principles and dictates of humanity. I endorse the complaint of my hon. Friend as to the action of the Colonial Office in this matter. They show a great want of knowledge. Even the right hon. Gentleman seemed quite unaware of the Resolution passed by the Victorian Parliament, and suggested, when reminded of it, that it was on an entirely different matter.

BARON H. DE WORMS: The information I have come from official sources.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS: Why did not the right hon. Gentleman give the words?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I gave it in the form of an answer. The hon. Gentleman is quoting from a newspaper; I am giving official information.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us the precise words of the Resolution? He has not read them to the Committee—he only gave the effect of them. I take it they are given correctly in the Times, and they relate specifically to this question. There has been great and unaccountable delay on the part of the Colonial Office in this matter. The letter from Sir H. Norman was received on 29th March, but the date of Lord Knutsford's despatch is 13th May, so that five weeks were allowed to elapse before he made any observations to the Queensland Government on the matter. That does not show very great anxiety, or any great sense on the part of the Colonial Office that the question is a vital and pressing one. When questions were asked in the House telegrams were sent out the next day. Why could they not have been sent out when the Government of Queensland pointed out that the whole policy was going to be reversed? The right hon. Gentleman suggests that the Government have no power in this matter. I will only call his attention to Lord Knutsford's suggestion in a telegram of 9th May, and Lord Knutsford said—

"I trust your Government will not object to a short delay before issuing licences under the new Act until I can receive and consider the measure and the safeguards with which it is doubtless surrounded."

Did Lord Knutsford receive any reply to that telegram? Have the Queensland Government complied with the suggestion contained in it? Because if the Colonial Office could do nothing it was hardly worth while to make the suggestion that the issue of licences should be suspended unless it had something behind it. This is not a matter for the Colony of Queensland alone—I will say nothing disrespectful about that great Colony—but, in the words of Admiral Erskine's letter—

"The honour of this country is concerned in seeing that these poor unhappy people receive the protection of this great Empire."

Our policy in the past is about to be reversed; the traffic is going to spring up again, under regulations which everybody says are insufficient.

BARON H. DE WORMS: The traffic never stopped.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS: Well, the issue of licences was stopped in 1890.

BARON H. DE WORMS: The figures show that the traffic has not ceased.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS: Licences were stopped and no new ones were issued. If not, what does Sir Henry Norman mean by the words—

“Your lordship is aware there is a reversal of the policy adopted a few years ago.”

The old licences are going to be re-issued, and Lord Knutsford asked that they should not be issued till he had further information. I am not in a position to say that Lord Knutsford ought to have disallowed the Act, but we have a right to demand that ample information shall be placed at the disposal of Lord Knutsford, and through him before Parliament, before the issue of new licences is permitted to proceed.

(11.23.) MR. W. A. MCARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): Everybody must give the hon. Gentleman full credit for his stand against the continuation of this traffic, and while I find myself compelled to differ from him and from the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), I must ask to be believed when I say that I have no sympathy with any form of slavery, and detest as much as anyone the atrocities and abuses which took place in Queensland years ago. Undoubtedly up to 1885 there were abuses which were revealed by the Commission. It was conclusively shown that sufficient care had not been taken in the selection of agents on board the recruiting vessels, and that proper care in many cases had not been taken to explain to the Islanders the conditions under which they were to work, and the term for which they were engaged. The system of inspection was also very lax. But I say the rules themselves were good rules, and that there was nothing disgraceful in the traffic itself, provided you got the good rules carried out, and nothing which ought to prevent the Colony of Queensland engaging in it.

Mr. John Ellis

Even Lord Charles Scott is of that opinion, for in the last clause of his letter, on page 5 of the Blue Book, he says—

“The regulations approved by His Excellency the Governor of Queensland in Government Gazette of 18th April, 1884, appear to me to be such that if strictly carried out and enforced by Government agents on board labour vessels, they should insure the labour traffic being properly conducted.”

I might also commend to the attention of the Government another paragraph, No. 6, in Lord C. Scott's letter, the paragraph in which he suggests that it might be possible for the Queensland Government to establish a permanent station on those islands where recruiting is carried on, so that there might be an officer living on the spot who could explain to the Islanders the terms of their engagements. Sir S. Griffith feared that the French Government would intervene if we established a post of that kind, but it would be worth while for the Foreign Office to communicate with the French Government on the subject. The difficulties of control in this matter are immense, but I am not prepared to say that it is impossible that effective control should be established. I do not say that I like the traffic, or that it is one which, unless most carefully watched, is not likely to be greatly abused. But I would point out this, that the Government of Queensland is conducted by Sir S. Griffith, who at one time came to the conclusion that the regulations were not and could not be carried out; but Sir S. Griffith, with all the details before him, has changed his mind, and believes he could frame regulations under which it could be safely conducted, and that he could ensure effective supervision of the traffic. Sir S. Griffith is the last man in the world to make wild statements which he cannot substantiate. You have the Prime Minister of Queensland, who says he could control the traffic, the majority of the Queensland Parliament who approve of it, and the Government of Queensland also believes effective regulations can be framed. You have all these authorities in that great self-governing Colony, who believe that this traffic can be carried on in a creditable manner. Are we in England, with none of their experience, going to say to the Ministry and Governor of Queensland, "We do not believe one word of anything you tell us. We are going to have our own way, and we do not care a straw what you think." All I can say is that if we are prepared to take that stand, I think it would be a very unfortunate day in the history of our relations with our great Southern self-governing Colonies. Surely, if we are to attach any importance at all to the opinion of public men in Queensland we are bound to take their word as the solemn assertion of their belief. Every single executive and popular authority in the Colony give their word that they can carry on this traffic without the disgraceful circumstances that accompanied it in times gone by. Do we, I say, refuse then, point blank, to take them at their word? Do we refuse our consent that this experiment should be made? If the anticipation of the public and responsible authorities in Queensland should not be realised, surely we can interfere at any time we choose. If we are able to bully Queensland, or any other Colony that passes legislation which we do not like, surely we can interfere next year as well as this year; and I say it is a very doubtful policy to stop this experiment on the very threshold. I absolutely agree that this traffic will want watching. I will myself call the attention of the Aborigines' Protection Society and other bodies to it; and I hope the Admiralty will also call the attention of the captains of our men-of-war vessels upon the Australian station to it, so that as far as they can they may ensure that this traffic will be properly carried on. I do not like the traffic at all itself; but neither do I like legislation directed against the popular authorities in the Colony of Queensland, especially legislation which would seem to be passed in what is very like a state of panic. Queensland is not a Crown colony. This is a colony which has a free Constitution; it is not bound to us by any very strong constitutional ties; and it is a serious thing, therefore, to reject and absolutely to refuse to assent to legislation which is practically unanimously asked for by this great self-governing Colony. I do press upon Her Majesty's Government to represent to Queensland in the strongest possible manner the alarm that exists both in the House and in the country in consequence of what happened some years ago, and to urge upon them the necessity for the most strenuous control of this traffic. I do implore of this House of Commons, at all events at this juncture, not to put to shame their own professions with regard to the rights of self-governing Colonies by refusing what has been unanimously asked for by the people of Queensland. When we have got the assurance of the Prime Minister, of the Governor, and of every Public Body in Queensland, surely it is a hard thing to say to all these authorities that we do not believe a word they say; that we are opposed to giving them the chance of making this experiment, and that we set up our own experience against theirs.

*(11.36.) MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I think the House is indebted to the hon. Member for Flintshire for having introduced this question; but I think that, after having heard the speeches which have been made by other hon. Members, we may fairly say that this philanthropic bubble, if I may so term it, has largely been pricked. I have myself been long interested in this question, and have had some acquaintance with it through relations engaged in this nefarious slave-owning in Queensland. Having heard from the mouth of the hon. Member for Flintshire of the atrocities that have been committed, I thought I really ought to say something on behalf of those who are absent from this House. We have heard some very extraordinary statements this afternoon. The hon. Member for Nottingham complained that the evidence of recent atrocities was very meagre, and said he thought because the evidence was very meagre we should obtain some evidence anyhow and perhaps at any cost. I hold in my hand a paper—and I have only had it a few hours—signed by "W. Kinnaird Rose," dated 18th May, in which that gentleman says—

"I have drafted the Report of the Royal Commission of 1886, and I am bound to admit that not a word can be truly urged against the labour traffic of Queensland from 1886 to the present day."

This gentleman confesses that he drafted the very Report the hon. Member for Flintshire quoted from, and he affirms from his own knowledge that there is not that evidence which the hon. Member for Nottingham complains is so very meagre, and which at any cost ought to be obtained. The hon. Member for Flintshire and the hon. Member for Nottingham seem to have mistaken the motive of the Melbourne Legislative Assembly in passing the Resolution to which reference has been made. Everybody knows that the labour question is a burning question in the Colony, and the Melbourne Resolution is only a protest against any labour whatever of dark skins being imported into the Colony. When you read the Blue Book you will see that the Kanakas, after having served their time in apprenticeship, were so content with the country that they stayed there, and percolated into the adjoining Colony; and no doubt this Resolution was passed owing to the belief that this percolation was calculated ultimately to reach Melbourne. The hon. Member for Nottingham has adduced the authority of Bishop Barry, but is Bishop Barry to be put in the same category with Bishop Selwyn? As to the condition of these so-called slaves, the editor of a leading journal in Queensland states that ample evidence can be brought forward to show that they are in a fairly good state of health, and that a good many of them like their work so well that they remain in the country after their term is finished. He quotes the evidence of Mr. Lindt, F.R.G.S., on the subject. The Rev. Alexander Smith, the Convener of the Presbyterian Heathen Mission, declares that he found the hours of labour of the Kanakas very fair, and that he examined their food and found it plentiful. As to the alleged increased mortality amongst them, it is quite conceivable that it might be attributable to the fact that they eat too much meat, these islanders not being accustomed to animal food. Bishop

Mr. Lawrence

Selwyn's statement points to this conclusion. It is well known also that when the black man comes in contact with liquor he usually suffers considerably for it. The hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. John Ellis) said that neither Queensland nor any other Colony should be allowed to introduce these people from the outside, that neither Queensland nor this country had any moral right to do so; but is he prepared to say that the rich fields of Queensland are to lie desolate merely because this moral right is denied to that Colony? Can the Government do anything to uphold their alleged moral right to prevent the Queenslanders doing what all really self-governing Colonies have a perfect right to do? When you consider that a vast area of this Queensland district can only be opened up by the help of this alien labour, it is for them to say whether they are willing that that alien labour should come within their borders, and, if they do so, to take care that there shall be no injustice in bringing them over. There is ample evidence that they come willingly; and I venture to think as years go on, and as immigrants return to their country with a knowledge of what is to be made in Queensland, assuredly there will be a greater influx every year of the islanders, because they will see the enormous benefits to be got there, and the wealth that is to be made there and carried home. For these reasons I think the House will do well to maintain the position which the Government have taken up. It is altogether preposterous that we should interfere with a Colony like Queensland; for once we venture to interfere with the local concerns of a great self-governing colony, so assuredly shall we create great ill-feeling and dissatisfaction.

(11.46.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I do not wish to detain the Committee at any length, but I am rather anxious to call its attention to two questions raised by the Debate on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith). The first of those two questions is the view that we ourselves take of the traffic, and the other question is whether we are to comply with his suggestion and expect the Colonial Office to disallow this Act. It appears to me that my hon. Friend would make a very serious demand indeed, and I will go so far as to say a dangerous demand, if he were to ask the Colonial Office to disallow an Act of this character. We all know that for a great many years past the practice has been to hold the power of the Imperial Parliament to disallow an Act in reserve as a power only to be used in cases of very grave, urgent necessity. Can any hon. Friend, upon the information we now possess, which is admitted to be incomplete, say that any such case of grave, urgent necessity has arisen? I believe that we should give great offence not only to that important Colony of Queensland itself, but also to all the Australian Colonies, if we were to disallow an Act of this kind to pass through their Legislature. I do not believe that the Resolution of the Victorian Legislature was intended to suggest any such act on our part. Whether it was dictated by philanthropic motives, or whether the desire to prevent the pauper labour traffic from coming to them had something to do with it, I do not pretend to say. In any case we must be perfectly certain that had anyone risen in the Victorian Legislature, and said, "Would you like this to be stopped by the Act of the Imperial Government?" the Victorian Legislature would have unequivocally answered in the negative. I venture, therefore, to think that having regard to all the circumstances, and especially to the undesirability of interfering, except in extreme cases, we ought not to suggest the disallowance of this Act. But it is quite a different matter, as the Under Secretary for the Colonies has done, to endeavour to justify this matter through and through. I confess I think that the trouble that has arisen in this matter has very largely arisen, in the first place, from the somewhat airy and easy way in which the Colonial Office appear to treat the question; and, secondly, from the habit the Under Secretary has formed of rather overstating his case, and endeavouring to justify everything that is done. One would think, to listen to him, that this traffic was absolutely unexceptionable and rather pleasant than otherwise. The most we can say, I think, is that it is a traffic for which there is something to be said, and which may possibly, under very stringent regulations, be prevented from doing harm. We have only to look at Queensland itself to see how much danger there is. Admiral Scott and Captain Davies evidently think that even the best regulations require the most watchful and constant care to prevent an abuse of the traffic. That is also the opinion of Bishop Selwyn, because, he says, very moderately, that these regulations, if they are enforced, will be sufficient, implying, I must say, that what powers there are are not very properly enforced. It is very clear, therefore, that we are justified in having a debate here, and pressing this matter on the Colonial Office, and perfectly justified in having these new Regulations laid before us, and having an opportunity of discussing them. I will add one word more. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary referred to the Act of 1872. That was an Imperial Act, and, of course, all this traffic, so far as it is carried on outside the boundaries of Queensland—that is to say, so far as it is carried on in the islands and on the high seas—is carried on under the protection of the British flag. It is not a matter within the competence or jurisdiction of Queensland at all. There are two conclusions to be drawn from that observation. The first is that we have ample power, whenever we choose, to make any additional regulations; or, perhaps, what is more important, to take additional precautions, for the enforcement of the regulation which may be necessary. I hope that that fact which has now been brought before the House will be carefully considered by the Colonial Office, and that, if they see reason to believe that the resumption of the traffic is likely to lead to the revival of the old abuses, they will take care that the powers of the Act of 1872 are put very fully into force, and that all the Navy can do to watch over them shall be done. The other remark I make is this: We have also a responsibility. It is under the protection of the British flag that the trade is carried on, and it is therefore no part of our duty to throw this matter entirely back upon Queensland. We are jointly responsible with Queensland. Queensland is responsible for what goes on within her territory; we are responsible for what goes on upon the high seas and in the islands; and we are therefore amply justified in raising this Debate, and in asking that the renewal of the licences should be subjected to the very severest scrutiny. At the same time, seeing that many of us feel the great difficulty of interfering with the powers of a colony, I hope my hon. Friend (Mr. S. Smith) will feel that his object has been sufficiently served by the Debate which has taken place, and will not think it necessary to proceed to a Division.

(11.52.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): While I agree with many of the remarks of the hon. Member who has just spoken, I think he has done less than justice to my right hon. Friend (Baron H. de Worms), who, I am sure, takes quite as serious a view of this serious question as the hon. Gentleman himself or any Member of this House. It is a question of very great importance, and I think the hon. Gentleman opposite has done well to point out that it divides into the two branches which he has specified—namely, the question of how far we can or ought to interfere with an independent colony; and, secondly, how far this trade is or is not good in itself. We must all be agreed that interference with an independent colony is absolutely impossible. With regard to the traffic I agree, and so does my right hon. Friend, in asserting that, in so far as our direct responsibility is concerned—the responsibility which extends over the whole of the high seas, in distinction from the territorial waters—that is a very grave responsibility; and it is the duty of of the Colonial Office to watch very carefully that the interests of the native population are in no way injured. For the rest, my own impression is that this importation of labour is probably very important to the interests of the Colonies, but that it is a practice capable of very great abuse. Yet, at the same time, it is a practice which, by sufficiently guarded safeguards, and by rigid rules, rigidly enforced, may be carried on to the benefit of the islanders themselves. Under these circumstances, I can assure the House that the Government are fully alive to all the responsibility which this trade lays upon them; and I venture to think that the burning question of the relations between the Mother Country and the Colonies may well be avoided on the present occasion. I hope the Committee will not think it necessary to longer continue this Debate; and if we obtain this Vote to-night, I can assure the Committee that it will greatly facilitate Public Business.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Cuninghame Graham.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press that.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Yes, I am going to press it.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 169.—(Div. List, No. 147.)

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Clause 3.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to move, in page 2, line 9, after "(D)," to insert the words "except as under." I am sorry to inflict this Amendment upon the House at this late hour. I hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been able to bring this subject on at an earlier hour. The point which I wish to raise is the old story of whether the Income Tax should be charged on industrial incomes at the same rate as on those incomes which are derived from capital. It will be unnecessary for me to dwell at any length on the important difference there is between these two great classes of income. The Income Tax derived from the absolute labour and industry of individuals, and which die with those individuals, is altogether on a different basis from that derived from spontaneous sources—namely, the results of capital. But at the present time the two classes of income have to pay Income Tax at exactly the same rate. Let us look for a moment at the position of the two classes. A person with an income of, say, £200 a year, derived from spontaneous sources—from investments or shares—can spend every penny of that income without infringing the rules of proper order or care, or thrift, on the necessities of life, and need not put by anything for the future. But a man who has £200 a year dependent upon his own exertions—whether in a shop, a factory, or a profession—should not spend all that income. He must set apart something for life insurance and provide for possible sickness and loss of work, and to do this at least £30 must be taken from his precarious income. Therefore, we come to this result: That a man who earns £200 a year by his own industry must pay away about 15 per cent. of it to meet possible contingencies. It is manifestly unfair, then, to tax industrial incomes at precisely the same rate as those derived from capital. It, of course, may be said that a man may run the risk, and not insure his life, or provide for sickness; but it has been the great object of the Legislature in recent years to do everything possible to impress upon the people the importance of providing for such contingencies. It adds, however, very much to the difficulties of securing this whilst the tax is the same on these two classes of incomes. The proposal to make a differential rate in the Income Tax between industrial and spontaneous income is not a new one, and, indeed, I have been blamed on that ground. In 1842, when Sir Robert Peel introduced the new Income Tax, Lord Brougham moved a Resolution in the House of Lords to the effect that it was expedient to make a reduction or difference between incomes arising from capital and incomes arising from labour, with the object of levying a smaller proportion on the latter. It was debated at great length by Lord Brougham in an able speech, and no argument was used against it. It was also debated at great length in this House, when Mr. Crawford moved to omit from Schedule D, professions and trades, employment, or avocation. This was supported by Lord John Russell and Mr. Hume. Thus I am merely carrying out the wishes and intentions of the great financiers of that day in the Resolution which I propose. I think the only reason why the principle was not adopted at that time was because it was always felt that this Income Tax was a temporary tax, and that, as it would not last very long, it was not worth while to make the alteration. There was also this reason—that the great bulk of securities were in Consols, the present enormous holdings of other stocks not then having developed. It was felt that if a reduction was made from the incomes of the industrial classes, it would be thrown largely upon the land, and as land was greatly interested, the alteration was not made upon that ground. I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer will admit that there is a great deal of difference between these two sources of income, and he must acknowledge that, in the interests of strict fairness, some change should be made. The objections he will raise, however, are, I think, three-fold. He will say, if we reduce the taxation on industrial incomes, that there are a great number of very rich men who receive incomes of that nature. But the Amendment I submit will not embrace those rich men, and therefore he will still have the gratification of taxing the rich men who draw industrial incomes. The Amendment simply deals with those having incomes of £400 per year and under. The second objection will be that it would be hard to tax the widows and persons of small means, who derive their incomes from spontaneous sources, while not taxing industry. But from the remarks which I have already made, I think it is clear that the widow with a small spontaneous income is really better off than a married man with the same amount of industrial income for this reason—that her income is permanent while in the other case it fluctuates, and being derived entirely from industry is precarious, and would of course be lost to his family in case of death. Probably the real objection of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as he will say, will be the difficulty involved in the change. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) once said that a reform of the Income Tax would involve a century of labour; and I believe the degree of trouble involved is the reason the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not go into the subject. I have been in a public office myself, and I know that the permanent officials do not like a revolutionary change in their Department; but if the change I propose is just and fair and reasonable, the difficulty of carrying it out should not be an insuperable objection. I feel certain that the difficulty has been exaggerated. We must remember that we have already five Schedules in the Income Tax Bill—Schedules A to E; and it is a remarkable thing that the differential doctrine is already recognised in the Schedules. Schedule B is charged differently to all the other Schedules, and what I propose is that Schedule D should also be charged at a different rate. The difference I have already pointed out is not, however, all, for Schedule B is not only charged in a different way from the other Schedules, but different charges are under that Schedule levied in different parts of the United Kingdom. England is charged 3d., Ireland and Scotland 2½d., while all the other Schedules are at the rate of 6d. Therefore it is shown that the system has been introduced and can be carried out. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may also say that part of the income in Schedule D is derived from capital. No doubt that is so; but the difficulty is one which can be got over either by each person stating and proving what amount of capital is in his business, or, as I think better, to allow the capital employed in industry in this country which is charged under Schedule D to receive a lower rate of charge, in the way I have described. The last point I wish to bring before the House is the effect that this change would have on the present Budget. I am aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's surplus is not large; but I will show exactly what my proposal would do. The proposal is that under Schedule D all industrial incomes under £400 per year, instead of paying 6d., should only pay 3d., bearing the same rebate as before. What are the effects? There are 436,000 persons in the United Kingdom who pay under Schedule D, and 215,000 out of that number pay on incomes of less than £200 per annum, and 150,000 pay on incomes between £200 and £400. That is to say, that out of the whole number of persons, 436,000, who pay Income Tax upon this Schedule, more than three-quarters, 366,000, pay upon less than £400 per year. The whole amount they pay comes to £800,000 per year. Therefore, if my Amendment were carried it would mean a reduction in the Revenue of £400,000. I have no hesitation in saying that reduction should, without doubt, be added to the large spontaneous incomes, for these are the incomes that pay relatively and absolutely the smallest amount of taxation. I will acknowledge frankly that my ultimate view is to get rid of Schedule D altogether, because the removal of that Schedule would do away with a great deal of injustice and unpleasantness, dispense with those inquisitive forms we receive, and dispel the frauds perpetrated in connection with it by the public and the extortions that come from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Talking about Schedule D, I only had the honour of receiving one of its papers a short time ago. It is a most formidable document, arranged as closely as it can be on four large foolscap pages, and I defy any human being to fill these forms up without probably incurring some serious penalty. It is such a form as only the best counsel in England could decipher and understand. My view is to get rid of this Schedule D altogether, because I believe the French system of simply levying Income Tax upon spontaneous income and securities is better. I have not proposed to go so far, as I thought it advisable to have a small beginning in the direction of what I believe to be the right and ultimate solution of this difficulty. When we look at the circumstances of taxation, I say the bottom of the middle class is the most severely taxed portion of the community, although they are often not so well off as many of the artizan class. They are the people who are the backbone of our trade and commerce, and I think it would be right to make the incidence of taxation fairer and easier in their respect. All experience shows that is the direction in which amendment of the Income Tax should take; and I hope the Government will tell us definitely that they contemplate some change. I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, after "(D)," to insert the words "except as under."—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am sure that everyone will agree with the concluding portion of my hon. Friend's speech, in which he stated that the lower middle class, the poorer middle class, is that section of the community particularly deserving of the attention of this House. That is a view which I have held, and some of my own recommendations have been in the direction of somewhat relieving the heavy burden of that class. Let us see precisely how we stand. The Amendment of my hon. Friend would only benefit those having incomes of £400 or under. A person with such an income would have the usual rebate on £120 and a rebate of threepence on the remainder, while those immediately above that amount would pay the whole tax without any rebate. To use a phrase occasionally employed in this connection, the jump would be very great. If my hon. Friend contends that this might be remedied, I must remind him that we are not now dealing with an abstract Resolution. My hon. Friend has moved a particular Amendment in a particular Bill. I must ask the Committee to examine the nature of that

Amendment, and I think I can conclusively prove that it will be extremely difficult for hon. Members who wish to see justice done in taxation to vote for it. My hon. Friend has spoken as if all the income of those who earn less than £400, and are assessed under Schedule D, is derived from their own exertions. That is not the case. A portion of it must come from capital employed. Let me point out that my hon. Friend in his specific Amendment deals only with Schedule D, and not with Schedule E. He proposes that a clerk who pays under Schedule D is to be relieved, but the one who pays under Schedule E is not to be relieved. Now, those who pay under Schedule E are persons in the service of the State or of a municipal body, or of any body corporate of any kind, such as a Joint Stock Bank, and if my hon. Friend's Amendment were passed, these persons would continue to pay sixpence, while clerks in the service of a private bank or tradesmen who might have £3,000 or £4,000 in their business would pay only threepence. I would ask the Committee, Can you possibly assent to such a proposal as that? Again, while the clergy belonging to any ecclesiastical body, such as the Wesleyans or the Church of England, would continue to pay sixpence, those who receive their stipends from congregations would only pay threepence. I think I have pointed out to the Committee most serious reasons why we cannot accept this Amendment. But, says my hon. Friend, will you extend the proposal to Schedule E? In that case his estimate of loss would have to be increased very largely indeed. Again, under the Amendment, shareholders in railways would pay only threepence, while holders of Consols or of foreign Government stocks would continue to pay sixpence. Is that contemplated by my hon. Friend? His Amendment would tax the whole railway property of the United Kingdom, when held by persons with incomes under £400, at 3d. instead of at 6d. If it were passed a man who put, say, £4,000 in North Western Railway Stock or debentures would pay only threepence, whereas if he invested the money in Consols he would be obliged to pay as much again. The Committee will accordingly see the dilemma in which my hon. Friend is placed. And, again, he fell into a grave error as to the number of people affected. He puts his estimate of the separate assessments under Schedule D at 436,000 persons, but this does not include the vast number of shareholders in companies, who are assessed under that Schedule, and therefore the hon. Member must add to his estimate of the loss which would accrue the difference which his proposal would make in the sum paid by many of the shareholders in the various companies. I cannot conceive that he has thought this matter out. My hon. Friend went very far when he said he thought all capital engaged in the industry of the country should be relieved of payment altogether. There is a great deal of spontaneous income derived from capital employed in commerce under Schedule D, and I think you would exempt the very persons it is desired to tax. How can you separate in a tradesman's business what represents income from his capital and what represents the efforts of his own industry? The effect of the Amendment would be, that the tradesman with £3,000 or £4,000 capital, which he could leave to his family, would pay threepence on the earnings of that capital, while the half-pay officer or the telegraph clerk would pay sixpence on his precarious income. The hon. Member has said that the alteration proposed in his Amendment would involve a loss of £400,000, but the estimate of the Inland Revenue officials is that the loss would be nearer a million. Am I to be asked at this stage of the Session and at this stage of Parliament to find an additional million and to re-construct the whole of the Income Tax?—because I think I have said enough to show the Committee that you could not effect only the one alteration my hon. Friend suggests. I would not be responsible for the working of an Act which would relieve a person assessed under Schedule D, and at the same time leave so many persons exactly in the same position without relief.

(12.42.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I do not think—if there is to be a Division taken on this subject—that we shall have to determine the question whether or not there shall be further abatement on the Income Tax in the lower scale. That is a subject which has to be considered. Everyone must feel that the Income Tax is one of the main pillars of the revenue of the country, and that you cannot make alterations in it without very careful consideration of all matters of detail. It is quite plain that at a quarter to one in the morning, at this period of the Session, the House is quite incapable of entering upon such a discussion as it should do before deciding upon any alteration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has shown how complicated the question is, and how many difficulties surround it in every form. One argument used by the right hon. Gentleman is, to my mind, conclusive, namely—Is it right and fair at this stage of the Session, and at this period of the Parliament, to create a deficit of one million and to impose upon the Government the duty of bringing in practically a new Budget, because if you are going to get rid of a million by this Amendment you must find the money elsewhere. It seems to me that the proposal is one which it is quite impossible to adopt under the present circumstances, and therefore I shall certainly support the Government in opposing this Amendment.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I desire to express my sympathy with the Motion of my hon. Friend (Mr. Bartley), but I quite see from the facts which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that it is practically impossible to carry it into effect at this stage of the Session. I trust, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the next Parliament will see his way to deal with the matter in a satisfactory manner, because it is just, and I believe there is a general feeling throughout the country in its favour. I will only say this—that I think there are imperfections which might at once be corrected without those vast complications arising to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded. For instance, it is well worthy of consideration whether it is necessary to call upon these small incomes to pay this enormous tax, for so it is, in one lump sum. I do not see why the amount might not be divided and paid quarterly. This would give some relief, and would not, I think, cause the Chancellor of the Exchequer much difficulty. I entirely assent to the views expressed by my hon. Friend (Mr. Bartley), and I trust that in the next Parliament the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to deal with this question in a thoroughly satisfactory manner.

*(12.46.) MR. BARTLEY: For one moment I may be allowed a word of explanation. I have brought this matter forward on many occasions, both in Committee and in the form of a Resolution, and I have been told that it was not a convenient opportunity, and that it would take a hundred years to bring about the change I proposed. Now, when I have brought the subject forward in this form, again I am told it is inconvenient, and this has been the manner in which the subject has been treated for the past fifty years. I am told my figures are wrong, but all I can say is that they are taken from Returns furnished by the Treasury and from the edition of 1890, and the Treasury is responsible for the inaccuracy, not I.

MR. GÖSCHEN: The hon. Member will surely see that my explanation was to show not that the figures were wrong, but that the hon. Member had not taken into account the distinction between the assessment of a company and the assessment of individual shareholders.

*MR. BARTLEY: I quite understand; but when I take another form of Income Tax the right hon. Gentleman says the incomes derived from Railway Companies come under Schedule D. If so, the fact is concealed in an extraordinary way. I do not see how such incomes can be included. All that the right hon. Gentleman has said goes to prove the immense difficulty of the subject, and the importance of having a Committee to examine it, as I have urged and moved for year after year. The matter should be carefully gone into. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the clergy, and clerks in the post offices and other classes. I purposely left them out for the present, and confined my Amendment to one Schedule, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might not accuse me of mixing up the Schedules. He has met me again with the old argument about complications. The discussion has shown the importance of the subject, and if I am lucky enough to get anybody to tell with me I shall go to a Division.

(12.50.) MR. TIMOTHY HEALY (Longford, N.): I would make an appeal to the hon. Gentleman not to waste the time of the House. It was terrible to see the state into which the hon. Gentleman worked himself to-night. It is true, he addressed himself to the interest of that class to whom he is about to make an appeal for re-election; but I trust his zeal will not lead him to abate in the least degree his well-known loyalty to the Government. Is there no one to warn him in familiar tones of the danger to the integrity of the Empire? I hope he will not put the House to the trouble of a Division. Very painful is it also to see him assisted in his revolt by that staunch supporter of the Government, the hon. Member for Bow (Sir John Colomb). Really it is a most painful thing, at this period of the Session, to see a loyal Conservative Gentleman about to go to his constituents in a few weeks' time for the purpose of telling them that he has done his best for them, keeping up Ministers to this hour. Surely there are other subjects that hon. Gentlemen might go to their constituents upon? That noble subject, the "unity of the Empire," ought to be sufficient for the purpose.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bartley) upon the movement he has made in this matter, and I must say that neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the ex-Chancellor has at all touched the principle of the proposal. This is a question which excites a good deal of feeling in the country, which may have an effect on the General Election. I trust the hon. Member will go to a Division. The suggestion of the hon. Member for a differential Income Tax on earned and unearned incomes is a good one, only I think he does not go far enough. It should be a shilling in the pound on all incomes above £5,000. I do not know whether the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham intends to support the hon. Member, but I remember that at one time he was a supporter of the principle. There are, I have no doubt, a great number of people whose votes depend on the manner in which this subject is treated. The subject has not been seriously treated to-night; neither the Chancellor nor the ex-Chancellor has said anything against the principle. I hope the hon. Member will take a Division, and will get such support as will compel recognition of the importance of the subject.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The decision to be taken will not in any way have reference to the principle of differential taxation, or whether the Income Tax should be heavier on incomes from capital than from industry. The proposal of the hon. Member does not involve that principle.

MR. BARTLEY: Yes, it does.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: It simply proposes one small alteration in the incidence of Income Tax, and upon that I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has shown the present position will not be improved, and that, indeed, the inequality will probably be increased. I think that the hon. Gentleman himself, in his interjected remarks to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, showed that he has not quite grasped the position, for when the right hon. Gentleman mentioned a number of incomes under £400 which the hon. Member had not taken into account, the hon. Member said, "Very well, make it £500." And, again, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer mentioned Schedule E, he said, "Well, let us extend it to Schedule E." What we want is a Committee to examine carefully the whole question of the incidence of the Income Tax. If hon. Gentlemen would support such a proposal, then we might arrive at some proper conclusion upon a scheme of differential taxation on permanent and precarious incomes.

Question put.

(1.0.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 35; Noes 110.—(Div. List, No. 148.)

Clause agreed to.

Dr. Clark

Clause 4.

*MR. THOMAS H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): The Amendment I have to propose has not so sweeping an effect as the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Bartley) would have had, and it would not, if accepted, very seriously disarrange the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget. At this hour I do not intend to inflict upon the House anything in the nature of a speech. I will merely say a few words in explanation of my Amendment. The House is aware that, while the rates are levied on the net income from property, and while Income Tax generally derived from earnings and personalty is levied on actual net income, yet for the purpose of Income Tax on land and houses the gross rental of property is assessed. This may, of course, be defended to a certain extent, and may not be so very objectionable on large and valuable property, but it presses very heavily indeed on smaller property throughout the country. We have been passing Acts for the purpose of encouraging the building of dwellings for the working classes; we are to advance money at a cheap rate of interest for the purpose of encouraging the provision of small holdings for the labouring population; and there are Acts of Parliament that by sanctioning the system of compounding—that is to say, of arrangement between the Local Authorities and the landlords to fix a certain rate of assessment for small properties—encourage the maintenance of this class of dwellings. The principle of the Income Tax, I apprehend, is to charge the actual product, the actual income, or the actual profits derived; but that principle is altogether violated by the way in which Income Tax is charged on the gross and not on the net clear income from property. I am quite aware this opens up questions of a larger character, and I know that it will be said that while landed and house property enjoys certain immunities from taxation, it is inflicted with a heavier tax in another direction; but I do not see there is any justification for inflicting a practical injustice upon certain people in connection with the taxation they have to pay. It is no satisfaction to a man who pays more than he ought to know that there are others who pay less in respect to other property. The proposition I make is not a large one. It will not affect very large interests, but I believe I have—I hope I have—the sympathy of Members on both sides of the House in the desire to see all taxation levied on actual income, not on supposed income, and I make this suggestion with reference to this particular grievance in the confident hope that it will receive considerable encouragement. This is an actual grievance. I can tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer of cases in which the income derived from small house property is but half what it is assessed at for purposes of the Income Tax. I could give the Chancellor of the Exchequer a case in which a number of large old timber cottages, which are very comfortable and convenient for the people who live in them, but very expensive to keep up, are rated at less than half what they are assessed at for the purposes of the Income Tax, and the rating fairly represents what they actually produce to the owner. I do not refer to exceptional cases; you may find them all over the country in rural districts, and very largely in Scotland and Ireland, where the property is assessed for Income Tax in many cases at double what it is for rating purposes. There is no reason or justification for this. This is a grievance generally admitted, but probably it is felt most keenly in agricultural districts. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he is not prepared to accept my Amendment, will, at all events, give us some expression of opinion that may lead to the belief that at no very distant time the substantial injustice to which I am calling attention will be removed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 28, at end, insert—"Except as to any property of less annual value than twenty pounds, or which is compounded for by the owner for the payment of rates, and in every such case the sum charged as the rateable value shall be taken as the annual value for Income Tax assessment."—(Mr. Thomas H. Bolton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(1.12.) MR. GOSCHEN : The proposal of the hon. Member is to charge a lower rate of Income Tax on cottage property; that it shall be charged upon the rateable value instead of on the gross. It is a very large question, and I am quite certain that if the proposal had been made from this side it would have been denounced as one of the crimes committed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in relief of owners of property. It is a proposal to relieve owners of property from a portion of the taxation they now pay. The hon. Member says there is an anomaly in charging the tax upon more than the actual receipts, and I have always acknowledged there is force in the argument that the tax ought to be levied on the actual receipts, and that the time may come when it will be possible to lay this taxation on the net and not on the gross receipts, and that as regards all property, not cottage property only. But it has always been held that such a measure would have to be considered side by side with other measures affecting real property. The point raised by the hon. Member is one well worthy of consideration, but I am not prepared to deal with it in a piecemeal manner. The hon. Member is fully entitled to call attention to the matter, but I hope he will not now consider it necessary to press it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): If I am right in my appreciation of the right hon. Gentleman's observations, they come to this: That he does not dispute the general position taken up by the hon. Member, but he rather regrets that he himself did not make the proposal. He said that if he had made it he would have met with much criticism and opposition from this side of the House; but he admits the general force of the argument urged against the injustice of assessing a man on a nominal amount while he receives in reality a much smaller amount. The force of the argument will be clear to everybody, but I am inclined to think that we who sit in this part of the House are specially concerned with the present Amendment from the point of view of some Irish farmers assessed under Schedule B. It seems to me that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not considered the matter from that point of view, and while admitting the force of the general argument, has declined to discuss it. But I submit if the proposal does contain some grain of truth or reason, the Government ought to enter into the discussion with the object of doing justice to all classes of taxpayers. Unquestionably injustice is done to many small owners in the rural districts of the country; and, no doubt, this proposed Amendment will attract within the next few days a considerable amount of attention. The right hon. Gentleman has not urged one single solid argument against the hon. Member; but we are not so much concerned from his point of view—we are concerned for the Irish farmers to whom I have alluded, in so far as they are affected by this proposal; and we have good ground for asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is prepared to maintain his untenable position, or to make some concession which may appear insignificant to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but which, to many ratepayers, is a substantial matter, and in regard to which many of us will be interrogated before many days have passed.

*MR. BARTLEY: It is four years since I brought forward a very similar Amendment to this, argued it in the same way as a grievance, and received on that occasion exactly the same answer from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I must say it does seem to me hard that a grievance admitted to exist amongst a large class should be postponed, and should not be considered until some grand system of reform for everybody comes into play. We heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian that it would take a hundred years to carry out complete reform, but I think the time has come when the House should press the Government to take this matter in hand, and it is a matter too important to be taken at a late hour like this, when Members are impatient.

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: The doctrine of the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to be quite out of harmony with the doctrine of the First Lord of the Treasury. The doctrine of the latter is that it is the landlord who pays the rates and taxes ultimately, wherever there is a revision of rent, and that is the doctrine of the Local Government Bill. What then is the use of talking of the relief of the occupier?

Question put.

Ayes 24; Noes 97.—(Div. List, No. 149.)

MR. HEALY: I have a request to make on behalf of a small but deserving class of Her Majesty's subjects—namely, Members of Parliament, and I would ask, seeing that they have to spend a considerable portion of their time here in London, whether it would not be fair that they should be allowed to deduct from the Schedule, or whatever it is called, the amount of expenses incurred—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This has nothing to do with Clause 4.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

(1.34.) MR. HEALY: I wish to raise the question seriously. We have been endeavouring to deal with large questions all the evening, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made that a ground of objection. This is a small question as it may seem to Her Majesty's Government, but it is not unimportant to some of us who consume a great deal of time and take considerable trouble in the discharge of our duties as Members of this House; and I ask would it not be fair that our expenses on this account should be deducted from the amount of our small incomes upon which this tax is levied? The Attorney General laughs, and with £8,000 a year he can do so; but I really do not see why, if we have to leave our homes and attend here in London at the expense of £200 or £300 a year, we should not be allowed to deduct the expenses thus incurred. It may be that there are some Members who would be too proud to avail themselves of such a provision. I am not one of those. We have been engaged in altruistic propositions in favour of other people, and it is right we should look after ourselves. I therefore move this as a new clause.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

New Clause—(Deductions by Members of Parliament)—brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. HEALY: I should have explained that the clause proposes that in the assessment of incomes of Members of Parliament a deduction of £300 a year shall be allowed in respect of expenses in connection with attendance on the House.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is a matter of some importance, and I do not wish to treat it lightly. We ought to have had it with due notice by having the proposal clearly laid before us. So far as I am concerned, the proposal is a new one, and I think it really forms part of the question of payment to Members, and should be considered in relation to that subject. There are various matters that present themselves in relation to the position and privileges of Members of this House. I know that in some parts of the world free passes on railways are one of the privileges of the position. But I hope the hon. Member will not press his proposal at this time, for none of us has had the opportunity of considering it.

MR. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the privileges of Members and of free railway passes. It is all very well for Members resident in London who can take a hansom cab to Portland Place to dismiss the question of expenses lightly, but it costs some of us a five pound note every time we return home. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is justified in his sneer at free passes—

*MR. GOSCHEN: I really meant to treat the matter seriously; I intended no sneer. I merely alluded to the privileges attaching to the position of Members. I assure the hon. Gentleman I wish to treat his proposal with all respect.

MR. HEALY: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's explanation, though in the light of the explanation the remark as to railway passes is wholly unintelligible. I allow that it is a fair objection that I have not put notice of my Amendment on the Paper; it was my intention to do so. I do not esteem it a privilege to spend £200 or £300 a year in London. There may be Members who regard the position from quite another point of view, but remember we have to attend here not for our own convenience at considerable expense. We should be satisfied if we could transact our Parliamentary business in Dublin. I will not now put the House to further trouble in regard to the proposal, but I shall certainly raise it on another occasion. It is not concerned with the payment of Members.

Question put, and negatived.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

NATIONAL DEBT [CONVERSION OF EXCHEQUER BONDS].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, for the purpose of the conversion of the securities held by the National Debt Commissioners on account of advances made by them under the provisions of the 'National Debt Redemption Act, 1889,' it is expedient to authorise (a) the creation of a charge upon the Consolidated Fund in favour of the National Debt Commissioners for a sum of £13,000,000, together with interest thereon at the rate of 2½ per centum per annum, such charge to be reduced at any time by the issue of money out of the Consolidated Fund to the National Debt Commissioners of any portion of the sum of £13,000,000; (b) the cancelling of all Exchequer Bonds and Securities issued in respect of the advances made by the National Debt Commissioners."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(1.45.) DR. TANNER (Cork County, Mid): I beg to move that Progress be reported.

*MR. GOSCHEN: This is but a formal stage. There will be opportunity of considering the Report of the Resolution, and subsequently Members will have the Bill in their hands.

DR. TANNER: Yes, but this is not the time for serious business; and the proceedings, if merely formal, can be easily gone through to-morrow.

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

LAND COMMISSIONERS (IRELAND) [SALARIES].

Committee to consider of authorising the increase of the present Salaries of the Commissioners appointed under "The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885," and the payment thereof out of the Consolidated Fund (Queen's Recommendation signified), upon Monday next.—(Sir John Gorst.)

MR. TIMOTHY HEALY: We are, of course, all in favour of this proposal; but may I ask the right hon. Gentleman what is intended? Is it intended to equalise the salaries?

SIR JOHN GORST: This is but the formal Resolution upon which to found the Bill.

MR. HEALY: Yes, I am aware of that; but is it intended to equalise the salaries?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): If there is any meaning in the stage at all, at least the House should be enabled to understand the proposition before it. The right hon. Gentleman has not enlightened us, and we must object to the Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Motion is agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sexton: May I ask you, Sir, looking at the delay in forming a quorum, is it not within your competence to direct the Serjeant-at-Arms to require the attendance of Members who may be sitting on Committees, or others who may be wasting time in other parts of this building?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Members sitting on Committees have had their attention drawn in the usual way, by the ringing of the bell, to the fact that the House was being counted with a view to form a quorum. If those Members please to come down from the Committee Rooms they may do so, but it would be a strong step on my part to interrupt in the way suggested what may be very important proceedings in Committee. I will, however, let those Members know that the House is waiting for a quorum. The Serjeant-at-Arms will inform Members of Committees that the House has been long waiting for a quorum."—18 May, 1181

Suspension of Member:

Mr. Cuninghame Graham (interrupting): "What I want to know is, how do swindling shareholders in a company derive their funds?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Order, order! The conduct of the hon. Gentleman is such that I must name him to the House. I name you, Mr. Cuninghame Graham." . . . "The Question is, 'That the hon. Member be suspended from the service of the House.'"—4 May, 108

RULINGS

Mr. Pritchard Morgan asking leave to move the Adjournment of the House,

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The hon. Member is not in Order. He has this evening got a Notice down traversing the Second Reading of a Bill on the Orders of the Day to the effect 'That, in the opinion of this House, no legislation will be satisfactory that does not deal fully with the administration of the Mines Royal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.'"

Mr. P. Morgan: "With the permission of the House I will withdraw the Motion."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Order, order! The hon. Gentleman cannot do it."

Mr. P. Morgan: . . . "With your permission, I will move the Adjournment of the House for a personal explanation."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The hon. Gentleman is not in Order. He complains of an expression used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there is no doubt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will render an explanation of the expression which has given the hon. Gentleman offence."—5 May, 190

[cont.]

Mr. Knox: "I wish to know whether it will be competent for any Member, upon this Motion being put, to give Notice to-day that on the Motion being put to-morrow he will move an Instruction?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Notice for an Instruction to a Standing Committee will not attach to any Order of the Day, but will be an independent Motion."

Mr. Sexton: "Then, if the Bill were referred to a Standing Committee, it would be competent afterwards to move an Instruction to the Committee?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"It would be perfectly in Order."

Mr. A. J. Balfour: "On a point of Order, and to prevent any misconception, do I understand your ruling to be that the Notice of Motion which is made by a private Member would stand with private Motions, and would come on with them, and would not come next in order to the Government Notice? I thought the hon. Gentleman gathered that he would have a right, if the Motion were carried, to move this Instruction. I understand your ruling to be that would not be so—that he would only have the privilege of a private Member, and would have to ballot for his place."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"I said a Motion for an Instruction would be an independent Motion, without precedence."

Mr. Sexton: "Then, it will be merely a matter of chance, and the right of a Member to move an Instruction to a Committee of this House will be destroyed?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Notice will have to be given of the Instruction. The Motion will be subject to the ballot. I understand the hon. Member asked me as to a point of Order."

Mr. Sexton: "I wish to know whether it is in Order to move to discharge an Order in Committee upon a Bill the House has already gone into?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"It is unusual, but no progress was actually made."

Mr. Knox: "As it appears from the Notice Paper to-day, progress had actually been made with this Bill. The Chairman had reported Progress on the 4th April."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"That is the technical expression. The Chairman of Committees must report something. He reports 'Progress,' although no progress may have been actually made—no progress, in the present case, was actually made."—5 May, 193.

Order for Com. Dublin Barracks Improvement Bill, read:—

Mr. SPEAKER—
"The Instruction of which the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr.
T. M. Healy) has given Notice is not in order, inasmuch as it involves a public charge."

Mr. Timothy Healy explained his proposal.

Mr. SPEAKER—
"I am afraid the hon. and learned Member's explanation does not make the Instruction the more in Order. The Secretary of State can only recoup the ratepayers of Dublin from the public funds."

Mr. T. M. Healy: "May I ask you, Sir, if I would be in Order in moving the Instruction down as far as the word
"barracks," leaving out the last line and a half, so that the Corporation may establish the amount they have expended?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The hon. and learned Member may proceed so far."

[Later] Mr. Speaker: "Order, order! The hon. and learned Member is now speaking to the Amendment as a whole. He is arguing in favour of compensation being given from the Imperial Exchequer, and such a proposal, as I have informed the hon. and learned Gentleman, would not be in Order."—809

After further discussion,

Mr. SPEAKER—

"I have allowed the discussion to proceed, seeing that the Instruction in terms indicated the object as being to provide that the Dublin Corporation should show the amount expended upon the building.
The last section of the Instruction given Notice of I have ruled out of Order, as involving a charge upon the Exchequer; but I now see, and it is evident from the speeches that have been delivered, that the same objection applies to the earlier part of the Instruction. With the inter-

[cont.

put upon it, I am bound to say the Instruction is not in Order."—12.
Mr. 812

Admiral Field: "That fair decision we have not had from my point of view, for I have shown that one Member was committed by his previous action in reference to Torquay."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The hon. and gallant Gentleman is not entitled to cast reflections on the action of Members on a Committee."—19 May,

On Superannuation Acts Amendment Bill,
Com.

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The question is as to what tribunal this Bill shall be referred: whether it shall be considered in Committee of the whole House, or whether it shall go to a Select Committee. The merits of the Bill are not under discussion, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman is therefore out of Order in discussing the merits of the Bill.
—19 May, 1310

Mr. Henniker Heaton: "I beg to call your attention, Sir, to the fact that the London County Council (Tramways) Bill was just now read a third time, notwithstanding the fact that there appear five Notices of opposition on the Notice Paper against the Motion for Third Reading."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The Order was called in the usual way, and no hon. Member raised any opposition to the Motion for Third Reading. The hon. Member was himself standing at the Bar when the Order was called, but no objection reached me. It is not in my power now to go back upon the decision of the House."—23 May, 1570

Mr. Bartley: "On a point of Order I would ask whether the expression just used can be withdrawn, as it has been freely stated across the floor of the House that he has got it out?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"I took notice of the expression, and, thinking that the question might be answered,
I requested that a question put in that form should not be answered; and I meant thereby to mark my sense that the expression was unparliamentary and altogether unsuited to this House."—23 May,

Mr. Hunter: "I ask your ruling, Sir, on a point of Order. Am I right in my opinion that a decision on a Motion to omit a sub-section precludes an Amendment being proposed to this sub-section? I have an Amendment to propose the omission of the words 'Parochial Boards in Scotland.'"

The CHAIRMAN—

"The Question will be put in a form to preserve the possibility of such an Amendment if there is a desire to move it."

Mr. Esslemont: "I rise to Order, Sir. My Motion was to omit Sub-section 4."

The CHAIRMAN—

"The hon. Member for Aberdeen intimated his intention to move an Amendment altering the words 'Parochial Boards.' Consequently in putting the Question I did so in the form 'That 'in distributing the sum of £50,000' stand part of the Clause.' The Committee affirmed that Question, the words stand, and now the hon. Member for Aberdeen moves his Amendment."—3 May, 60

Mr. A. J. Balfour: "I am unwilling to put hon. Gentlemen a second time in the position of breaking faith deliberately——"

Mr. Buchanan: "I rise to Order. I beg to ask you, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman is justified in using the words against hon. Gentlemen on this side that they broke faith deliberately?"

The CHAIRMAN—

"Whether the right hon. Gentleman is justified I do not know. It is perfectly consistent with Parliamentary usage."

Mr. Buchanan: "Do I take it from you, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman was in Order in saying that hon. Gentlemen on this side deliberately broke faith?"

The CHAIRMAN—

"There are abundant precedents for such language."—5 May, 209

The CHAIRMAN—

"I understand the hon. Member desires to move an Amendment to this Bill referring to the desirability of adopting the representative principle in the Councils. The Preamble is always taken last, in order that it may be in perfect consistence with the Bill in its final shape. The Preamble would not be consistent with the Bill in its final shape if amended as proposed, and therefore the Amendment would be out of Order."—6 May, 312

Sir W. Foster: "My point is this—t right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to misrepresent what I said."

The CHAIRMAN—

"Order, order!"

Mr. J. Chamberlain: "I submit to you, Sir, if that is in Order? The hon. Member says that I have endeavoured to misrepresent what he said."

The CHAIRMAN—

"I have called the hon. Member to Order, and I must ask him to withdraw."—9 May, 441
